Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Pensions Review

1. Mr. Stringer: If she will make a statement on progress being made on the Government's pensions review. [29074]

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): The pensions review that I announced on 17 July last year fulfilled our manifesto commitment. We have received more than 2,000 responses and we aim to publish our proposals for change in the first half of this year.

Mr. Stringer: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that the impact of the television licence on pensioners is analogous to the impact of the poll tax? Does she agree also that any review of pensions should take that into account either through direct compensation in the form of a £2 increase in pensions or by ensuring that pensioners do not have to pay the television licence fee?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Television is very important to pensioners, and we are concerned to take action on all matters affecting pensioners' quality of life. The cost of the television licence will be considered further by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. The value of the basic state pension is part of the pensions review, but our manifesto commitment is to maintain it as the foundation of income in retirement and to uprate it at least in line with prices.

Mr. Quentin Davies: May I give the Government yet another chance to give a straight answer to a straight question—which they have declined to do until now? Will they calm the serious anxieties and anguish felt by millions of people in this country by stating quite clearly that they have no intention of means-testing or affluence-testing the standard state retirement pension?

Ms Harman: We have made a commitment in our manifesto that we will keep the basic state pension and increase it in line with prices. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me another opportunity today to confirm that we will stick to our manifesto promise. We are certainly concerned to do what the previous Government never did: provide extra help for the poorest pensioners. We are doing that through winter fuel payments and by ensuring that those who are entitled to income support receive that benefit.

Mr. Winnick: What the Government have done to help pensioners since last May is, of course, appreciated by pensioners and by Labour Members. However, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the earlier point about concessionary television licences? Pensioners' finances would be improved considerably if they did not have to pay television licence fees. In view of the rumours that are floating about, which have been mentioned in the press, will my right hon. Friend do whatever she can to ensure that pensioners receive justice as quickly as possible? Pensioners should no longer have to pay the television licence fee or the fee should at least be halved for pensioners.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend has repeated those points very strongly. Television licence fees are important when considering pensioners' quality of life and cost of living. My hon. Friend's points are well taken by me, but, more importantly, I am sure that they will be noted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Mr. Webb: The pensions review is concerned, among other things, with ensuring that people of modest means save more. The Treasury has undertaken an individual savings account review that is also designed to encourage people of modest means to save more. Will the Secretary of State explain the relationship between those two reviews? Why are they being conducted at the same time, involving different people and different time scales? How will she ensure that the two reviews reach consistent conclusions?

Ms Harman: The reviews certainly will be consistent and will reach consistent conclusions. The two reviews are designed to complement each other and to have different purposes. The stakeholder pension, which we are consulting about, will ensure that people on low or intermittent earnings have the opportunity to save for their retirement so that they may retire not only on the basic state pension, but on a good, value-for-money second pension.

Mrs. Humble: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the pensions review and, indeed, the delivery of welfare benefits depend on well-motivated staff? Will either she or one of her Ministers meet me and other hon. Members who represent Fylde-coast constituencies to discuss recent suggestions, which are causing grave concern, that up to 200 jobs will be lost in the major Department of Social Security centres along the Fylde coast?

Ms Harman: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. The motivation of staff is critical to the quality of service and to its improvement, which we want to deliver. My hon. Friend asked for a meeting; I shall ask my right hon. Friend the Minister for Welfare Reform whether he is prepared to meet her and her colleagues from the area. My ministerial team and I regularly meet the DSS unions to ensure that they have a good working partnership with the Department, which was never done previously.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer devalued pensions through his actions in the Budget. That was made clear by the Government Actuary, who advised the Government to change the rebate to the state earnings-related pension scheme to avoid creating problems for those who had opted out. Why did the Government not accept and implement in full the Government Actuary's report, rather than slash occupational pensions?

Ms Harman: The Chancellor acted to ensure long-term investment, which is good for the economy, for pension schemes and for people with second pensions. I sought the advice of the Government Actuary, who regularly advises the Government. He gave his advice and we acted on it—everything remains completely in order.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Government clearly did not act on the Government Actuary's advice; they did not implement the changes to occupational pensions that he advised. As a result, those with occupational pensions will now have to pay much more than before to stay out of SERPS. That goes against the Government manifesto commitment to "support and strengthen the framework for occupational pensions."

Why has the right hon. Lady decided to slash occupational pensions?

Ms Harman: As I explained to the House previously—I take this opportunity to explain it again—I sought the Government Actuary's advice, which I considered and on which I acted. The previous Government left hundreds of thousands of people without compensation for the mis-selling of second pensions. We have acted promptly and appropriately, and we are also trying to sort out the mess that the previous Government left in relation to second pensions.

Housing Benefit

3. Mr. Colman: If she will make a statement on the level of fraud in housing benefit. [29076]

4. Dr. Whitehead: What plans she has for tackling organised fraud by landlords. [29077]

9. Fiona Mactaggart: What plans she has to tackle housing benefit fraud. [29082]

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): The Government's resolution to seek out fraud wherever it occurs is matched only by our diligence to seek out those who are eligible but do not claim.

Mr. Colman: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I particularly commend to him the London team against fraud, which consists of all 33 London boroughs working together and sharing information to stamp out housing benefit fraud. Will he deal with the team's concerns about whether banks and building societies can share information with it, or whether, as banks and building societies believe, they are precluded from doing so under the Data Protection Act 1988? Will he consider how he can ensure that the London team against fraud is able to deal effectively with housing mortgage fraud, which is part of housing benefit fraud?

Mr. Field: I shall certainly consider the matter. The idea for a combined effort throughout London was put to the Select Committee on Social Security, and the proposal was implemented by the previous Government. I ask my hon. Friend to take the thanks of the House to his local authority, which regularly exceeds its target for weekly benefits savings on housing benefit fraud.

Dr. Whitehead: I, too, thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his answer. Does he accept that part of the problem of fraud by landlords relates to their bad or incompetent management of DSS tenancies? Will he countenance projects whereby good and responsible landlords are encouraged to collaborate with local authorities and manage those tenancies more effectively?

Mr. Field: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. In the area which I represent in the Wirral, such projects are already occurring.

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. He might be able to implement two further measures that could help. First, he could make it easier for local authorities, such as Slough, which has been doing a great deal of work in this area, to initiate a prosecution where a claim has been withdrawn. That happens when people think that they are being sniffed around. The claim then disappears and the ability to take action is reduced.

Secondly, it might be possible to consider incentives for local authorities to improve prevention rather than opting for prosecution. I am certain that that would make a real difference, with the result that it would not be necessary to put as much energy into prosecution as is currently being expended.

Mr. Field: Last November, we increased the powers of local authorities to prosecute landlords who are committing fraud. In December, we issued a verification code, which enables fraud to be tackled at the outset of claims. I thank my hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman), whose local authority massively exceeds average weekly benefit savings.

Child Support Agency

5. Mr. Olner: If she will make a statement on the Government's approach to reforming the Child Support Agency. [29078]

Mr. Field: The Government hope to bring forward proposals for reforming the Child Support Agency before the summer is out.

Mr. Olner: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. For many in this place, reform will not come soon enough. The previous Government introduced the agency, and it has never worked. It has done nothing for children—in other words, it has done nothing to improve their livelihoods. The sooner that reform takes place, the better.

How widely has my right hon. Friend consulted on reforms? Once consultation has taken place, we must ensure that the appropriate legislation is put on to the statute book as quickly as possible.

Mr. Field: My hon. Friend will be aware that Baroness Hollis, the Under-Secretary of State, is spearheading the review. She has met many people already, as I have done. I am grateful for the critical faculties that Members bring to the outline proposals, which we debated the other day. I make a plea to Members on both sides of the House: when the proposals are published, let us have the most detailed and critical discussion. Last time round, we sleepwalked many of our constituents into a nightmare. [HON. MEMBERS: "Apologise."] We must not do that again.

Miss Kirkbride: In the light of the Minister's earlier answer, will he confirm that in his proposals to reform the CSA, absent parents will still be expected to make a significant contribution to their children's upkeep, and that the obligation will not fall on to the taxpayer, as before?

Mr. Field: The answer to that question is a resounding yes. I heard one of my hon. Friends saying a moment ago that I should apologise for the CSA. I, as a politician, apologise for being a Member of this place who put the CSA on to the statute book. Responsibility for the CSA rests with the House. I do not approve of the behaviour of those who, like Pontius Pilate, endlessly wash their hands and blame the agency's staff when responsibility for the operation of the agency is political. The House established the CSA and the House will need to reform it.

Pensioner Incomes

6. Mr. Bradshaw: What assessment she has made of (a) present and (b) future inequality in pensioner incomes. [29079]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): We want today's and tomorrow's pensioners to enjoy security in retirement. Estimates show that the gap between the best and worst-off pensioners will be even wider in future than it is today under current policies, so a key objective of the pensions review is to ensure that pensioners have an adequate income in retirement and that they share fairly in rising national prosperity.

Mr. Bradshaw: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the sum that the Government are spending on extra winter fuel payments is more than would have been expended if we had reintroduced the link between earnings and pensions? There is the added advantage of helping poorer pensioners most, including nearly 7,000 in my constituency in Exeter. Does this not show that things can be done now, notwithstanding the outcome of the pensions review, to help narrow the gap between rich and poor pensioners?

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend is right. We have taken action to help all pensioners with fuel bills to pay them through winter fuel payments. Help within that has been especially focused on poorer pensioners receiving income support, who have already received their payment of £50. The total cost of the package this year is expected to be about £200 million, which is more than the additional costs that would have been involved in uprating pensions by earnings rather than by prices.

Mr. Gibb: The Secretary of State has told us that the Government sought the Government Actuary's advice and acted properly upon it. What does "acted upon it" mean? Does that mean that the Government implemented the recommendations in full, or in part?

Mr. Denham: We have considered the Government Actuary's report and have taken action.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that, notwithstanding the welcome money for winter fuel, the real way in which to eliminate poverty for many pensioners is to re-establish the link with earnings and to increase the pension accordingly? The previous Government took more than £20 a week off every pensioner in this country. Private provision cannot—and never will be able to—help the poorest in this country, who often do not have long-term jobs that enable them to buy into occupational pensions. Should we not look to state provision to eliminate poverty?

Mr. Denham: We have already taken action to help today's pensioners. The pensions review will report later this summer. It has involved a series of meetings with Jack Jones and the National Pensioners Convention to discuss the position of today's pensioners and what action can be taken.

Most people who enjoy security in retirement have two pensions: the basic state pension and a second pension, often provided through an invested fund. I am sure that that will be a key element of our strategy for the future.

Mr. Burns: On pensioner incomes, will the Minister confirm that the Chancellor and the Secretary of State have boasted on numerous occasions that the winter fuel payment will be paid to all pensioners in the United Kingdom? Will he now confirm that that is not the case, that anyone reaching pensionable age on or after 6 January 1998 will not receive the payments this year and that the cut-off date will affect up to 150,000 pensioners by the end of March, when the money is finally expected to be paid? Will he consider making the money available to those pensioners, who are getting not a new deal but a raw deal from the Government? Will he explain the fiasco—and apologise to the House for it—in which cheques were sent to pensioners living in residential homes, and why some of those pensioners will be able to keep the money and others will not?

Mr. Denham: The House will remember that, on a number of occasions, the hon. Gentleman voted to increase VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent. Common sense suggests that once the announcement on winter fuel payments was made, it was essential to make payments as quickly as possible. It was important to have a qualifying period that was easier for pensioners to understand and was operationally deliverable. It was set as the week commencing 5 January. If it had been set later, the exercise could not have been completed in time for payments to be made to help with winter fuel bills.

Income Support (Pensioners)

7. Mr. Pond: If she will make a statement on the Government's actions to assist pensioners who are eligible for income support. [29080]

Mr. Denham: We are determined to help the 1 million pensioners who are not claiming their income support entitlement. We have commissioned research to find out why they do not make a claim, and, from April, we shall run a number of pilot projects to find the best way in which to encourage them to do so.

Mr. Pond: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. I am sure that in the pensions review, the needs of the poorest pensioners will be a priority, but, given that Opposition Members continue to peddle the notion that the basic state pension might be subject to a means test, will my hon. Friend confirm once again that cuts to, and means-testing of, the basic state pension were part of the previous Government's policy and are nothing to do with the present Government's policy, and that the basic state pension will remain a central foundation of pension provision?

Mr. Denham: I am happy to reaffirm, once again, our manifesto commitment on which we were elected, and for which pensioners voted in large numbers. The basic state pension will be retained as the foundation stone for retirement and will be uprated at least in line with prices. I am grateful for the opportunity once again to make that statement to the House.

Mr. Collins: I am most grateful to the Minister for what he just said. Perhaps he will now give a straight answer to my question. Will the Government rule out means-testing the basic pension—yes or no?

Mr. Denham: This Government will keep their promises. We have promised to uprate the basic state pension at least in line with prices. We have already honoured that commitment. From this April, the basic state pension for a couple will exceed £100 for the first time. We deliver on what we promise.

Mr. Hope: Is my hon. Friend aware that many people who are in work cannot save with an occupational pension because their employer does not have such a thing? Those people might not be able to afford a private pension scheme. Indeed, those with caring responsibilities are not at work and therefore cannot contribute. Is he aware that if that situation continues, there will be growing inequality in the years ahead when those people reach pensionable age? Can the Government assure the House that, in the pension review, they will look at how we can provide second pensions that are affordable and accessible to people on low incomes or with caring responsibilities?

Mr. Denham: Yes. The pension review has two key elements: first, our proposals for stakeholder pension schemes, which will be value for money, low cost, flexible and particularly suit those who cannot join an employer's occupational scheme or those for whom personal pensions are far too expensive; secondly, we are also considering—again in line with our manifesto—a citizenship pension for those such as carers who cannot contribute to a funded second pension because of their important role in looking after a member of the family or another person.

Welfare Reform

8. Mr. Boswell: When she last met representatives of disability interests to discuss welfare reform. [29081]

11. Mr. Clappison: What recent representations she has received about benefits for the disabled. [29084]

Mr. Denham: We have received a number of representations on welfare reform. My right hon. Friend and I have twice met members of the all-party disablement group to discuss their views on this important issue. The most recent meeting took place last Monday.

Mr. Boswell: I thank the Minister for that answer, but will he confirm that neither he nor his Secretary of State—nor, indeed, briefings from No. 10—has yet answered the basic question: whether the entitlements of the 6.5 million people with moderate disabilities will be cut as a result of the Government's welfare reform proposals? They need to know—is the answer yes or no?

Mr. Denham: I can reassure the House that the Government want to ensure that those in genuine need receive the support, in cash and in other ways, that they need. No changes will be made without full consultation, particularly with organisations of and for disabled people.

Mr. Clappison: Will the Minister bear in mind the representation that his Department received from the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, who said that transferring the disability living allowance to local authority social services departments in any way would make the disabled the victims of the lottery of local authority discretion? Will the Minister rule that out, as it is worrying many disabled people?

Mr. Denham: We are, as I have said, determined to ensure that the appropriate support, in cash and in other ways, is available for disabled people. We are considering ways in which that can be done as part of the welfare reform process. We will publish our proposals, and they will be subject to the fullest possible consultation.

Mrs. Mahon: Did members of the disability groups raise with my hon. Friend the matter of the complicated disability living allowance self-assessment forms? Will he consider making the forms simpler because many people are losing benefit who need not do so?

Mr. Denham: Many important issues have been raised by organisations of and for disabled people, including the complexity of the assessment process. They will be looked at during the review.

Mr. Barnes: Is the Minister aware of the Government's credibility gap on the future of disability benefits? It has been caused by the cut in single parent benefit and the work of the benefit integrity project, which has led to many people losing their disability living allowance, although they are perfectly entitled to it, and trying to have it re-established on appeal. What are the Government going to do about overcoming their problems with presentation to show that they will not cut out the rights of disabled people in the future?

Mr. Denham: Evidence from the benefit integrity project broadly confirms the initial estimate of the level of incorrectness in that benefit. We have learnt from the project as it has developed, which is why my right hon. Friend recently announced extra safeguards to ensure that no one would have their benefit stopped or reduced unless additional evidence—not just that provided by the claimant—was available. That is a step forward in safeguarding the work of the project and it shows that we are listening to organisations of and for disabled people as the work progresses.

Mr. Burstow: Forty thousand people have been through the benefit integrity project, many of whom have wrongly had their benefit stopped or reduced, but have not appealed. Will the Minister reconsider their cases? They feel intimidated and unable to go back through the appeal process because of the way in which the project has worked. To ensure that people receive the benefit to which they are entitled and to restore the project's integrity, will he ensure that interviews are reconsidered and claim forms re-examined to see whether they have been completed incorrectly?

Mr. Denham: If people feel that they have not been properly treated, the review and appeal process is available to them. I am sure that decisions have been made in accordance with the law laid down by Parliament, but we have introduced the extra safeguard to which I referred. If people are in the position described by the hon. Gentleman, they should exercise their right to a review or an appeal.

UK Presidency (Women)

10. Ms Rosie Winterton: What action the Ministers for Women are taking during the UK's presidency of the European Union in conjunction with their European counterparts. [29083]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Ms Joan Ruddock): The priority of the Ministers for Women has been to ensure that the women's perspective is introduced into the presidency's key theme of employability. Various activities are taking place on that theme. An initiative on action on violence against women is under way as part of our presidency.

Ms Winterton: Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity during the UK presidency to discuss the real problems faced by low-paid women, particularly in finding affordable child care? Will she encourage initiatives on a European level, such as the working family tax credit, which would greatly help some of the poorest women in our society to meet child-care costs?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for her question. I am pleased to tell her that her view that affordable child care underpins the employability of women concurs with our thinking and our priorities as Ministers for Women in the United Kingdom. We intend to discuss these matters in an informal presidency meeting of Ministers for Women of European Union member states in Belfast on 5 and 6 May. That will enable us to compare best practice, and to show for the first time that the UK Government take child care and the employability of women very seriously indeed. We want to share our thinking with our European partners.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Do the Minister's plans to improve the employability of women extend to the employability of the remnants of the Greenham Common women, of whom she used to be such a prominent supporter?

Ms Ruddock: I am very sorry that the hon. Gentleman takes up valuable time at Question Time to make such frivolous points. The employability of all women in this country is of deep concern to the Government. We believe in equal opportunities. Women want to work, and we shall make it possible for more and more women to take their place in the workplace and to balance their family responsibilities, which they also take very seriously.

Ms Moran: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. I welcome the initiative that the UK is taking under its presidency. Is my hon. Friend aware that Britain is the poor parent of Europe in respect of child care? My sister, who lives and works in Paris, has been entitled to child care for her three children since they were one year old. My constituents in Luton would dearly love to have such a system. Can my hon. Friend assure us that, during the UK presidency, we shall see an expansion of quality child care?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I assure her that we shall have particular regard to good practice elsewhere as we develop a national child care strategy. We shall learn from other countries, and shall for the very first time put into practice a system of quality, affordable and accessible child care for parents and children, whose development will benefit greatly from that opportunity.

Mrs. Gillan: Does the Minister agree that in the United Kingdom, despite a great improvement under Conservative Governments, women's pay for full-time work is still on average only 80 per cent. of men's hourly pay, and that that issue is of great concern to all women? Does the Minister believe that she or the Prime Minister sets a good example to employers, or that the United Kingdom sends a positive message on equality to her European counterparts and gives the right lead, when the Prime Minister appoints her to a ministerial job at a rate of pay £23,623 less than that of her male colleagues? What does that say about the Government's attitude to women employees?

Ms Ruddock: The hon. Lady is perfectly well aware of the technical reasons for the impossibility of paying a salary for the new position.

Mrs. Gillan: Not for men.

Ms Ruddock: The hon. Lady protests, but there are men in the Government who are not drawing ministerial salaries.

The hon. Lady, who has represented her party and the Conservative Government as a spokesperson on women, has something to apologise for to the women of this country. The Government of which she was a member never championed women's needs; they took no trouble whatever to redress the imbalance between women's and men's pay. With the working family tax credit proposals—and, indeed, the minimum wage—this Government will do more to lift the wages of women than the Conservative Government did to lift the wages of any woman in nearly two decades.

Fraud Detection

12. Mr. Mitchell: What proposals she has for increasing the resources devoted to fraud detection efforts in respect of social security benefits. [29085]

Ms Harman: We are currently spending £400 million a year on tackling benefit fraud. We will take whatever measures are necessary to tackle fraud in social security.

Mr. Mitchell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is more sensible to begin the necessary work of reforming social security with a more vigorous onslaught on fraud and fiddles, whether they are perpetrated by employers or by beneficiaries, than to create an atmosphere of fear and terror by talking of cuts—cuts in benefit, cuts in rates, cuts in eligibility—and continuing the shakedown that the Conservative Government started among the disabled, which is going on at this moment?

Ms Harman: Let me take this opportunity to reassure people with disabilities and people who are claiming benefits that no one who is genuinely entitled has anything to fear from our welfare reforms. However, we want to rebuild support for the welfare state and we cannot do that if people believe that, although the House lays down the rules for entitlement, they can decide for themselves whether they will draw benefits. We will take tough action to ensure that there is no fraud—tough action in relation not only to claimants, but to employers who evade their national insurance contribution responsibilities.

I can report that, after one month of our new hotline to tackle national insurance fraud by employers, the Contributions Agency is now investigating 1,000 new cases of reported employer fraud. Such cases, if they are proved, not only defraud the national insurance fund, but strip employees of their entitlement to pensions and to sickness and other benefits.

Mrs. May: Does the Secretary of State accept that the number of cases of disability benefit fraud has proved to be extremely small? Will she state categorically that that is the case? Will she also reconsider the request from the all-party disablement group for the Government to suspend the benefit integrity project pending an independent review, in the light of real cases of hardship in which disability benefit has been cut or taken away?

Ms Harman: The benefit integrity project is not an anti-fraud project; it is a project to ensure that those who receive disability living allowance are entitled to it. Some people, although they may have been entitled to it when they first claimed, cease to be entitled because their circumstances change. I am sure that the hon. Lady agrees that it is right for us to ensure not only that those who are entitled receive their benefit, but that those who are not entitled do not receive it. As the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said earlier, we are taking steps to improve the quality of decision making in the benefit integrity project.

Mr. Swinney: As the Secretary of State will know, fraud accounts for only 12 per cent. of the 20 per cent. of cases in which disability living allowance has been reduced; the remaining 8 per cent. are the result of other factors.

Following the right hon. Lady's statement and her written answer to me of 9 February on securing additional evidence about decisions made in the benefit integrity project, does she accept that the Government have a responsibility to consider that 8 per cent. of cases and to take the initiative in deciding whether individuals have been properly treated by the Benefits Agency and the project and to restore benefits if that is appropriate?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend the Under–Secretary made it clear earlier that it is important for anyone who feels that he has been unfairly treated by the benefit integrity project to understand that he has a right to review if he wishes to take up that option. We introduced extra safeguards to the benefit integrity project so that if it is proposed that someone should have his disability living allowance cut or taken away, action will not be taken until further evidence has been sought to ensure that the decision is right. It is unsatisfactory for benefit to be reduced or taken away and for people to have to wait eight weeks for the matter to be sorted out by a review. That is why we have introduced the extra safeguards. We are reviewing the fraud targets on disability living allowance that were laid down by the previous Government because our evidence so far from the benefit integrity project suggests that they were not right, although it seems that the overpayment estimate probably was.

Lone Parents

13. Mr. David Davis: What the targets are for the number of lone parents who will obtain work through the new deal for lone parents. [29086]

Ms Harman: The new deal for lone parents is already up and running in eight areas. It will be extended nationally to new claimants in April and to existing claimants in October. About 500,000 lone parents with children over five are bringing up their children on income support.

Mr. Davis: What is the full cost of the scheme per lone parent? Perhaps more important, what is the full cost of the scheme for each lone parent placed in a job?

Ms Harman: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made available some £200 million to finance the new deal for lone parents over the next five years. The cost of more than 1 million lone parents bringing up 2 million children on income support at the end of the previous Government's term of office was about £10 billion. People think it inconceivable that the only Government message to lone parents on income support was, "Stay on it until your youngest child is 16." We are confident that our measures will help lone mothers to get into work and will begin to reduce the number of lone parents on income support.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the £50 a week better off figure that has been mentioned does not include the cost of child care? In my constituency, wages are so low that even with the benefit of the minimum wage, for single parents to be better off it would be necessary to make substantial changes to in-work benefits. Are such changes proposed?

Ms Harman: We are concerned to take all the steps we can to ensure that lone mothers do not have to bring up their children on income support but can get work and make it pay. The minimum wage and the working family tax credit will help low-paid families, the overwhelming majority of whom are lone parents. The cost of child care is an important factor for lone parents. For the first time in this country, we shall have a national child care strategy and in his Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will make further announcements about further help with the cost of child care through the tax system.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does the Secretary of State agree that after she launched the programme last year she said that it was a major success and claimed a 20 per cent. success rate? It was discovered that the actual rate of those going into work was 5 per cent. She told everybody to wait because some people still had not had a chance to act on the letters and that the scheme would be much more successful as the months went by. The success rate is now 6 per cent. Is not the reality that the programme is floundering and is not getting people into work? Most of those who are going into work are likely to have obtained jobs without that help. What is the right hon. Lady prepared to do to put the programme back on an even keel and make certain that it is a success rather than the failure that it is now?

Ms Harman: I think that the hon. Gentleman is saying, "Why do we need a new deal for lone parents because they would all get jobs anyway?" As that is not true, do I take it that he is backing the new deal for lone parents? If he is, that is very welcome. In the eight pilot areas, more than half the lone parents have been contacted. That is in stark contrast with what happened under the previous Government, who told them to stay on income support until their youngest child was 16. So far, one in five lone parents who have been asked to attend for interview have attended. That is in contrast with what happened under the previous Government, who never invited them. Of those who have attended, one in three are in jobs.

This is a pioneering approach. The hon. Gentleman left lone mothers on income support. We will help them to become better off, for themselves and for their families, by getting into work.

Caroline Flint: I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments on the new deal for lone parents, who agree with her statements. They are being treated as visible rather than invisible women, which is how they were treated for 18 years under the previous Government. However, many lone parents cannot go to work because they lack education and training. I would welcome my right hon. Friend's comments on how we can get the new deal to work for them, so that they are encouraged to go into education and training. Could we consider opening up to lone parents the new deal education and training option presently available for 18 to 24-year-olds?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We want not only to help lone parents get into work, so that they can be better off than they are on benefits, but to ensure that they get opportunities for further education and training. Several hon. Members have raised that matter with me. We are examining whether the new deal can offer lone mothers additional opportunities by providing them with education and training, so that they can not only get a job, but get on in their job.

New Deal

14. Mr. Day: What the benefits status of those under–25s who take part in the new deal will be (a) during the gateway period and (b) during their participation in any of the four options. [29087]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): The new deal for 18 to 24-year-olds gives young unemployed people real choices to improve their employability and their chances of fully participating in the labour market. During the gateway, young people will continue to receive jobseeker's allowance, provided they satisfy the normal eligibility conditions. Once they enter an option, they will receive either wages or a training allowance.

Mr. Day: Will young people who choose an option other than the employment option be better off than on benefit? If so, will the extra funding come from the social security budget?

Mr. Bradley: As I have explained, if young people take one of the options, they will receive either wages or a training allowance. If they receive a training allowance, they will be able to have passported benefits such as housing benefit and council tax benefit, which clearly come out of the social security budget.

International Women's Day

15. Ms Julie Morgan: What plans she has to promote international women's day. [29088]

Ms Ruddock: The Government's most important contribution to promoting international women's day will be the debate that we have arranged for this Friday. We are ensuring that Parliament has the opportunity to discuss women's priorities and how the Government are delivering on their promises to women.

Ms Morgan: Does my hon. Friend agree that child care facilities are needed in the House, both for members of staff and for elected Members and that, in the new institutions that we are setting up—the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Parliament—child care facilities should be built in from the beginning? Does she agree that Cardiff city hall, one of the options that is being considered to house the National Assembly for Wales, has a ready-made, established, creche? Does she agree that that is a great advantage?

Madam Speaker: That was very international—well done.

Ms Ruddock: My hon. Friend would not expect me to be drawn into where the Welsh assembly should be sited. However, in respect both to this Parliament and to any of the new institutions, the Ministers for Women are extremely keen that Members and people who work in these premises have the opportunity to express their child care needs. It is our view that all institutions should have regard to family-friendly conditions of employment and to assistance with child care. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I recently visited the European Parliament, we saw the excellent facilities it makes available not just to Members, but to the many staff who work in the buildings.

I urge my hon. Friend to join us in the debate on Friday, when she will be able to discuss—as, I hope, will many other hon. Members—whether child care is required, where it should be provided and the sort of child care that we want. Our priorities will be discussed on Friday and I urge hon. Members to be here to debate them.

Mr. Gray: Is the hon. Lady aware that an analysis of the list of Labour candidates at the election shows that it contained more public school boys than women? What steps will she take to stamp out that disgraceful inequality before the next general election?

Ms Ruddock: I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman will join us on Friday, when he will be able to express all his concerns about the representation of women, which is a key priority for the Ministers for Women. I can say with pride that our party has put women to the fore and ensured that there is now a record number of women in the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's party, and all others, will look carefully at equal representation for women, which I trust they will endeavour to bring about in all new institutions when they have the opportunity to do so.

Child Support Agency

16. Mr. Bob Russell: How many new cases she expects the Child Support Agency to deal with over the next year; and what changes in staffing (a) structures and (b) numbers she will implement to manage demand. [29090]

Mr. Keith Bradley: In 1998-99, we expect the agency to clear about 560,000 maintenance applications, an increase of more than 56 per cent. compared with the number cleared in 1996-97.

The agency is reorganising itself over the next year to move more staff on to front-line work and to improve telephone contact with customers. In addition, it will centralise work that does not require face-to-face contact with the public.

Those changes will allow the agency to increase staffing levels by 300 by March 1999 while saving £5 million in administrative expenditure.

Mr. Russell: The Minister of State said earlier that Parliament has sleepwalked into the nightmare of the CSA. Is it not time to stop the Rip van Winkle approach to the CSA, bearing in mind the fact that in one year Members of Parliament deal with 18,000 cases? Will the Government provide additional staff to ease the work load of hon. Members dealing with CSA cases?

Mr. Bradley: Rip van Winkle woke up on 1 May. The Government are undertaking a thorough review of the CSA, as my right hon. Friend the Minister for Welfare Reform explained. We will present proposals in the summer and the points raised by the hon. Gentleman will form part of the review.

Pensioners (Fuel Bills)

17. Mr. Savidge: If she will make a statement on her plans to help pensioners with their fuel bills. [29091]

Mr. Denham: This is the first time any Government have been prepared to help all pensioner households with their winter fuel bills. A total of £400 million has been made available to provide extra help, for this winter and next, to all pensioner households. One and a half million pensioners on income support have already received a payment of £50; other pensioner households will receive £20. Almost 10 million payments will be made to more than 7 million pensioner households. The majority of payments should be made by the end of March.

Mr. Savidge: Northern Scotland will welcome all measures that reduce the misery of pensioners' going to bed unnaturally early for fear of fuel costs and the tragedy of cold-related illness and death. Will my hon. Friend consider what further steps can be taken to reduce the tragedy of that sort of suffering?

Mr. Denham: In addition to winter fuel payments, we have cut VAT on fuel and on materials used in Government-funded insulation programmes, we have abolished the gas levy, there is a review of utility regulation and an interdepartmental group is investigating fuel poverty. The winter fuel payments have been promised for this winter and next. The best approach is to take stock of that policy in the light of the other initiatives and reviews across the Government, including the pensions review, to find out the best long-term way to ensure that pensioners can always heat their homes in the winter.

Mr. Rendel: Will the Minister confirm that 80 per cent. of the extra winter fuel payments will be made in March or later, meaning that almost all pensioners will have to pay their winter fuel bills before they get the money?

Mr. Burns: It is a summer supplement.

Mr. Denham: This is the first time a Government have taken such action. Only in November was it clear that funds would be available for winter fuel payments. We have moved as swiftly as possible to make the payments. The majority will be made by the end of March. No other Government, including the Conservative Government of which the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who is muttering on the Front Bench, was a member, have taken such action to ensure that pensioners can heat their homes in the winter.

18. Dr. Gibson: What steps the Ministers for Women are taking on European Union–wide initiatives during the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Union. [29092]

Ms Ruddock: In addition to what I told my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), the Ministers for Women are urging all member states to address women's needs for family-friendly employment policies and child care in their national employment action plans. We also want to tackle all forms of violence against women. During our presidency, we are urging member states to work at a national level to raise awareness of that issue.

Dr. Gibson: What steps is my hon. Friend taking to persuade employers to set up workplace facilities for child care? She will know that many European countries have moved ahead faster than us on this. Will she tell us about the training of people employed in workplace child care facilities? Does she agree that at least a minimum wage would be proper remuneration for such people?

Ms Ruddock: We are concerned about the provision of child care and to ensure choice. Provision by employers is very welcome. We are aware of provision in other nations. We shall study those issues at our conference in Belfast. Quality and training are key to our national child care strategy. A considerable consultation exercise is under way to ensure that the child care provided is good for child development and gives a safe environment. Child caring should be properly remunerated. The minimum wage will give recognition to those who undertake that worthwhile and sometimes taxing work.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will the hon. Lady take the useful initiative with her European counterparts of trying to find out why the majority of European Union countries have a lower rate of divorce than the United Kingdom? Those lower divorce rates result in less damaging and traumatic experiences for children and a lower cost to the social security budget. If she can discover the reasons, will the Government try to do something about them through their social policies?

Ms Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that there are different cultural patterns—and that there have been different developments—across Europe. Many of us regret that divorce rates are rising throughout Europe. This country is not unique in that. We have learnt many things in our meetings, but such personal issues will not be brought into the European conferences that I have referred to.

Child Support Agency

20. Mr. Bill O'Brien: What plans she has to improve the efficiency of public telephone contacts with the Child Support Agency; and if she will make a statement. [29095]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Many of the Child Support Agency's customers have said that the telephone is their preferred way of dealing with the agency. The agency recognises the need to improve its telephone service and is taking forward a number of new initiatives with this in mind.

As many parents have work or domestic commitments during the day, the agency has begun to employ staff to work a wider, more flexible range of working patterns over a six-day week. As well as extending the opening hours when telephone contact can be made with it, the agency will increasingly use the telephone to get in touch with customers at an early stage in their application. The aim is that much more of the business will be conducted over the telephone than by correspondence. This will allow the agency to gather the information needed more quickly and help speed up the assessment process.

For customers with general inquiries, more resources are to be allocated to the agency's national inquiry line from April 1998.

Mr. O'Brien: Any improvement in the service provided by the CSA is welcome. Will my hon. Friend take on board the need for better training for CSA staff? People are referred from one department to another and computers sometimes go down, which means that answers to queries are not received. The latest problem arises from the fact that people are being advised that although the Government guaranteed that 70 per cent. of the net wage would be retained by the absent parent, that figure could be reduced to 60 per cent. or less. That problem must be dealt with because it is causing great concern, not only in my constituency but across the country.

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend takes a great interest in this subject. As we move towards a more case work-focused, front-line service with greater use of the telephone, training will be an essential feature of that service, and we are determined to put extra resources into that part of the agency's work.

Planning for Communities

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement on planning for the communities of the future. A document setting out our approach is published today and has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The document includes a response to the public consultation on the previous Administration's Green Paper, "Household Growth: Where Shall We Live?".

I hope that we can refocus the debate and, in doing so, change some of the language that we use in it. To my mind, much of the debate so far has been clouded by unhelpful language, crude figures and confused statistics. For example, the term "brown-field" is not helpful. I propose to talk about recycled land, which, of course, can be in cities—[Interruption.] There is no difference at all in the interpretation; "recycled land" is simply a better term. It can, of course, be in cities, towns or villages.

Green-field is too often confused with green belt, as if the two were always the same. Most important, while the technical term "household growth" is sometimes necessary, it does not adequately describe our main concern, which is to develop sustainable communities, now and in the future. I hope that, following today's statement, the Opposition will join us in a sensible debate—which does not seem likely—about how to achieve that aim, while recognising the real difficulties involved in meeting household growth in a sustainable way.

My Department published the latest projections of growth in the number of households in March 1995, under the previous Administration. The projections suggest that around an extra 175,000 households a year will be formed in the 25 years from 1991 to 2016. That is because of population growth and because people are living longer and couples are separating more often. However, household growth has been outstripping population growth increasingly since the turn of the century. It is not new.

The dilemma is clear cut and affects us all—how to accommodate more households and, at the same time, protect our precious countryside, without causing rents, house prices or homelessness to spiral upwards. It is a matter not just of how many households but of where they will live.

There are four key elements in our new approach. The first is increased flexibility. We shall emphasise that the projections are guidance, not building requirements. The second is more decentralisation. Regional planning conferences will have more responsibility and accountability in deciding the most sustainable way of meeting the needs of their communities. The third is making the best possible use of previously developed land and existing buildings. We must put the heart back into our cities and put cities at the heart of our strategy. The fourth is that what I set out today is part and parcel of our determination to achieve better integration of a range of policies that affect communities.

In order to achieve greater flexibility, we are determined to get away from a simplistic "predict and provide" approach in housing, as we have done for road building. We shall treat the household projections as guidance, not house building requirements. Moreover, we shall allow for greater flexibility in adjusting regional and local plans to ensure that, over time, local provision meets local need.

Decentralisation is an essential aim of the Government—whether in devolution, in establishing the regional development agencies, or in our proposals for London—which I am pleased to see the Opposition now support.

We therefore propose to strengthen the role of the regions in translating projections into regional planning guidance. The regional planning conferences will work together with the Government offices to determine how much extra housing is needed in their regions.

The aim will be to increase the local ownership figures so that local authorities translate the new regional guidance into plans and actions on the ground. I want to see better public information on the consequences of decisions on releasing land for housing, so that those responsible can be held accountable and the public debate can be better informed. I want it to be a truly bottom-up approach.

The conferences may be able to justify lower or higher housing figures than those implied by the projections, but we shall expect local authorities to monitor and report on the effects of their decisions. If the effects are damaging, authorities will need to act—or, in the last resort, we may need to intervene—but the whole philosophy of our new approach is to strengthen local responsibility and to have a bottom-up approach. We shall move to that new approach as quickly as possible in the reviews of regional planning guidance that are already under way. As soon as the new regional planning guidance is ready—possibly as early as next year—it will be open to local authorities to review their development plans.

In considering development plans in advance of new regional planning guidance, I shall continue to treat each case on its merits, taking account of today's statement.

It is our firm policy to protect our countryside and revitalise our towns and cities, by maximising the use of recycled land and existing buildings. One of the most effective ways of relieving the pressure on the countryside is to revitalise our cities and improve the quality of urban life. That is why I have called for an urban renaissance in Britain, requiring a whole range of measures. It is not just a matter of urban housing, let alone planning; it is about tackling the range of problems affecting the quality of urban life—in relation to crime, education, jobs, transport or the environment. Many of the same problems also affect rural communities, to which we must also direct our attention.

Last Wednesday, I unveiled the winner of the millennium village competition. The millennium village is a flagship scheme, providing 1,400 homes on recycled land at Greenwich. The development will be built to the highest quality of architectural and environmental design. Energy use will be 80 per cent. better than average. Every home will be linked to the internet, opening new horizons of communication. It will be a development for the whole community. There will be homes for rent as well as homes to buy, with provision for jobs, shops, public transport, health and schooling. The millennium village will point the way for urban regeneration in future, and I have asked

[Mr. John Prescott]

English Partnerships to seek out other similar sites for urban villages, to share the benefits throughout the country.

That initiative will run alongside our other main programmes: nearly £1 billion under the capital receipts initiative, £250 million announced last week under the estates renewal challenge fund and our other urban regeneration programmes. Such initiatives will help to meet a higher proportion of future housing need on recycled land in our towns and cities, rather than in the countryside.

The target set by the previous Administration was "that, by 2005, half of all new housing should be built on re-used sites".

In practice, they achieved an average of 42 per cent. between 1985 and 1995—rising from 38 per cent. in 1985 to 50 per cent. in 1995. The figures are national averages—ranging from 33 per cent. in the east midlands to 83 per cent. in London—but the target was not based on any assessment of the availability of recycled land.

In future, we shall expect each regional planning conference to make a proper assessment of land availability and set regional targets for the use of recycled land. That has never been done before. It is an important change and it will sharpen the focus of policy and action on the ground. Last week, I asked my Department to work with English Partnerships and local government to create a national database of land use, which will give local authorities reliable information on the amount of recycled land available for housing.

Today, I go further. Local authorities, developers, builders and the professions have all been looking for a lead. To spearhead that unprecedented collective effort, I have established a task force to help make better use of recycled land. I have asked my noble Friend Lord Rogers of Riverside to lead it. It will co-ordinate and develop a wide range of activity and innovation.

I consider that a national target for the use of recycled land can help to guide regions and local authorities, and help them to improve their performance. With our new policies in place, we expect local planning authorities to be able to raise the national proportion of new homes to be built on previously developed land to 60 per cent. over the next 10 years. We shall come back to refine the national target in the light of regional targets when they are known and when our database is established.

We also want for the first time to measure separately the reuse of previously developed land in urban areas and in rural areas, so that we can get a better focus on urban redevelopment. Many of the respondents to the Green Paper accepted that 60 per cent. would not be easy. No one should underestimate the problems and costs of redeveloping some sites, such as those that are contaminated. Indeed, it cost more than £100 million to decontaminate the Greenwich millennium peninsula site alone—a decision taken by the previous Administration.

If we are to make our towns and cities attractive places in which to live and work, we must ensure a good quality of life. That is why we reject so-called "urban cramming" and pressures to build on green spaces in towns. Our parks and green spaces are part of what makes town living attractive. That is why we have strengthened the protection against building on school playing fields—a practice allowed by the previous Administration.

I now come to an important new element in our proposals. We propose to follow a sequential approach to the location of new housing and a phased approach to the release of land. Whenever possible, recycled land in urban areas should be built on first, provided that it can be well linked to public transport, jobs, shops and other facilities. The same tests will apply to the sequence of development of green-field sites. We shall also need to allow for release of empty property and so-called windfall sites. Some of the responses to the previous Government's Green Paper called for economic instruments, such as a green-field tax, to be introduced. As a first step, we want to open up debate on the use of that type of measure. Final decisions on taxation are, of course, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Much of the debate has concentrated on urban housing, but we must also allow for the housing needs of people in rural areas. Many country people are deeply concerned at the lack of affordable housing, often because houses are bought by wealthier commuters or as holiday cottages. A young couple in a village have every much a right to a decent home as their counterparts in the town.

Hon. Members will be aware of the recent report by the Rural Development Commission, the "1997 survey of rural services", which highlighted specific problems in the rural economy, particularly after 18 years of the previous Administration. Communities fall into decline and are no longer able to sustain jobs and essential local services. Those problems are particularly acute in our former coalfield communities, which are often in rural areas and which pit closures have left devastated. We must find new ways to address those problems. We want to see thriving communities in our rural areas—a living countryside.

It was the post-war Labour Government who laid the foundations of the modern town and country planning system, including green belts and national parks. The Government remain committed to protecting the green belts and the wider countryside—protection of the green belt is as strong as ever. Any new development, whether in town or country, must be sustainable development. There will be exceptional cases—such as that of Hertfordshire—where pursuing the most sustainable solution may lead to adjustments in the green belts, which is precisely what the previous Administration used to do. Nevertheless, since we came to office less than 10 months ago, some 30,000 hectares have been added to the green belt in boundary changes. I expect that trend to continue in this Parliament under this Government.

Successful community development depends on a wide range of policies. We shall tilt the balance in favour of urban development, not only through the planning process but through fairer regional development, improving our public transport, raising standards in our schools and tackling crime. We shall consult on how best to implement the proposals and take them forward in partnership with those involved, especially the regional planning conferences.

This statement represents a break with the past on one of the most important issues facing us today: how and where we should live. We want to replace the top-down, "predict and provide" mentality of the past with a more responsive and accountable system that is better able to revitalise our towns and cities and protect a living countryside that we all enjoy. I believe that the proposals will help us to achieve our twin aims of urban renaissance and ensuring that we hand on a green and pleasant land to future generations.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Labour Members cheer now, but it would be more impressive had they not cheered exactly the opposite policy three weeks ago. Everyone knows that, however it is dressed up, this is a major Government U-turn. It makes nonsense of everything that Environment Ministers have been saying over the past nine months. How does the Secretary of State square what he said today with, for example, what the Minister for London and Construction was saying a few months ago about the impossibility of the policy that has just been announced?

Against that background, let me ask the Secretary of State a few short questions to find out how deep his conversion goes. How will his announcement affect plans for development in the green-belt land and countryside that he has already personally waved through in Hertfordshire, West Sussex and Newcastle? Will he order a halt on those plans? How does it affect the structure plans of counties such as Hampshire? Will they proceed on the new or the old basis in making their plans?

On the target for brown-field developments, or recycled land as the Secretary of State prefers to call it, why have his Ministers consistently said up to now that a 60 per cent. target is unrealistic? He acknowledged in his statement that his Department's statistics show that the previous Government raised the brown-field use figure not to 42 per cent. but to 50 per cent. Is he aware that our target remains 66 per cent? I have no doubt that in a few weeks' time the Government will have accepted that also.

On Lord Rogers's committee, is the Secretary of State aware that the public will need to be convinced that this is not just yet another Government review? Will the committee be entirely independent? Will it be asked not only to identify brown-field sites but to suggest measures to encourage their use? In that respect, does he recognise that measures such as the new development land tax that he mentioned may be good for the Treasury, but do little to stop development, given the vast difference in price between agricultural and development land?

Is the Secretary of State aware that it is not enough for him to say that although he has approved the destruction of the green belt in one area, he has approved its extension elsewhere? The one certainty of that policy is that green-belt land is permanently lost and that the green-belt principle is undermined.

Opposition Members have campaigned against development in the countryside and in the green belt, and for maximum use of brown-field sites and recycled land. This afternoon, the Government have accepted our arguments. Both we and the public will need to be convinced that the Government's words will be followed by action. The best way for the Government to show a new resolve is by reversing a number of the damaging decisions that they have already taken to destroy the green belt.

Mr. Prescott: I find it difficult to accept that the Opposition spokesman realises that he was in government for 18 years. As he pointed out, and as I fairly said, the Opposition's record on using brown-field sites ranged from 38 per cent., to 50 per cent. in their last year in government. It was therefore fair for us to say that the average was 42 per cent. I was a little surprised that he raised the matter of targets because, in government, they achieved their target of 50 per cent. in one year—

Sir Norman Fowler: It was more than 60 per cent.

Mr. Prescott: That was before they moved. It was 50 per cent., then, as I understand, a consultation document recommended that 60 per cent. be considered. Then, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) wrote to me saying that I should adopt a target of 75 per cent. I wrote back to ask him whether that was his party's policy. The shadow Cabinet was then immediately convened, and the figure changed to 66 per cent.—all in a matter of weeks. I do not think that we can treat the Opposition spokesman's claims with any seriousness.

I want to have a serious debate. I did not slag off the Opposition in my statement; I did not think that there was a necessity to do so. [Interruption.] Just try and stick with it. We are trying to have an intelligent debate about a serious matter: where people live. I have tried to be helpful in suggesting changing some of the terms. In 12 months, I hope to have more information about where brown-field sites are. I find it amazing that the previous Government had not found out. In order to make a judgment, it is important to find out the amount of recycled land or brown-field sites we have. We are going to do that, and I hope that the House will be better informed as a result, so that we may have a more intelligent debate. [Interruption.] I am dealing with the opening comments of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler.)

I have said that any decisions that come before me will take the statement into account until the necessary changes that the statement requires are made. I particularly chose to mention Hertfordshire in my statement, to show that I was prepared to break into the green belt in order to connect the area to a transport corridor. The basic principle is about meeting transport requirements, by moving more people on to public transport. The House will have to have more and more debates about that. It is true that, after 10 months in office, there are over 30,000 more hectares of green belt. That is quite important. It shows just how important we think those matters are.

With regard to Lord Rogers's independent review, we hope that he will be able to report in the first 12 months precisely how much land is available. The report will be independent. I am sure that anybody who knows him will agree that he would not accept any proposition that was not of an independent kind.

What we have done today is to indicate a change. It will make for a more intelligent debate. I appeal yet again to the Opposition to join us in that debate. People outside the Chamber are concerned about where their homes and communities will be, whether in rural or urban areas, and look to us to have a proper debate.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be music to the ears of my constituents, in terms of both the development of what he calls recycled land and the protection of the living countryside, especially green spaces in towns? My constituents will be particularly pleased to hear his confirmation, in response to the bluster from the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), that the criteria in his statement will be used in judgments to be made. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the intention, so far thwarted, of North West Water to build a housing estate, office blocks and an hotel on the only piece of open, green countryside adjacent to my constituency, is rejected by thousands of my constituents who have fought the proposal for years? We look to him to approach any planning applications in the light of the criteria in his statement.

Mr. Prescott: My right hon. Friend reminds the House that it is not just urban playing fields but small woodland areas and forests in our towns and cities that need protecting. I cannot comment on the particular case that he mentions, as it may come before me in my quasi-judicial capacity.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): The Deputy Prime Minister's statement is an extremely important step away from the discredited policies of the former Government, under which six out of 10 homes were built on green-field sites—many of them as a result of the overturning of local objections, and some as a result of the overturning of the views of local inspectors.

Would the decisions that the right hon. Gentleman has taken and which were based on the previous Government's policies have been different under these new policies? If so, why does he not announce a moratorium on further major development in the green belt pending the implementation of the new strategies? After all, he has accepted that they may take a year to implement, and just taking them into account is no guarantee that they will be followed.

Why has not the right hon. Gentleman accepted the view of the round table that reported to the previous Government: that 75 per cent. of properties could be built on brown-field—or what he calls recycled—sites?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman is right about the different policies pursued by the previous Administration. I may have omitted to answer the point about whether there has been a U-turn. Indeed, I challenge the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield to show that anything I have said today differs from what I have said before. [Laughter.] It is no good saying, "Ho, ho, ho!" I will need more evidence than Opposition laughter before I will accept that there has been a U-turn. [Interruption.] Clearly, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield cannot contest what I have said.

As for the 75 per cent. target, I believe that 60 per cent. is difficult enough to achieve. We need to assess how many brown-field sites are available before we can judge how the policy is working. I have set that work in hand.

Changes to plans or moratoriums would require legislation, and I am not in a position to introduce legislation at this stage. I shall, however, take into account the principles that I have identified in my statement. Local authorities, too, will no doubt take them into account when they make their assessments under the new system. Most of the targets are for 15 or 20 years ahead. I am sure that the new procedures, which will give local authorities a better chance of flexibility and of including the regional dimension, will lead to further changes. Those will be matters for regional planning guidance and conference discussions.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does my right hon. Friend accept that if the strategy is to work, we must be prepared to look after existing housing areas far better than we have done in recent years? We must be prepared to spend more money on them, especially high-density housing schemes. We shall also need to regenerate the urban parks—where is the money to come from?

Mr. Prescott: I am surprised by my hon. Friend, who fought on the same manifesto as I did at the general election. It spelled out the fact that there would be £5 billion from capital receipts—a huge amount of money—to do precisely what he is calling for. What is more, the Chancellor has provided £800 million for the purpose.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): Will the Deputy Prime Minister accept my congratulations on getting rid of his target of 50 per cent., which is what we achieved, and on accepting the target that we had, of 60 per cent? What part will the round table on sustainable development play in the whole issue? It has suggested that 75 per cent. would be possible.

Secondly, there is a way in which the right hon. Gentleman can go back on decisions that he has already made. West Sussex council is taking him to court. It would be quite possible for him to decline to offer any evidence. That would enable him to do in West Sussex what I understand he has already done in Dorset.

Thirdly, would it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to devote a little more time to discussing mixed development? I noticed no reference to mixed development in what he said. The key to what we are dealing with is mixed development in our towns—not only social mix, but a mix of housing, shops and offices.

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman do something for the people of Stevenage, who are to have foisted upon them a development that would not be allowed under his policy, and which I would not have allowed when I was doing his job?

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. Before the Deputy Prime Minister answers, may I appeal to hon. Members? Most hon. Members in the House are standing—only about six are not standing. I obviously cannot call them all. Therefore, there will be only one question each now; otherwise, I shall ask the Deputy Prime Minister to answer only the first question.

Mr. Prescott: The recommendation of the round table on sustainable development—75 per cent.—is a difficult target to achieve. I could not in all honesty recommend that to the House, although I am prepared to reassess those matters once we have far more information. I have set that in hand.

With regard to West Sussex, the matter is before the courts. The principle on which we disagreed was that the local authority wanted to cut its housing programme by 25 per cent. I was not prepared to accept such an extreme cut. Dorset's cut was 1 per cent. of the total. The record of the previous Administration, in which the right hon. Gentleman played some part, shows that he also forced higher targets on some local authorities, which they did not want to accept.

Mixed ownership and living together are closely identified with the millennium urban village concept. I could not go into all the details in my statement, so I shall send the right hon. Gentleman all the aims and objectives—which he has probably read— of that concept. He is right about that, and we are trying to secure it.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): I thank my right hon. Friend for his welcome statement. What immediate guidance can he give to Bradford metropolitan district council regarding its urban development programme, which allocates 1,500 spaces for houses at Silsden, in the green belt, in a beautiful part of the Aire valley in my constituency?

Mr. Prescott: Such matters are controversial. The plan in Bradford has been strongly contested and is, I think, still being contested. My hope is to provide a better system, so that we do not get into such situations, and so that local authorities will have a greater opportunity to determine the figures in a more decentralised way. I have set out the programme for that, and I hope that it will be more acceptable to the people in the regions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): I welcome the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister is re-examining policy, and I congratulate him on overruling the unhelpful remarks of his junior Ministers on previous occasions. That makes a practical difference. Will he consider the situation of counties where structure plans have already been settled, such as the county of Nottinghamshire, where the bulk of the development is being allocated to the countryside in the south, and far less of it to the old coalfield sites in the north, which need the regeneration? Will he allow the public inquiries on those structure plans to be reopened? It cannot be right for one policy to apply in some counties, and a new policy, if he has one, to be applied in others.

Mr. Prescott: If the Opposition spokesman was at the Dispatch Box answering for the Government, I am sure that he would give the same reply as I shall give: those matters cannot be reopened at this stage. I have provided an opportunity for a review of projections that are set 25 years ahead. That process will allow us to reconsider those matters. All projections over that period will be taken into account in the structure plans and the long-term development. I am providing a far better process for people to influence growth and development in their areas.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement on recycled land. Will he bear it in mind that many existing planning permissions have not been triggered by developers? In my borough, there are 5,500 planning permissions year after year that have not been activated. That should be the backdrop to any decisions that he and his colleagues make when they receive inspectors' reports on planning applications. Will he be mindful of the need to ensure that where there is new residential development, particularly in the south-east of England, there is a penal tax on landfill and other measures? We must not resolve one problem of providing residential homes by creating an additional environmental problem that often results in land tipping, to the disadvantage of my constituents in Essex and those in other counties in the south-east of England, which is unacceptable.

Mr. Prescott: Those matters are very much under review at present. A conclusion will be arrived at shortly.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that my constituents were deeply disappointed when he approved—or said that he had no objection to—plans to build 10,000 houses in the green belt between Stevenage and Hitchin in my constituency? That is the biggest incursion into the green belt since any hon. Member has been in this place. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the whole country will view this as a litmus test of whether he has changed his rhetoric or his policies? Is he aware that Hertfordshire county council told me today that he could, without legal risk or the chance of incurring damages, reverse that decision and abort the plan? If he does so, my constituents and I will hail him as a hero. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that no one will believe that he has changed his policies if he is not prepared to change that decision?

Mr. Prescott: I have some difficulty accepting the Opposition's arguments in this area. As I understand it, they would like local authorities to have more say on such matters and, in this case, the local authorities fully endorsed the proposal. For whatever reason, the local authorities have agreed to that proposal. Therefore, to that extent—

Mr. Lilley: Wrong.

Mr. Prescott: The local authorities agreed to the proposal. I accepted what the panel said about changes to the green-belt area because I felt that the transport corridor encouraged the movement of transport in an urban sense, rather than the pepperpot development that we have seen in rural areas. That is an important part of the environmental sustainability arguments. The previous Administration—in which the right hon. Gentleman was a major player—gave 500 hectares of green belt to a vehicle storage and distribution centre, corporate headquarters, automotive production and an airport runway.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his clear and concise statement and on the excellent choice of Lord Rogers to head the task force? Does he agree that, in order to achieve his aims, we must take a grip on the archaic, inflexible, expensive and bureaucratic planning system that he inherited from the previous Government?

Mr. Prescott: There has been considerable criticism of the planning framework—although I think that every hon. Member would agree that such a framework can play a useful role. We are reviewing the matter at present and taking account of the many criticisms that have been made. However, I believe that a planning framework is absolutely essential in this area.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that many people in the country, including Members of Parliament, believe that they have an absolute duty to protect the jewel of the British countryside? Once it is bulldozed, it can never be returned to us. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that, under his present plans, more than 2.5 million new people will go to live in the countryside in the next 10 to 12 years? Does he really believe that that is acceptable?

Mr. Prescott: Whether or not it is acceptable, it happened for 10 years under the previous Administration.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I welcome the principles contained in my right hon. Friend's statement. Many of my constituents will now feel hopeful that they may not have to move out of London in order to provide homes for their families. Is my right hon. Friend absolutely certain that we shall find ways of providing affordable housing in London and in our inner cities?

Mr. Prescott: That is a very important matter. Recent information has shown that many people are leaving London, and I believe that they would stay if certain parts of the city were more attractive places in which to live. Improved housing, reduced crime and a better education system are influential factors in determining whether people leave an area. Social housing is a crucial part of the equation, and my hon. Friend knows that we have discussed such development in London. I want to see mixed ownership and different forms of financing house purchase, which would allow for good mixed development in all areas.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): Although the right hon. Gentleman's decision to recycle more brown-field sites is, of course, good news, does he accept that a deep sense of injustice remains in West Sussex about the fact that, even after his statement, he still intends to press ahead with his futile case in the High Court? In the context of his statement, how can he justify overturning his own inspector's decision that West Sussex county council had an impeccable case and that West Sussex could not physically take any more new housing?

Mr. Prescott: I am not taking West Sussex county council to court; the county council is taking the Government to court—that is its decision. Secretaries of State of all Governments have constantly faced such decisions. As the hon. Gentleman says, the matter is before the courts, but I did not believe—I have given some of the reasons why—that a 25 per cent. cut in the total amount of housing for the area was acceptable. I believe that local parties should determine the figures more flexibly in a regional context. West Sussex is a good example of why we need a new system.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South–East): I am sure that my right hon. Friend realises that, while the previous Administration lined the pockets of their friends in the new house building industry, houses in areas such as I represent fell into dilapidation faster than we could improve them. Indeed, in Bolton in 1998, there are 5,000 to 6,000 irredeemably unfit homes. I welcome his statement, but please will he help us to carry out some clearance, so that these areas can be regenerated and people do not have to continue to live in these intolerable conditions?

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The fact that there are some 700,000 empty properties today is a major problem for us. [Interruption.] It is private and public sector housing. I am bound to say that it does not help if hon. Members shout out ideological comments about whether the authorities are Labour or Tory. The House, if it is concerned about homelessness, should be united in dealing with empty properties, regardless of whether they are private or public. We should address the fact that many of those properties are on brown-field sites. The Government are also considering the refurbishment of estates and have started some of the programmes. We are committed to bringing more resources into play—when they become available—to improve and refurbish our estates.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Whatever percentage is chosen for recycled land, there will be a substantial amount of development on green-field sites. Is not the key question how the right hon. Gentleman can ensure that priority is given to the development of recycled land? Did I understand him to say that he would consider further how that might be done? Will the outcome of such consideration be taken into account in the existing system of public examinations and structural plan reviews?

Mr. Prescott: Those are important questions; some of the answers may flow from the reviews that we are conducting. People have not properly addressed the question of the 75 per cent. figure. As the right hon. Gentleman suggests, 25 per cent.—or 1 million of the 4 million houses projected, which is an awful lot—will still have to be built on green-field sites. How we fit those houses into the green-field sites is debatable—both the Government and the previous Administration allowed the green belt to be cut for further housing—but we must address that difficult problem. The sequential test that I am introducing—which, as everyone should agree, is good common sense—already applies to out-of-town shopping centres. We should, therefore, be able to get a better idea of how much we can put on the brown-field sites before we deal with the green-field sites.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): My right hon. Friend's statement will be welcomed by my constituents, whether they live in rural or urban areas. Will he assure the House that he will consider giving local councils greater control over the density of housing to be built in an area, so that developers cannot ride roughshod over local people's wishes and build fewer homes in an area than were intended, thus putting more pressure on our green fields?

Mr. Prescott: That is indeed an important point. The guidance notes will have regard to density of housing.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I welcome what the Secretary of State has had to say, which is in marked contrast to the imperviousness of the previous Government when facing exactly the same arguments.

May I bring the right hon. Gentleman back to the county structure plans, which are key to the planning process in rural areas? Somerset, for example, is in the middle of the process. It has indicated that it does not believe in the figures that have been put forward and would like to see them revised downwards. The examination has been completed in public. Will Somerset be allowed to revisit the examination in public or to consider the Secretary of State's new policy in determining what to submit to Ministers in due course?

Mr. Prescott: I have made my statement. I have no doubt that the matters under discussion will be taken into account in all parts of the country. I am not able to comment on reviewing structure plans, because such issues may come before me. That being so, I cannot comment at this stage.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. May I say, however, that 60 per cent. is not a very ambitious target for the north-east, where many acres are capable of being recycled? There is a good case for stopping all or most green-field developments, to force developers and planners to come up with ways of civilising our inner cities.

I invite my right hon. Friend to Sunderland, where there are acres of listed Victorian properties that are sliding towards ruin. Attempts to refurbish them are undermined, because local authorities are granting planning permissions on green-field sites.

Mr. Prescott: I recall my hon. Friend asking me a similar question about Newcastle a short while ago. I checked things out, and it appears that 77 per cent. of new houses are being built on brown-field sites. That is even better than the targets that we have talked about this afternoon. That achievement cannot be held as a criticism against Newcastle.

It is—[Interruption.] There is an argument. I have said that at this stage 75 per cent. is too ambitious. It would be wrong to say that I believe that that percentage can be achieved. That would not be an honest approach. I think that 60 per cent. is possible, and that is the target that I have set the Government in 10 years' time. Within about 12 months, I shall make a statement on the review of brown-field sites, or recycled land, so that we can all make a judgment on the real possibilities. That is the proper approach.

We are talking about the provision of housing, and there is talk of council housing. The green-belt area in the north-east improved under the Durham county plan, involving about 15,000 hectares. That is a major extension of the green-belt area, and one of the reasons why we are doing so well.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): The right hon. Gentleman never mentioned the word "money" in his statement. What is his estimate of the additional costs of developing on used sites as opposed to unused sites? Is it his intention to direct additional resources to local government, the new regional development agencies or the apparently reprieved English Partnerships, to finance the bringing of land into a condition that is fit for development? Is this the death knell for the proposed new town between Ripon and Thirsk, in open countryside?

Mr. Prescott: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that I did not mention money in my statement. I mentioned more than £1 billion in regard to capital receipts, regeneration and estates renewal. If extra moneys are required—I well understand the argument that recycled land is much more expensive to build on than other land, and I have considerable sympathy for it—a judgment will have to be made at a later stage.

The sequential test will tell us how much money will be needed. I worry to some extent that extra pressure that is put on recycled land will have the effect of pushing up land prices. If owners are thinking about the target of 60 or 75 per cent., they may well feel, "Let's hang on to the land." If that is the position, local authorities and other bodies will find it difficult to afford recycled land on which to build.

That is one of the arguments of supply and demand. We must take account of those real problems, which have implications for public expenditure. I do not have sufficient information at present to make a judgment.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement. I am sure that he is aware that Labour Members have been engaged with this issue for a long time. I ask my right hon. Friend to accept that villages are prepared to accept development. However, when the local plan is for 25 houses, that is what they want to end up with. Is my right hon. Friend prepared to consider means to ensure that the planning process is able to deliver that sort of development and not a great deal more housing?

Mr. Prescott: The judgment on how many houses will be in villages or in urban areas is best left to the new framework that I am proposing. The more flexible approach allows all the different bodies to reach agreement and decide on the areas. Whether it is 25 houses for a village or 1,000 for an urban area, the judgment will be made in the local area. The flexibility that I am introducing will make the system more effective than the existing arrangements.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley): The house projection figures reflect social change over the years. Some of those changes are definitely desirable, but many would consider some to be undesirable. Will the Labour Government attempt to influence any of the undesirable ones?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman should be more specific about what he feels to be undesirable.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement, and in particular his reference to strengthening local responsibilities. Last year was the 50th anniversary of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947, and bringing responsibilities back to local areas is welcome. If he wants to develop a millennium village in West Yorkshire, I can offer him two sites. Horbury and the former mining village of Sharlston would make admirable sites for a millennium village.

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend has a long history of wishing to see the decentralisation of Government decisions, so I well understand why he welcomes the proposals that I announced today.

[Mr. Prescott]

As regards making a bid for a millennium village, my hon. Friend's is the second application that I have received. The first was Hull.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The Deputy Prime Minister mentioned the possibility of a tax on green-field sites, which was originally trailed some time ago. Will he confirm that if such a tax goes ahead, he will ensure that the proceeds from it are reinvested exclusively for the betterment of rural areas and will not be confiscated by the Chancellor for his own nefarious purposes?

Mr. Prescott: I did not hear the last part. It did not sound as if it was worth while anyway.

On taxation arrangements, the decision will be made at the appropriate time by the Chancellor.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): My right hon. Friend was far too generous to the previous Government when he described their policies as "predict and provide". They may have predicted, but they certainly did not provide affordable social housing. I hope that he will ask regional planning conferences to set specific targets on social housing.

With regard to town centres, I ask my right hon. Friend to look at some of the schemes that were successful but grossly underfunded, such as living above the shop, and whether we can put more effort and money into such schemes.

Mr. Prescott: We are looking at those matters. The judgments on social housing will be made by the local authorities with the regional planning conferences. We have a major part to play, with our housing programmes. My hon. Friend mentioned the "predict and provide" policies of the previous Administration. During their time in government, the Conservatives produced 1 million fewer houses than the average building programme of a decade earlier.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I am glad that the Deputy Prime Minister spoke about a living countryside and thriving communities in rural areas, but how does he reconcile that with the Government's apparent intention to use the current crisis in farming as a way to bring about a radical downsizing of employment in agriculture? Does he agree that if that downsizing occurs and if the crisis continues, we shall see a catastrophic decline in rural areas, and their economic viability will be pulled out from under them?

Mr. Prescott: I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says. There has been a massive change in the economic circumstances of rural areas, which is largely because of considerable changes in agriculture. The report that I mentioned shows the decline in essential services in rural areas. The solutions that we have put forward—to work with rural areas and to bring in regional development agencies—will play a major part in improving the situation in rural areas. It could not be worse than what happened under 18 years of Tory government.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I commend my right hon. Friend's statement, which will be regarded as enlightened by urban and rural communities, and thank him for his rational approach in the face of mischief making and misinformation. Will he assure me that under the new planning system, which will remove so much that was bad from the previous Government's system, parish and town councils will be able to estimate the housing needs and environmental capacity of the communities that they know so well?

Mr. Prescott: Under the new planning system, parish and town councils, while not making the decisions, will have greater influence through the regional conferences. Decisions will not be passed from top to bottom. Councils will be able to determine their own areas and decide, exercising greater flexibility, how they will be spread within the region.

Mr. James Paice (South–East Cambridgeshire): Does the Deputy Prime Minister accept that bragging about the size of the green belt is irrelevant and that what matters is where it is? Constantly removing green belt from the inside and expanding by greater percentages outside does not protect communities in the cities from sprawl or the countryside from development. Unless the green belt is inviolate, it fails in its principal purpose.

Mr. Prescott: It was not inviolate under the previous Administration. I can give the hon. Gentleman the figures, if he tables a parliamentary question. Previous Secretaries of State had to make balanced judgments. I do not criticise that. The green belt became an issue only because we were told that we were cutting it, and the record—[Interruption.] Every Government, including the previous one, built on green-belt areas. We have increased the green-belt area by more than 30,000 hectares in less than 10 months. That is a pretty good record.

The hon. Gentleman has a fair point, which Secretaries of State have to bear in mind when judging planning matters. I may allow house building on the edge of Stevenage's green belt, for example, and people may say that providing green belt elsewhere does not necessarily satisfy demand. I understand the point, but could be more sympathetic: people in urban areas, too, like green-field sites, but the Conservative Administration constantly sold such sites—school playing fields, for example—and were indifferent to green-belt considerations.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, because it signals a significant policy change. The previous Administration's planning approach was guided by a presumption in favour of development. Local authorities would refuse planning applications, only for decisions to be overturned on appeal and costs awarded against them. A more democratic approach to local decision making will allow the protection of green-field sites.

Mr. Prescott: How could I possibly disagree?

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): May I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's policy change on targeting recycled sites? I should be grateful if he enlightened me as to where that leaves Essex, which has already agreed in principle to an extra 85,000 homes. Will he shed light on these shadowy new organisations, regional planning conferences? Is he aware that he has changed his policy?

Will the conferences be accountable to the House or will they be in planning experts' limbo, and immune to accountability, which will allow the planners' cabal to proceed relatively unsupervised?

Mr. Prescott: As I said in my statement, the responsibilities of the Secretary of State have not changed.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am bringing this debate to a close. We shall no doubt return to these matters very soon.

Points of Order

4.29 pm

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I should like to correct a statistic that I gave the House two weeks ago. When I introduced the Acquisition and Possession of Air Weapons (Restriction) Bill, I said that 7,000 police officers had been injured and one had been killed by airguns in recent years. It turns out that that was the number of injuries sustained by the general public, whereas I interpreted it as injuries sustained by the police. I want to correct that. I am appreciative of the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), who drew the error to my attention. I apologise for unintentionally misinforming the House.

Madam Speaker: The House is grateful to the hon. Member.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to raise an issue relating to the Committee stage of the Scotland Bill, which we are about to commence.

Madam Speaker: Can the point of order wait for the Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means, who is in charge of the Committee stage and has the authority to deal with the hon. Member's point?

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You have been very generous with statements, private notice questions and points of order on Iraq. Have you had any request from the Attorney-General to make a statement on whether Her Majesty's Government are trying to build into a new Security Council resolution the authority, based on international law, for military action to be taken against Iraq in the event of a further breach of agreement? If so, that is, by implication, a recognition of the fact that any military action by the United States is illegal under international law. Have you received any such request from the Attorney-General, to whom I have spoken personally?

Madam Speaker: I have received no such request from the Attorney-General or from any other source on that matter.

Orders of the Day

Scotland Bill

[5TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Considered in Committee [Progress, 12 February].

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

4.31 pm

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): On a point of order, Mr. Lord. I should like to draw your attention to a press announcement by the Scottish Office this afternoon. It announced a consultation paper on the details of the Scottish Parliament's tax-varying powers, which are the subject of our discussions. I called at the Vote Office at 4.15 pm to try to obtain a copy of that document, but it was not available. That is unusual, as it contains an interpretation of the contents of the clauses before us today, to which hon. Members have tabled amendments.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): I understand that the Minister would like to respond to that point.

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): Copies of that documents can be obtained in the House of Commons Library, and I apologise for any inconvenience.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. I was unaware of this difficulty until the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr Swinney) made his point of order. If the press have been informed, would it not have been a simple courtesy to send a fax message to hon. Members who are known to have an interest in these matters?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that the Minister has made the matter clear.

POWER TO FIX BASIC RATE FOR SCOTTISH TAXPAYERS

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I beg to move amendment No. 352, in page 29, line 7, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 353, in page 29, line 16, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 354, in page 29, line 19, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 355, in page 29, line 20, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 358, in clause 70, page 29, line 36, leave out 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 359, in page 29, line 39, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 360, in page 29, line 43, leave out 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 361, in page 30, line 5, leave out 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 362, in page 30, line 13, after first 'the', insert 'income'.

No. 363, in page 30, line 16, leave out second 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 364, in page 30, line 26, leave out second 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 365, in page 30, line 27, leave out 'a' and insert 'an income'.

No. 369, in clause 71, page 30, line 31, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 383, in clause 72, page 31, line 36, after 'Parliament's', insert 'income'.

No. 386, in page 31, line 42, after 'Parliament's', insert 'income'.

No. 391, in page 32, line 14, after 'Parliament's', insert 'income'.

No. 394, in page 32, line 19, after 'Parliament's', insert 'income'.

No. 395, in page 32, line 21, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

No. 398, in clause 73, page 32, line 33, after 'Scottish', insert 'income'.

Mr. Ancram: Let me say first, with reference to the points of order, that I find it extraordinary that we should be told at the beginning of the debate that there are papers in the Library about which we have had no notification, the understanding being that we should sit at the Library door waiting to see what papers go in, lest any should be relevant to the debate. It is a disappointing start, and I hope that if there are any relevant issues in the paper—which I hope one of my hon. Friends has now gone to the Library to secure for me—the Minister will take the opportunity to highlight them, so that we can discuss them today.

The amendments comprise the first of a number of groups that we shall debate today relating to part IV of the Bill. They deal with the tax-varying powers of the Scottish Parliament. Having read this part of the Bill a number of times since its publication, I consider it the most confused piece of legislation that I recall reading in a long time. It is muddled, it is obscure and it is a cause of uncertainty—and, therefore, a cause of concern—about a matter that is very important to many people in Scotland.

I was surprised at what appears to be a general lack of interest among the other parties in a matter that was, after all, a central part of the referendum debate. I see from the amendment paper that the Liberal Democrats have tabled only one amendment to part IV, although they were never backward in coming forward to table amendments on the other parts. The Scottish National party has tabled eight amendments. That suggests that, having secured endorsement through the ballot box for the power to vary, those parties are now anxious to push on to the back burner the fact that the Scottish Parliament will almost certainly mean higher taxes for people living north of the border.

I appreciate that the vote on 11 September settled the issue of whether there would be a tax-varying power, and we accept that the Scottish people wish the Parliament to have the limited tax-raising power to which the Government referred in the White Paper. However, that cannot mean that the whole issue can now be swept under the carpet, in the hope that, in the run-up to the first elections to the Parliament, the electors of Scotland will not be aware of the potential effect on them. The issue will be of major importance when we come to the elections, and I hope that we can debate in detail today some of the uncertainties and concerns that have been voiced by people all over Scotland about this part of the Bill.

It is essential to ensure that the legislation delivers a power that is no more and no less than what was endorsed in the referendum. As we all understood it, that was the marginal power to vary the standard rate of income tax up or down by a maximum of 3p—and nothing else. That is the question which I understood to have been put to the Scottish people, and they endorsed it. In the amendments, we seek to achieve such a position, and to do so in a way that is beyond peradventure.

The amendments stem from a genuine suspicion that somewhere in the tangled legislative undergrowth are hidden taxation powers about which the people of Scotland were not told and do not know. The Minister shakes his head; as the debate progresses, we shall see whether he can give us the assurances that he and his colleagues have so far distinctly failed to give us. I must tell him that our suspicion is not without cause. During our debates on the Bill that became the Referendums (Scotland and Wales) Act 1997, in the summer of last year, we sought—unsuccessfully here, but successfully in the other place—to insert the word "income" before the word "tax" to make it clear beyond doubt that the power to vary would be limited to income tax alone.

We were given bland answers by the Minister—bland answers which I fear may yet return to haunt him. When we tried to insert the word "income", he said:

> "If we are to add the word 'income', why not also include the 3p in the pound limit or a definition of who should pay the tax?"—[Official Report, 30 July 1997; Vol. 299, c. 409.]

That was his reason for not inserting the word "income". However, the 3p in the pound limit is in the Bill, along with a rather unsuccessful attempt to define who should pay the tax. We have a right to be suspicious.

Mr. McLeish: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall finish the point and then give way to the Minister.

We were met with a blanket refusal to accept the amendment, and an amendment from the other place was overturned here. So firm was the Government's opposition that it could be justified in logic only by the belief that there was a need to keep open the option to vary other taxes or introduce new ones. When the matter went back to the other place, Lord Sewel, the Minister responsible for the issue there, gave the reason for the word "income" not being in the Bill. He said:

> "To add the word 'income' would create a false sense of precision, because it is limited."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 31 July 1997; Vol. 582, c. 319.]

Presumably that means that the definition that "income" would have given to the power was limited in a way that the Government found unacceptable because it would have conferred a false sense of precision. That gives rise to the suspicion, not only in my mind but in the minds of many people in Scotland, that there is something behind this.

Mr. McLeish: The only suspicion lurks in the right hon. Gentleman's mind. There are two issues. First, the referendum on 11 September contained two parts. The first related to the wording of the ballot paper, and the second was the reference to the White Paper. The two taken together meant that it was unequivocal in the sense that it was income tax. Secondly, clause 69(1) refers to "income tax" and the clause heading is

"Power to fix basic rate for Scottish taxpayers".

The word "income" is before the word "tax". Some 19 amendments have been tabled to make a point that is included in the second line of clause 69.

Mr. Ancram: I have carefully read the Bill. Clause 69(1) refers merely to the section applying for any year of assessment for which income tax is charged. If the Minister is right and that means that every other reference to tax means income tax, he will have no difficulty accepting my amendment.

Mr. Wallace: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way in a moment. I want to return to this issue. I shall certainly give way to the Minister if he can explain what his noble Friend meant when he said that to add the word "income" would create a "false sense of precision". Those words were either meaningless or they meant that there was some limitation that the Government could not accept.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman has said that he has looked carefully at the relevant part of the Bill. The Minister spoke about clause 69(1). There is a reference to the "Income Tax Acts" in clause 69(2). To what other taxes could the measure apply if the word "income" were not included? The Minister also spoke about 19 amendments being tabled, but that is easy to do when only one word is starred. What other taxes has the right hon. Gentleman identified?

Mr. Ancram: It is not a question of taxes that I have identified.

Mr. McLeish: Answer the question.

Mr. Ancram: Perhaps the Minister would allow me to make my speech in my own way. He is not a great example of how to answer questions. I think that we have had only one answer from him in about six months.

We have tabled the amendments so that we may be reassured that no taxes other than income tax are involved. I do not want to pre-empt a later debate on the guarantee in the White Paper about the £450 million that 3p could raise and how that would be achieved regardless of what happens to the tax base. Apparently that is outwith the 3p that is mentioned in the Bill.

What form of tax will be used to raise that money? I hope that we shall get an answer to that, because I have been asking about it for a long time. I seek answers because the Scottish people and Scottish business in particular require reassurance on this matter and I have not yet received it.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): In pressing the Minister on the issue, my right hon. Friend quoted from the speech by Lord Sewel. Does he share my concern that, later in his speech, Lord Sewel spoke about what is and what is not covered in terms of savings and dividends? Does that not increase the suspicion not only of Opposition Members but of the business community and people in Scotland?

4.45 pm

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. The whole of Lord Sewel's response suggested that more than income tax was at issue. He went on to raise other hares which are still running, and the simplest way to put those hares to rest is to accept our amendments. We seek to ensure that, under the legislation, no tax other than income tax can be at issue, and that, without further primary legislation, and, indeed, probably further endorsement by referendum, no other taxes can be brought into play and no new taxes can be introduced. That was the understanding from the White Paper, and we seek reassurance on that.

We are concerned that the Bill contains no provision to exclude other taxes. Clause 72(3) confines changes to the tax powers to income tax when the Treasury has altered the United Kingdom's tax system. It does not prevent extra taxes from being levied if 3p does not raise the sum to which I referred; nor does it prevent the Scottish Parliament from raising additional revenue indirectly through new local taxes.

Some other taxes have been openly canvassed by various interests, and all of them are possible. A tourist tax has been suggested, and there has been talk of a local sales tax. Scottish business has been alarmed by rumours that the unified business rate might be reconstituted, thus placing an even higher burden on that sensitive and vital sector.

This matter is not an academic concern which can be brushed aside with talk of agreements and understandings. Future prosperity under a Scottish Parliament will depend largely on the performance of the Scottish economy and the confidence of Scotland's business sector. The greatest enemy of business confidence is uncertainty, and the greatest cause of uncertainty is the possibility of sudden tax changes or tax rises. That is bad for inward investment, for enterprise and for jobs.

There could be no more damaging background to the Scottish economy than for it to be thought of as a prospectively high-tax economy. That would not only be damaging in the borders, where great anomalies would immediately be created, but would affect the cost structure of Scottish business, which would damage competitiveness and undermine our ability to export. It would threaten to penalise people for working and living in Scotland, and would drive expertise and jobs southwards.

The amendments are important because they replace uncertainty with certainty, and create confidence where, at the moment, there is a distinct lack of it. Their acceptance can make it clear that what was said during the referendum is still true and that Scotland is not about to become the high-tax centre of Europe.

All our amendments to part IV of the Bill are essentially designed to clarify the legislation and remove uncertainty, and we shall argue them in detail. They were tabled because of what clause 69 does, but also because of what it fails to do. It does not, in terms, exclude forms of direct taxation other than income tax. In the light of the White Paper, the £450 million that is guaranteed to the Scottish Parliament from the 3p—which is index linked against possible changes to the income tax structure or variations of the tax base as a result of changing economic conditions which could reduce the tax take—raises the almost certain possibility of some form of taxation other than the standard rate of income tax. We need an answer on that today. Indeed, the Government effectively admitted as much when, during the referendum campaign, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, a Scottish Member, let slip on television that they would have to find a substitute—that was his word, I think—if those circumstances arose.

The people of Scotland and, indeed, Scottish Members have a right to know what that substitute will be. We will deal with the question in detail under later amendments, but the principle behind it is germane to this clause and to these amendments. Restricting the clause's power to levy tax to income tax, as the White Paper did, but the Bill fails to do, will go a long way to achieving that.

The Minister said that I was creating suspicions. He knows that the uncertainty about which I am talking is not exclusive to members of my party. That uncertainty is real. It exists throughout Scotland. The Government themselves had to reassure the Scottish Confederation of British Industry directly in a meeting some time ago—I think at the end of last month—and again last week during Scottish Question Time, that this provision will have no knock-on effect on capital gains tax.

If the provision is so clear, why did the CBI, with all its expertise, say to the Minister, "Please ensure that this does not have a knock-on effect on capital gains tax"? Why was the Minister required to give that assurance? Why cannot the matter be cleared up by having the simple expedient of our amendments? Business men cannot find reassurance in the Bill. We want to give it to them, and I cannot understand why the Government wish to resist that.

There are vicarious ways by which the Scottish Parliament could raise tax, but which, again, are not spelt out in the White Paper. We know that the Parliament will redistribute revenue support grant and will have the power to alter the business rate. We know, too, that, by withholding central resources, it could effectively force local government to raise tax for the Parliament, allowing itself the spending benefit of the resources retained in pushing local government to raise local taxes.

The Scottish business community's greatest fear about the Scottish Parliament is still the abolition of the uniform business rate and the return to the previous situation, whereby councils set business rates and Jenner's in Princes street paid more in business rates than Harrods in Knightsbridge. Those are genuine uncertainties and worries, which the Government have a duty to resolve.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I had the opportunity today of reading the Government's press release dealing with capital gains tax. It makes it clear that the tax on capital gains is computed by reference to income tax rates, but that the Government have chosen not to treat capital gains tax as taxable under the Scottish variable rate scheme. Is it not true that if this is simply a Government administrative decision in relation to that form of taxation, it can be equally easily administratively changed, unless they clarify the position?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. That is another reason why Scotland's businesses are uncertain, doubtful, worried and not taking investment decisions until they have clarification. The ambiguity of language appears time and again from the Minister, Lord Sewel and Government press releases. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to clarify the issue and to create confidence where, at the moment, there is doubt.

The Government fought the referendum proclaiming that business in Scotland had nothing to fear from devolution. Indeed, the White Paper was clear in its desire to exclude business from a punitive tax regime, but there is nothing in the Bill to rule that out. That is where the fear of the business community lies.

It is not a good enough answer to say that the Government in a Scottish Parliament would not be so unwise as to introduce such taxes. Last July, this Government taxed pensions and, as we saw in last week's Scottish revenue support grant debate, the Secretary of State for Scotland is, Uriah-Heep like, wringing his hands at the consequences of that tax.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to non-domestic rates, as he did during the referendum. What I have never understood is how they would be any more secure under the current system, whereby Westminster continues to run them—particularly when Labour has a majority of 179 and said in its manifesto that it would return those rates to local government—than they would be if we put in the sort of safeguards that he seeks. In any case, no party in the Scottish Parliament is likely to have an overall majority, so any change to business rates would require considerable consensus throughout the political spectrum.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. and learned Gentleman loves to talk about consensus, but if I were to base my business decisions on the hope that there would be political consensus—or a lack of it, as the case may be—my shareholders might ask whether I was taking those decisions on a correct basis. If we have a doubt, surely it is right that that doubt is answered in this legislation. What is the point of having legislation, which does create limitations and safeguards, if we do not use it to create those necessary areas of confidence?

It is the failure to do that and to rule out vicarious tax raising which has given rise to fears of other taxes. I think it was the president of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities who proposed a tourist tax. It is hardly surprising, therefore, when people in Scotland, not least those in the tourist industry, sit up. A local sales tax strikes dread into the hearts of retailers and consumers alike, not least in the borders, where people would be most importuned by it.

Whether the Government like it or not, the picture of paying for devolution over and beyond the 3p exists and serves Scotland ill. Our amendments would cure that simply by ruling those fears out once and for all, and by establishing in statute that, rather than just in the mouth of the Secretary of State and his colleagues, the restriction on the standard income tax rate that was presaged in the White Paper and on which the Scottish people voted is genuine and is in the legislation. The amendments seek to shine light on the darker recesses of this part of the Bill. They are constructive and I commend them to the Committee.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This is a complex and difficult matter. Like my hon. Friend the Minister, I have served in opposition and, indeed, in government on Finance Bills. I do not make a party point, but if we see in action these very able and clever tax accountants—including my noble Friend Lord Barnett and the Opposition spokesman's colleague Peter Rees, now Lord Rees, a former Member for Dover—one has to ensure that legislation is crystal clear; otherwise, they will run amok and that would be to no one's benefit, including Holyrood.

Therefore, I should like to ask certain questions. What additional taxes can be raised by the Parliament over and above the specified income tax power—I should like the Minister to answer that question in his winding-up speech—particularly where the Treasury restricts the amount of additional revenue that is available to the Scottish Parliament as a result of possible future changes in the United Kingdom tax structure?

I hope that Ministers will take into account what the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, said about uncertainty and the lack of clarity, because, bluntly, unless these matters are cleared up before the Bill becomes law, business and individual taxpayers will be condemned to perpetual uncertainty. Nowhere is that more important than in relation to the uniform business rate.

My second question concerns the life companies, where many of my constituents work, as do those of Edinburgh Members. As I understand it, the life companies that pay pensions are in the dark about some of their responsibilities. Are they to make payments and to charge on the basis of a whole year or just time spent in Scotland, and what effect will that have on the Scottish rate? If an English taxpayer moves to Scotland, will the adjustments have to be made by the pension companies and the life offices, or will it be the responsibility of the Inland Revenue?

Under clause 69(3), if a widow received the life rent of her husband's estate, she would not have to pay Scottish tax on the savings income of the trust. However, if that same widow received an annuity from the trust, she would have to pay Scottish tax, would she not? If I am wrong, doubtless I shall be told so; if I am right, is it fair?

Again in respect of clause 69, will payments to charity be under a Scottish or a United Kingdom rate? The Bill defines a Scottish taxpayer as someone who, in any tax year, is resident in the United Kingdom, and

"Scotland is the part of the United Kingdom with which he has the closest connection".

That description appears in a number of clauses. However, generally speaking, "the closest connection"—[Interruption.] It is no good my hon. Friends getting impatient. We are dealing with matters of great importance to the lawyers' firms that will have to operate the system. This is the Committee stage of the Bill—[Interruption.] I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) that if these matters are not clarified there will be endless trouble and difficulties later. It is for the benefit of all of us that they are clarified as soon as possible.

Generally speaking, will "the closest connection" be interpreted as someone who has his principal home in Scotland and spends more of the year in Scotland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom? Will there be separate provision for Members of the Scottish, Westminster and European Parliaments? What will be the status of the time spent at those institutions by Scottish Members? That point should be clarified.

My understanding is that the price of property in Berwick would rise dramatically because people would live on the English side of the border to avoid tax, but work in Scotland. It is said that the Inland Revenue often forces people claiming to be resident outside the UK for tax purposes to produce proof of travel. That would be more difficult if a land border had to be policed. There would be no way properly to monitor the border—we would have to rely on people's integrity. I do not know whether that point is more properly raised under the amendment or on clause stand part, but it certainly arises under clause 69.

Following the introduction of income tax self-assessment, the possibility of tax avoidance by claiming not to be a Scottish resident could affect many tens of thousands of people. A limit on the level of tax would mean that, in practice, there was too little incentive to make avoidance worth while. If the maximum bill was £660, someone would have to be a little penny pinching to object. However, lawyers know that these matters can be cumulative.

The Bill limits the amount of Scottish tax that anyone will pay by confining it to a premium of up to 3p in the pound on only basic rate tax. That means that higher-rate taxpayers will pay only an additional 3 per cent. on income up to the point at which the top rate of tax, 40 per cent., starts to operate. Thus, on current rates, the maximum liability would be £660 a year. Scottish Office calculations show that the average Bill for about two thirds of those expected to be liable would be £230. Does the Scottish Office believe that those figures are roughly accurate?

There are many other things to be said, but, as we are time limited, I shall leave the matter there.

Mr. Wallace: I am sure that you will keep me in order, Mr. Lord. I want to raise points about the details of charges and the definition of "taxpayers", but it may be more appropriate to do so when we reach the amendments dealing with those matters—

Mr. Dalyell: If we ever reach them.

Mr. Wallace: I have just received my timetable; I am sure that the amendments will be reached.

I intend to confine my remarks at this stage to the more political points made by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). My Liberal Democrat colleagues and I argued in the Scottish Constitutional Convention for tax-varying powers—and they were agreed to as part of the convention's package. We thought it to be a very important issue. It is one of the more significant changes from the 1979 referendum and the 1978 legislation.

It is interesting to recall that one of the criticisms made by the Conservative party in 1978-79 was that a Scottish Parliament would not have tax-varying powers and therefore would be a toothless tiger and unaccountable. When we tried to address that problem, the Conservative party changed its tune and raised all sorts of fears and scares. The right hon. Member for Devizes said that it is the Government's duty to dispel all the myths and scares, but it was his colleagues—more than any others—who went around Scotland stirring them up in the first place.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) accurately pointed out that the 3p variation would apply only to the basic rate tax band. Some people put it about that it would apply to all income—so that if someone were earning £200,000 a year, the variation would apply to all of that £200,000. Some amazing figures were produced on that basis.

It is fundamental that the Scottish Parliament should have a tax-varying power. After all, taxation makes an elected body accountable to its electorate. The fear—which was actually well expressed by some Conservatives at the last referendum—is that, if there is not some scope for tax variation, every time a project is frustrated—be it a hospital, school or pedestrian crossing—people will blame Westminster for not allowing us more money. That would then fuel friction.

In fact, the Scottish Parliament will have a tax-varying power. If it chooses not to exercise it, it will be as answerable to its electorate as it will be if it chooses to exercise it at the rate of 1p, 2p or 3p. That is why it is as much an issue of democracy as it is of taxation.

The right hon. Member for Devizes has tabled many amendments to add the word, "income", but when I challenged him he was unable to name one other tax that could fall within the definition of this part of the Bill—

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Wallace: If the right hon. Gentleman has found one in the meantime, I shall happily give way.

Mr. Ancram: I want to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman a question, as he asked one of me. If the tax-varying power is restricted to 3p, and if the tax base does not achieve the necessary £450 million, where will the Government find the extra tax?

Mr. Wallace: We shall deal with that question when we come to the appropriate part of the Bill. I have never understood the position to be anything other than using the income tax mechanism. When we have all had an opportunity to read the consultation document that has been placed in the Library, more light may be shed on the matter. It has never been claimed that anything other than the income tax mechanism would be used.

We heard again today that the great danger of having a separate rate for Scotland, which would lead to great differences between Scotland and England, would be that people flocked across the border to set up home in England. If the relative rate of taxation were so vital in choosing where to live or work, why do not people flock to Shetland, which has the lowest council tax in Scotland? [Interruption.] I accept that there are many reasons why people choose a particular place to live or to locate a business.

The Conservative Government introduced banding in council tax. In 1996—the latest year for which I have figures—the occupant of a £85,000 house in Scotland would have paid, on average, £8 a week more than the occupant of a similarly valued house in England. I have looked at the relative differences between Dumfries and Galloway, and Cumbria. The occupant of a £50,000 house in Dumfries pays substantially more council tax than the occupant of a similarly valued house only 30 miles away in Carlisle, yet we have not seen removal vans trundling across the border because people want to relocate. There is more behind people's decisions on where to live than the myths and scares that we have heard from the Conservatives during the referendum campaign and since.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose—

Mr. Wallace: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has a constituency near the border.

Mr. Home Robertson: My constituency is not near the border, but my home is. I confirm that there is no sign of people flocking across the border. The good citizens of the Scottish Borders region voted both for the establishment of a Scottish Parliament and—along with almost every other region of Scotland—for the tax-varying powers. I do not understand what the fuss is about.

Mr. Wallace: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The islands area of my home and the region of my birth were the two places that did not vote for the tax-varying powers, but, considering the negative approach to the Scottish Parliament in 1979, which was our starting point, we were not far away. All Members of the Scottish Parliament will have to exercise those powers sensitively, if they exercise them at all. The no vote to tax-varying powers in some areas and the fact that the yes vote was only marginally over 50 per cent. in some others should remind Scottish parliamentarians that the powers should be used sensitively.

The powers in the Bill do not justify the scares that we have heard today. If businesses are confused, the fault cannot lie with those of us who have been arguing the case for those powers since the Scottish Constitutional Convention reached its agreement in November 1995. The Conservatives are seeking to create further confusion today. If these unnecessary amendments are defeated or withdrawn, no doubt they will conjure up other mythical creatures that are about to do down the Scottish business community. That is not the intention of those of us who agreed the powers in the convention. The most important point is that we want the Scottish Parliament to work. We want Scotland to prosper and flourish. No one wants to put unnecessary blocks in the way of prosperity in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Why is the hon. and learned Gentleman not prepared to accept our amendments, which would merely put the word "income" in front of the word "tax"? That is apparently what he wants.

Mr. Wallace: Because they are superfluous and are designed to make a political point, continuing the case that the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends lost so decisively on 11 September.

Mr. Swinney: The Government have got themselves into difficulties over the technicalities of the tax-varying powers. I have already referred to the difficulties over the availability of the consultation paper on aspects of the tax-varying powers. I was intrigued by the Government's press statement on that. It said that the Government were publishing the technical paper

"to inform taxpayers of the Government's intention, to assist Parliament as it continues its scrutiny of the Scotland Bill and to seek views from those with an interest in the operation of the new tax system on how detailed aspects of the new arrangement might best be handled."

It is strange that the Government publish a document

"to assist Parliament as it continues its scrutiny of the Scotland Bill" on the day that we are considering the relevant amendments. None of us has had a chance to read the document. My hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) went to the Library earlier this afternoon to obtain a copy, at the Minister's suggestion. A bewildered librarian tried to find the paper. Two copies were found, both of which had been sent to the Library for information and reference only. It is unsatisfactory that the Government's announcement has put such a question mark over the tax-varying powers.

I have tabled amendments to clause 71 on the definition of Scottish taxpayers. When I came to London this morning, I was excited by one newspaper comment, which I thought showed a great reflection by the Government on some of the aspects of the proposals before us. The Daily Mail said:

"The Government appeared to bow to ferocious criticism of its tartan tax plans last night by saying that it would be willing to rethink certain key areas."

None of us expected such a rethink to be tabled in the House of Commons Library this afternoon.

Talk of movement on such issues is welcome. I hope that the Minister will have something positive to say about the substantial issues that we have raised on clause 71. However, I do not want to talk about those amendments yet. I want to concentrate on the proposals of the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). I shall not be surprised if the Minister is not positive about those amendments. I suspect from his body language that he will not be. The Secretary of State may have had the right hon. Member for Devizes in his sights when he made his speech about destabilisation on Saturday evening. The further litany of scaremongering that the right hon. Member for Devizes has put forward, to compound what he said during the referendum campaign, will probably destabilise the Scottish Parliament and the parliamentary passage of the Bill more than anything else.

The evidence of the debate so far is that the Tories have failed to learn the lessons of the general election or the referendum. The people of Scotland gave clear assent to the tax-varying powers. It is incumbent on us to reflect the views expressed in that referendum. That does not prevent us from bringing forward constructive amendments designed to help the passage of the Bill and enhance the clarity of its details. That is what we want to do in clause 71.

5.15 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if the practical effect of the Bill, particularly the contradictions inherent between clause 69 and subsequent clauses, resulted in an increase of more than 3p in the basic rate, the Scottish voters would feel that they had been conned in the referendum?

Mr. Swinney: My reading of clause 69 is that the Parliament will have the power to vary tax by 3p. If that does not add up to £450 million—I suspect that that is what the hon. Gentleman is getting at—it will be tough on the Scottish Parliament. The Government tried to produce an illustrative figure in the White Paper of what the tax might raise. That is for the Government to answer, not me. I have enough numbers to defend without defending the Government's.

The official Opposition cannot grasp two main points. First, the power to raise at least part of its finances is a basic requirement of any Parliament. Secondly, the people of Scotland still have discretion on how the powers should be used. The referendum was a vote not to put up taxes but to give the Parliament the power to put up taxes or reduce them. If the careful-budgeting, money-conscious Conservative party is about to re-emerge in Scotland, able to exercise financial prudence, as it did when doubling the national debt in the past few years, we shall be intrigued to discover what it will offer the Scottish people in a general election. The people of Scotland have a choice on whether the powers are exercised.

Dr. Fox: The hon. Gentleman says that if the 3p does not raise £450 million, it is tough for the Scottish Parliament. The White Paper explicitly says:

"the Parliament's ability to raise or forgo up to £450 million through the tax system will be preserved. This sum will be index linked to maintain its real value."

Mr. Swinney: The Government can reconcile their calculations between 3p in the pound and £450 million. My reading of the clause is that the Parliament will have the right to vary the basic rate of income tax by 3p in the pound. That is for the Government to defend.

The Committee will not be surprised to hear that, unlike the Conservatives, I believe that the Scottish Parliament should have wider tax-varying powers. Quebec and the Spanish autonomous regions have far more extensive tax powers which can be used not only to raise a few million pounds here and there but fundamentally to alter the economies of those areas. The Quebec and Catalonia Parliaments can raise around 40 per cent. of their finance. By contrast, Scottish local government can raise a mere 15 per cent. of its own finance. The Scottish Parliament is being given the opportunity separately to raise about 3 per cent. of its taxation and, in the context of the examples that I have just cited, the powers being suggested by the Government are very restrictive.

The Tories are keen to restrict the tax role of the Parliament. I certainly have problems with the extent of its tax powers, because they do not give the Parliament the opportunity to take some of the more imaginative decisions that would be required to improve the Scottish economy and deliver a fair tax system that is more in the interests of the people of Scotland. Nor will the powers generate much flexibility. Some of the interesting examples of varying taxation, whether in the form of lower business rates, tax incentives for entrepreneurs, tax breaks for those on low incomes or adjustments in allowances to protect people who are persistently hammered by the tax system in this country, are all opportunities that are lost by the limited nature of the powers. Therefore, the Conservatives are making a mountain out of a molehill in relation as to the substance and significance of the powers.

The tone of the Conservatives' amendments is that the Parliament's powers should be fixed in stone. They are very limiting and Westminster-focused amendments, which will simply entrench some of the rhetoric that we have heard all too often from the Conservatives. They put Scotland second and demonstrate beyond doubt that the Tories do not trust the people of Scotland to be imaginative and responsible in the use of those powers. There is a democratic issue at stake—if the people of Scotland wish to use the powers, they will vote for those who are prepared to use them. A separate election contest will determine that point.

Clearly, the Government are going to defend staunchly the 3p in the pound power. I have mentioned some of the limitations, but another that I find quite frustrating is that the power will have a disproportionate effect on middle-income earners. For someone earning about £19,000, the application of the full 3p in the pound increase will account for about 10 per cent. of his tax bill. For someone earning £100,000, it will account for only 2 per cent. of his tax bill. Again, middle-income earners will be disproportionately hit by potential tax increases while people earning a phenomenal sum of money will benefit from a tax system that has lost its progression and equity.

If the Government were to surprise us all later tonight by saying that part of the current consultation exercise is a proposal to give the Parliament the power to abolish the ceiling on employees' national insurance contributions, I should not be able to get into the Lobby fast enough. It would bring some equity back into the tax system, but I suspect that I am allowing my optimism to run away with me.

The Scottish National party has argued for fiscal autonomy, for the Parliament to have more responsibility for its financing, but the Committee rejected our arguments at an earlier stage. Given that the Government now have some doubts about the application of the tax-varying powers, and that what looks like a hurried consultation paper has been typed up in the past few days to be issued in advance of this debate, I think that we shall have to return to those arguments on Report because some of the substance of the powers and the details of the financing of the Parliament are clearly not as securely founded as we should have liked. My colleagues and I shall examine the details of the tax powers extremely carefully to ensure that some of our arguments on fiscal autonomy are redeployed on Report.

Mr. Hawkins: I shall be brief, but I wish first to take up one point made by the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney)—the extraordinary situation in which we have found ourselves this afternoon.

A paper has been rushed out, but hon. Members have not had access to it. The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution has been good enough to apologise to hon. Members, so I shall not blame him personally, but this is yet another example of a certain combination that we have witnessed all too often from Government Departments—the combination of arrogance and incompetence. Arrogance leads to paperwork appearing only on the day of the debate to which it is relevant, so that we do not have the opportunity to study it, and incompetence leads to it not being available in the Library when the Minister thinks that it is. Hon. Members are having to rush out of a debate on taxation matters, which are of great interest to the Scottish people. I hope that the Minister will give us an undertaking that we shall never again have to put up with official Government papers coming out on the very afternoon of the debate. It is simply not good enough.

The debate began with the Minister, and, indeed, the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), suggesting that there is nothing to worry about, and that the Conservatives' amendments are not necessary. However, we have just heard about the Scottish National party's plans from the hon. Member for North Tayside. He said that it has always been the SNP's position that, the minute that it had the chance to change things, it would rather have much wider powers to vary taxes. That is precisely what the Conservative party and many Scottish people are worried about.

In May last year, Sir Donald Pattullo, Governor of the Bank of Scotland, was expressing concern—

Mr. Swinney: On a point of information, the gentleman is in fact Sir Bruce Pattullo.

Mr. Hawkins: Of course, I meant Sir Bruce Pattullo. The concern that he was raising about the possible need for a sales tax, and the plans of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities for a tourist tax, which is of great concern to the people in the tourism industry with whom I have worked over the years, are signs of why we are rightly suspicious about the fact that this part of the Bill is entitled not "The Income Tax-Varying Power" but simply "The Tax-Varying Power".

The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland suggested that there was something inconsistent in the tabling of our amendments today by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and our original opposition to tax-varying powers, but that is not the case. There is no inconsistency. We were against the Scottish Parliament having tax-varying powers; now that it is to be given those powers, we want them to be as limited as possible, and we want them clarified.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) also said that the inconsistency went back to the Conservatives' previous incarnation, when they were extremely critical of another Bill relating to Scotland for providing no tax-varying powers.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman is right—the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland made that point as well, but he also said specifically that there was some inconsistency in our opposition to tax-varying powers in the referendum campaign and our amendments today. My point is that our position has been entirely consistent.

We want to ensure that the powers are as limited as possible. I am sure that that is what the Scottish people want, too. They do not want a Pandora's box open for future development by people such as the hon. Member for North Tayside and his colleagues. We want to ensure that the powers clearly relate only to income tax.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Will the hon. Gentleman concede that, if the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and his colleagues were in a position to influence matters on their own, Scotland would at that stage be independent, so his argument would be redundant?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the fact that our concern about the Bill and the whole process is that the Government are leading us down the slippery slope towards complete independence and the break-up of the United Kingdom. That is my party's fundamental objection to what the Government are doing. Our amendments draw attention to the vagueness of the Bill. There are great dangers unless the amendments, which limit and clarify the powers, are accepted.

I want to draw the Committee's attention to some of the concerns about the tax proposals that were outlined in an article in The Independent on 8 January last year. The particularly appropriate headline, in the context of this debate, was "Tax Shocks for Jocks". The article highlighted the comparisons that the Labour party was then seeking to make, and the fact that it was saying that there was nothing to worry about, that there could be differential rates of tax between Scotland and England and that it would be just like the United States. The article also pointed out:

"The new Labour Scottish tax would be working against the framework of there being a tax haven next door."

Accountants, business men and the Governor of the Bank of Scotland have expressed concern about the plans of the Scottish National party and the Labour-dominated Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. Unless the Government accept the Conservative amendments, there will be no clarity at all.

5.30 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Why are the Government afraid to accept our perfectly reasonable amendments that would insert the word "income" in front of the word "tax" at various points in the Bill? If, as the Government have consistently said, they have no intention of varying any other tax, what is wrong with accepting the amendments? They would add only clarity to the Bill. They would not take anything away from the Bill. If it is truly the Government's intention that only income tax would be affected—as they said in the White Paper and told the Scottish people before the referendum—why do they oppose the amendments?

Is it not time that the Scottish people knew with clarity what they voted for in the referendum? I shall continue to argue that it is a pity that they did not know before the referendum, but at least they should know before the legislation comes into force—if indeed it does. As the amendments are purely for the sake of clarity, who could possibly object to them on any reasonable grounds?

As the Government and hon. Members on my left representing the Liberal Democrats and the Scottish National party—[Interruption.] They are certainly on my left.

Mr. Swinney: We are pleased about that.

Mrs. Laing: I am pleased, too, because I am on their right. Some of us are Scottish Tories, and always will be.

Liberal Democrat and SNP Members frequently insist that it is important that the new Scottish Parliament should have autonomy and that it is vital that the Westminster Parliament trusts the Scottish Parliament and does not treat it like a child and restrict it too much. Hon. Members are always saying that trust is of the essence in setting up the new Scottish Parliament. If that is indeed the case and the Government believe in the autonomy of the Scottish Parliament, it is inconsistent to argue that any tax-varying powers should be limited to 3 per cent. Why should it be 3 per cent.—why not 2.5, 3.5, or 4.25 per cent.? We have never had a proper explanation of why the Scottish Parliament, as an autonomous body, should have its tax-raising powers limited to exactly 3 per cent.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): Local authorities have 15 per cent. revenue-raising powers, yet the Scottish Parliament is to be given only 3 per cent. revenue-raising powers. What kind of Parliament has fewer revenue-raising powers than a Scottish local council? The Tories have just apologised for what they did to Scottish local government. Should not the hon. Lady be apologising in advance for what she is doing to the Scottish Parliament?

Mrs. Laing: It is not what I am doing; it is what the Scottish people voted for in the referendum. The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that local authorities have more autonomy in respect of raising and varying tax than the Parliament will have. So where is the trust? I put it to the Committee that the reason for inserting the figure of 3 per cent. is that it is a wolf in sheep's clothing. It was done simply to make sure that the Scottish people were not frightened.

Mr. McAllion: Thank God for that. I was beginning to worry about the powers of the Scottish Parliament.

Mrs. Laing: I know that the hon. Gentleman is worried about the powers of the Scottish Parliament and that he and many of the hon. Members on my left would like the Scottish Parliament to have far more powers.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. John Maxton): Order. The hon. Lady is going rather wide of the subject. I wish that she would return to the amendment.

Mrs. Laing: I apologise, Mr. Maxton. It is too much of a temptation to reply to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion).

If the Westminster Parliament truly trusts the body that is being set up in Edinburgh, why is it not willing to give it more autonomy in its tax-raising powers and to accept the amendment, which would simply provide clarity? Whatever other havoc is caused when the Parliament is set up in Edinburgh and whatever uncertainty is created, especially for small businesses in Scotland, at least the Scottish people will know that only income tax can be varied. If it is truly the Government's intention to allow only income tax to be varied, why can they not accept our very reasonable amendments? The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) said earlier, in respect of the level of taxes that can be raised, that, if certain things did not happen, it would be tough on the Scottish Parliament. It would not be tough on the Scottish Parliament; it would be tough on the Scottish people.

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): I have read clause 69 very carefully in conjunction with clause 72 and I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram): it is extremely confused. However many times I read it, it became no clearer. My right hon. Friend described it as obscure and incomprehensible. The fact that it is incomprehensible and the Government do not seem to want to clarify it creates doubt, uncertainty and a suspicion that there may be some hidden taxes lurking beneath the surface—not least because the basic rate of 3p in the pound, to which the tax is supposed to be limited, does not seem to fit with the £450 million that they talk about raising from it.

Clause 69 is obscure, but it is nothing compared with clause 72, and the two together cause doubt and confusion among Opposition Members. It is important that clause 69 should be clear and certain for three particular reasons. First, despite what was said earlier, taxation is extremely important when it comes to locating and running businesses. Parts of the world that have low taxation are doing well. If hon. Members are in any doubt about that, they should ask Sir Bruce Pattullo, Governor of the Bank of Scotland.

Secondly, the tax-raising power in Scotland drives a significant wedge between the various parts of the United Kingdom. Why should Scotland be able to raise or lower income tax when other parts of the United Kingdom cannot? It is therefore doubly important that we know the exact extent of the tax-raising powers.

Mr. Swinney: The hon. Gentleman is in effect arguing that all taxes should be the same throughout the United Kingdom. Can he tell me why council tax for the average household is about £200 in the City of Westminster, but may be five times as much in Scotland?

Mr. Prior: I am arguing not that taxes should be the same throughout the United Kingdom, but that taxation should not be structured in such a way as to break up the United Kingdom. Local government is correctly financed through locally raised taxes—indeed, I wish that it was financed to a greater extent through locally raised taxes.

The third reason we need clarity and certainty in clause 69 is illustrated by the argument advanced by the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney), in that his party wishes to extend the right of the Scottish Parliament to tax and will use every chance available and every piece of ambiguity and uncertainty in the clause to argue for higher and greater tax-raising powers. Our amendments would clarify the Bill; they would not make any fundamental changes, but they would add certainty. That is why I support them.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The amendments invite the Committee to consider the important provision that gives the Scottish Parliament the power to vary income tax up or down. I shall follow up my right hon. and hon. Friends' remarks about the lack of clarity in the Bill later. First, I should like to pick up on some of the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that our amendments should not be accepted because, in his view, they are superfluous. If the worst that can be said of the amendments is that they merely clarify or lengthen the Bill, that is not a sufficient argument for striking them out, given the importance of clarity in this matter.

Secondly, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Conservative party has no right to table the amendments because they express a position different from that taken by the Conservative party in 1978-79. That seems a rather strange view from the spokesman for a party which, since 1978-79, has changed its view on the right to buy, nuclear weapons and privatisation or nationalisation and which has allied itself, merged itself, split itself and changed its name countless times. An argument based on consistency with 1978-79 comes ill from a Liberal Democrat.

Thirdly, the hon. and learned Gentleman pooh-poohed the proposition that anyone would ever move from Scotland to Cumbria. Although I understand and respect his natural love for his country—Scotland is a beautiful country—as one who represents a Cumbrian constituency I have to tell him that there are people in my constituency who have moved there from Scotland. They have moved both themselves and their businesses and one of the many factors they took into account was the difference in taxation, which the hon. and learned Gentleman said was irrelevant and not a matter of concern.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): Name them.

Mr. Collins: I name Mr. Melvin Mackie, who is the entirely splendid landlord of The Pheasant Inn in my constituency and who moved from Scotland to Cumbria. I thank the hon. Lady for that invitation to name and praise that splendid gentleman and his splendid pub.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): I live on the border and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that everything he is arguing was argued before 1 May. Scotland's businesses are not flocking to relocate across the border. Relocation is far too expensive: the hon. Gentleman should know that.

Mr. Collins: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but we do not yet have a Scottish Parliament—or differing levels of income tax, which is what the Bill is all about. We shall see what happens. I was invited to give an example of someone who has moved from Scotland to Cumbria and I have done so, so I have proved my point.

Scottish National party Members have said that they think the problem with the tax provision is that 3 per cent. is not enough and that the figure should be far higher. The 15 per cent. for local authority financing was quoted—and that was clearly the opening bid in an upward process. That proposition is difficult to reconcile with the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland, who said that because Members of the Scottish Parliament will be elected by proportional representation a cross-party consensus will be needed before there can be any tax increases, so no one needs to worry.

[Mr. Collins]

Which parties will apply the brake to ambitions to shove up taxes harboured by a Labour party short of a majority in the Scottish Parliament? First, there will be the Liberal Democrats, whose constant refrain at Prime Minister's questions is to ask why he will not shove up taxes more, so as to be able to spend more public money. Secondly, there will be the Scottish National party, which says its only problem with the tax-raising powers of the Scottish Parliament is that they do not go far enough and do not enable taxes in Scotland to rise yet further. It seems unlikely that the Scottish Parliament will apply a brake to any of Labour's ambitions to raise taxes. It is clear that, unless there is a clear and overwhelming Conservative majority—as we hope there will be, although it will be difficult to achieve under a system of proportional representation—all the other parties will be instinctive tax-raising parties which, sooner or later, will try to use the powers to increase taxes to the detriment of the Scottish people.

The point of the amendments is simply to establish what was put before the Scottish people in the referendum.

5.45 pm

Mr. Swinney: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if, in a Scottish general election, the people of Scotland were given a clear choice between the different tax proposals offered by the parties and they opted for certain proposals that might, lead to an increase in taxation, that would be the expressed will of the Scottish people and that they are entitled to express that opinion democratically?

Mr. Collins: The interesting question is whether those propositions would be honestly put to the Scottish people. It is significant that the Government have established a pattern whereby they ask people to look at the rabbit of income tax while they do all sorts of other things in the background. Some of us remember that, before the general election, the present Prime Minister went around signing posters in his own fair hand saying that he would not put up income tax. As I found on doorsteps in my constituency and elsewhere, many people interpreted that as a pledge not to put up taxes at all, but, as we have already seen, taxes were increased in the first Budget of the Labour Administration and it is threatened that they will rise extensively.

It is likely that the same will happen in Scotland: there will be an attempt to focus all attention on income tax, as though that is the only tax that can be levied. We should ensure that what the Scottish people were asked to vote on in the referendum—that a Scottish Parliament should have the power to vary only income tax rates, and that by a limited amount—should be written on the face of the Bill. Without that and the amendments, the technique constantly used by the Government—inviting people to focus solely on income tax, thus enabling the Government to make all sorts of other tax increases that they believe have a lower profile but which are every bit as painful—will be used again.

The amendments are important because they provide clarity and would establish on the face of the Bill the proposition that the Scottish people were invited to endorse. They would prevent a sneaky, but particularly poignant and oft-repeated, trick of the current Administration that has already been played on the people of the United Kingdom as a whole being perpetrated on the Scottish people.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I support the amendments, which would insert the word "income". It was explicit throughout the White Paper, the referendum and the debate on devolution that what the amendments would write into the Bill was what was intended and I cannot understand why the Government do not accept them—after all, they are in the spirit of the debate. The amendments would clarify and make more specific the powers of the Parliament. There will always be those who worry that, if income tax is not specified, other taxes may appear. In the press, we have read of concerns about a tourist tax or a sales tax, and various members of the Scottish business establishment are concerned about how other forms of taxation may impact on them.

Having read the press release and the various prospective clauses that were put in the Library earlier, I am pleased to see that the Government have clarified many points. The complexity of the income tax system becomes clear when one starts to read through those complicated documents. It is easy to see why tax lawyers make such a good living at the Bar when they deal with issues relating to income tax.

I doubt whether a 3p rise would raise £450 million. That may be an issue for another day. I oppose the principle of varying tax within the United Kingdom because I believe that it will be detrimental to Scotland. Scotland may wish to make that choice, but the debate about crossing borders shows that it will be a difficult issue. As the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) told my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), companies will not move from Scotland, but the decisions of many international businesses and businesses based throughout the United Kingdom about where to expand could be determined by tax structures.

The Library document brings out the issue of the setting-up costs of the Scottish Parliament that will fall on the Inland Revenue and social services. For the Inland Revenue, a setting-up cost of £10 million, with perhaps £8 million a year running costs, was mentioned. For social security, the figures are £6 million setting-up costs and perhaps £1 million running costs. It is inevitable that a Parliament with the power to levy ½p or 1p will not choose the lower figure because of the substantial setting-up and initial running costs.

With a £16 million setting-up cost and a £9 million running cost, the Parliament will not go for a ½p rate, which may raise only £75 million. That would not be efficient. In practice, the Parliament will not have much choice between ½p, 1p or 3p because, with the cost of collecting the tax, it will go for the top level from day one. That will affect business and employment north of the border.

Mr. Welsh: While raising the spectre of international companies rushing to leave Scotland or not coming at all, can the hon. Gentleman give an example of companies being deterred? To prove his point, the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) could offer only a publican rushing from Scotland to Cumbria.

Mr. Syms: It would take a while; the Parliament has not yet been set up and the tax has not yet been levied.

Mr. Swinney: Assuming that it will be.

Mr. Syms: It is a realistic point. High-tax countries do not attract jobs. Scotland will be competing against England and Wales, which will have lower taxes.

Sir Robert Smith: I cannot understand why Conservative Members do not understand the logic. The matter would be dealt with as an issue in the election to the Scottish Parliament. The hon. Gentleman said that the Parliament would have to raise the tax by 3p, but it could get away with that only if the electorate was willing to forgive it.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I am sure that that will be a key issue. The principal point of the amendments is to insert the word "income" to make the provision specific. I do not believe that that would change the Government's intent, but it would reassure many people who are worried that other forms of taxation might be raised. I support the amendment.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): This is an important debate. It is a great shame that there are so few members of the media in the Gallery to listen to a debate that has profound implications for all the people of the United Kingdom and not only for the people of Scotland.

I support the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) to insert the word "income" so that there is no doubt, not only in the House but in the country at large, that we are talking about powers to vary income tax, not powers that relate to any other form of taxation.

If the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) believes that the word "income" is superfluous, let him put it in the Bill. It is not as if we are asking for a series of new clauses that make lengthy insertions. We propose a one-word insertion at a number of points that would mean that no one, least of all the courts—to whom the Government are handing more powers under the Human Rights Bill, which we debated last week—should be able to interpret the will of Parliament as extending beyond income tax to other forms of taxation.

I remind the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution that, on Second Reading, the Secretary of State referred to safeguards that had been built into the system and said:

> "First, income from savings and dividends will not be affected by the tax-varying powers. We were influenced heavily in reaching that decision by the need to have a level playing field for the financial services industry in Scotland, which is particularly important in insurance and pensions."—[Official Report, 31 July 1997; Vol. 299, c. 465.]

I wonder how much those industries gave to the Labour party. Bernie Ecclestone gave £1 million to secure changes in the tobacco regime. The Government have clearly had representations from the insurance and financial sector, which is concerned about the impact on its businesses.

Mr. McLeish: On a point of order, Mr. Maxton. The comments that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made on Second Reading have been linked to the suggestion that the Labour party may have received income from financial services companies. I hope that that was not the inference that was being drawn.

The Temporary Chairman: That is not a point of order but a matter for debate.

Mr. Howarth: I note your ruling that that was not a point of order, Mr. Maxton. The Minister is a decent chap, but he was remarkably sensitive to my point. Perhaps he might like to check with Walworth road to make sure.

The point that I was making for the benefit of the Minister and in answer to the Scottish nationalist lot was about a specific case of an industry that has made representations to the Government about the potential impact of the Bill on its business. The industry wanted to ensure that it would not be prejudiced by an extension of tax-raising powers beyond income tax. If the Minister wishes to score a few brownie points with the insurance and financial services industry, which plays a big part in the Scottish economy, he should accede to our small but important amendment.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): Has my hon. Friend noticed that the largesse directed to savings is not being directed towards charitable gifts, in respect of which the amount of Scottish tax supplement will not be grossed up in the usual way? It will be restricted to only the United Kingdom basic rate. Is that not a particularly mean decision?

Mr. Howarth: I was not aware of that and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing it to our attention. It seems that it is a one-way ratchet—and not a good example of the good faith to which the people of Scotland might like to look forward in their dealings with a Scottish Parliament.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying a little far from the amendment. I would be grateful if he returned to it.

Mr. Howarth: I was seeking only to respond to my hon. Friend's intervention.

As a matter of principle, I believe that national taxation should be decided by this place for the whole United Kingdom. This part of the Bill is one of the axes falling on the unity of the United Kingdom. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) that it is a matter of principle that taxation should be determined nationally in this Parliament at Westminster.

There has been some discussion of people moving. I noted the nervousness of the insurance and financial services industry about the Bill's impact on their business. Much mirth was had by the Scottish nationalist lot about the suggestion that my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) could not name people who had moved to Westmorland. They ought to take note of the fact that, even in advance of the Bill reaching the statute book, a Scottish business man has realised that he can read the runes only too clearly and has decided to up sticks in order to ensure that there is no way that he can be affected. I am quite sure that the habitues of his hostelry will be grateful for his move.

Mr. Wallace: Will the hon. Gentleman inform the House how many international companies have announced over the six months since the referendum that they are about to make inward investment in Scotland?

Mr. Howarth: I am not aware of the answer off the top of my head. The hon. and learned Gentleman makes a fair point. Many businesses have gone to Scotland. That is one of the features of 18 years of a Conservative Government. Thanks to our policies—

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The amendment says: "after 'the', insert 'Income'." I wish that the hon. Member would refer to it.

Mr. Howarth: I was, Mr. Maxton. I was referring to income—income in Scotland from all the new businesses that were encouraged by the Conservative Government.

I say to those who have questioned whether the Bill will have an impact on where business locates that, generally, business does not make a decision until it has seen how individual bits of legislation take effect. In that respect, it is very instructive to look at what is going on in Kent, where people have been able to see the impact of different rates of taxation. There, they have voted with their feet—

Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw): They voted Labour.

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that this matter is anything to do with there being a Labour Government, I remind him that it probably has more to do with the Labour Government sticking to the spending limits set by the previous Conservative Government, giving people some reassurance. Once the Bill comes into effect, we are likely to see businesses trying to escape the extra burdens of a Scottish income tax. Scottish nationalists say that it will not make a difference.

In the White Paper, the Government made clear that they "propose that the tax varying power should operate on income tax, because it is broadly based and easy to administer."

I shall return to that point. They specifically ruled out VAT, stating:

"different rates of VAT on different sides of the border would cause practical problems".

I remind the Minister that the 1977 White Paper came to a very different conclusion. It noted that, of all the options, supplementary income tax

"seems an attractive candidate at first sight because of its high yield and broad coverage"

but it was ruled out primarily on the ground that it

"would impose a heavy new burden on the PAYE system and would reduce its efficiency as the Government's main revenue collector. Furthermore, because a marginal tax would be at a low rate, the cost of collection could represent as much as 20 per cent. of the yield."

There we have it. It has been considered in the past that such a tax would impose a substantial burden. The Government are now asserting to the contrary.

There will be a cost to business from the tax-varying powers conferred by the clause. There will be a cost to the Government. We do not know how much; the Bill is not explicit on that. I wonder how much the Government will make available to businesses to help them offset the additional cost of the income tax-varying powers that they are being asked to shoulder.

Mr. Syms: Is my hon. Friend aware that, from some estimates, it could cost business upwards of £50 million to set up the running of the additional tax?

Mr. Howarth: That is a very substantial amount of money—but cost is not the only issue. For a large business, £1 million may not be a large amount, but £10,000 in costs could be a substantial burden on a very small business. My hon. Friend mentions a substantial figure, which could fall disproportionately and particularly harm small businesses.

I give the Minister a word of advice. All Conservative Members are clear that much of the Bill comes from a dispute between the Scottish nationalists and the Labour party, as they vie to outdo each other on winning the nationalist vote. The Minister had better beware, because it is perfectly apparent—we shall come to this issue in a later debate—that the 3p income tax-varying power may not raise enough for the Scottish nationalists' designs, and they will be back.

I say to you, Mr. Maxton, as a Scottish Member, that the Scottish nationalists will be back, seeking to persuade the Scottish people that such a sum is paltry and that the only way in which they can implement their plans will be with a very much larger take. I support the amendment.

Mr. McLeish: Some things change, but many do not. The speech of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) was breathtaking in its irrelevance to the fact that Scotland has moved on, the business community has moved on and the Scottish Conservative party has moved on. Conservatives in this House have simply not moved on.

Before I briefly address the Opposition amendments, I shall refer to the consultation paper issued by the Inland Revenue. The paper sets out the Revenue's initial thinking on a range of second-order technical issues, which will have to be dealt with before April 2000. It has been sent to a range of representative organisations and invites their comments. It is very much a working document, but, for hon. Members' information, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. I shall come to points made about that in a second. The paper is intended only as a step along the road to sorting out all the various detailed technical aspects of the tax. I anticipate, however, that it will meet some of the concerns that have been expressed to us and will encourage constructive comment in other areas.

May I repeat that I apologise for the inconvenience that has been caused to hon. Members? The paper is part of the on-going debate, but it would have been courteous to have informed at least the party leaders about its availability. It could then have been accessed a little earlier. On that basis, I hope that I can leave that point.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the Minister for his apology, which I certainly accept. Will he pay the fees of the tax adviser whom I shall need to explain the paper to me?

Mr. McLeish: As they say in the legal profession, I shall reflect on that matter.

Mr. Wallace: I, too, am grateful to the Minister for his apology. On a cursory glance at the paper, one of the things that cause me some concern is a reference to clause 75 and how many of the responses to the consultation may be made by subordinate legislation. Will the Minister give an undertaking that, if substantive points come up, he will be prepared to reconsider amendments either on Report or in another place?

Mr. McLeish: That is for the procedures of the Committee. If hon. Members want to raise further items at a later stage, they can obviously be discussed. The Inland Revenue will have prepared the paper for the purposes of consultation with employers and others. As a courtesy, the paper was placed in the Library. I have already referred to the administrative convenience.

Mr. Swinney: I accept the Minister's remarks about the arrangements for the paper. Will there be more papers of that nature? From a cursory glance, the paper does not seem to cover all the issues that concern me in relation to clause 71 and the definition of Scottish taxpayers. Although the Minister may have more to say in a later debate, I seek his reassurance on that point.

Mr. McLeish: I shall indeed have something further to say about that. I hope for continuing consultations, in addition to the paper that is being published. Moreover, the Revenue intends to call in employers to discuss implementation of the tax. I anticipate further papers clarifying some of the issues that will be involved.

There is something synthetic about the concern expressed by Conservative Members this evening. Since 11 September, many people have taken the result very seriously—the result being a Scottish Parliament. The result also meant, however, a tax-varying power. Despite the ringing endorsement by the Scottish people, by a ratio of 2:1, I detect at best a grudging acceptance of their decision by the Conservative Opposition.

It does little good to distort and exaggerate. The Conservatives' grudging acceptance is cloaked in further attacks on the democratic wishes of the Scottish people. It is always very dangerous for democracy when people seemingly insult a decision arrived at in this way. It is the business of this Committee to scrutinise the technicalities, not to revisit old arguments—yet that is what the Tories have done under the guise of apparently supporting the measure. They actually harbour deep misgivings about what is happening—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. McLeish: I see that they are getting edgy.

Dr. Fox: What are the Prime Minister's economic reasons for saying that his party will not support the use of the tax-raising power?

Mr. McLeish: The subject was well aired before publication of the White Paper on 24 July, and before the referendum of 11 September. It is no secret that we are committed to that for the lifetime of this Parliament.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does the Minister accept that we tabled our amendments solely to ensure that the Scottish people get exactly what they voted for and nothing else?

Mr. McLeish: Not at all. That is not the import of the amendments. There was a tax-varying question, linked to what the White Paper said, on the ballot paper. We made it clear that we were talking about income tax. The business community has moved on from these points already. Business people wanted fairness: that is what they have got. They wanted uncertainty cleared up; the business community is always rightly apprehensive of change. All that has formed the basis of the discussions between the Government and the business community. While that community has begun to look at the technicalities and the impact of the tax-varying power, Conservative Members have not moved an inch since the result was declared on 12 September.

Mr. Heald: If the measure applies only to income tax, why not say so? Could it be because the Government, with their secret agenda, intend later to include capital gains tax?

Mr. McLeish: Conservative Members should apply themselves to clause 69(1):

"Subject to section 70, this section applies for any year of assessment for which income tax is charged".

That is clear to every party in the House except the Conservative party. No matter how many times Conservatives are told that this concerns income tax, they will not acknowledge the fact—on political, not technical grounds.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the business community completely satisfied with the Government's position on a uniform business rate?

Mr. McLeish: I think the business community is satisfied with our openness and with the dialogue that we have had with business people. They have acknowledged that the power over the uniform business rate, linked as it is to the structure of local government, is being passed to the Parliament, not to local government itself. The Parliament will determine the matter. I am well pleased with our discussions so far. Recently the CBI met my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and agreed to submit its thoughts on some of the technical issues surrounding the tax. It has now done that; I believe that the Inland Revenue is to hold further discussions with the CBI to respond to its points. I am content with the process—

Mr. Ancram: But are business people?

Mr. McLeish: Conservative Members should do some reading about what industry and business are saying. The life companies, for instance, are allowing their staff to stand for the Scottish Parliament, protecting their jobs and interests in the meantime.

Mr. Dalyell: I have said before that there is some concern about the responsibilities of the life offices. Will it be they or the Revenue which will be responsible for making information available?

Mr. McLeish: It will be a matter for the Inland Revenue, which will notify the life companies of what needs to be done.

At some point, Conservative Members will have to come clean on where they stand—not for the benefit of the Government, the Liberal Democrats or the nationalists, but for the benefit of the Conservative party in Scotland, which may be interested in participating in elections there. Conservative Members ask who will decide whether the tax-varying power is to be used. The answer is: possibly the Conservatives. They have no locus in this House when it comes to Scotland, following 1 May, but they should be careful when deciding whether to accept the verdict of 11 September. They should not undermine the efforts of Scottish Conservatives to be elected to the Scottish Parliament—an outcome most democrats would want, yet it could be jeopardised by what the Opposition say in this Committee.

Amendments Nos. 352 to 355, 358 to 365, 369, 383, 386, 391, 394, 395 and 398 would replace each reference to tax-varying powers or taxpayers in the Bill with a reference to income tax-varying powers or income tax payers. The amendments are simply not necessary. Clause 69 makes it quite clear that the tax-varying power applies solely to income tax and thus to income tax payers. Clause 72(3) would confine any future replacement of the proposed tax-varying powers to income tax.

There is nothing more I can say on the subject. The amendments are superfluous and should not be agreed to.

Mr. Ancram: That was a most inadequate response. These days it seems that if we are told by the Minister that black is white, we need not see it on the face of the Bill. His whole argument is predicated on the idea that because he has said before that the provision relates to income tax, that need not be stated in the Bill. Certainly, from the point of view of Scottish business, that is inadequate.

The Minister keeps saying that clause 69 makes it clear that this is about income tax. I have read it again. It refers to "any year of assessment for which income tax is charged".

If that is indeed about income tax, why does the Minister resist the simple addition of the word "income" to make the measure clear beyond peradventure?

We are only trying to bring about some confidence and stability. I would expect the nationalists to attack us, but when even the Liberal Democrats suggest that we have a hidden agenda, it becomes disappointingly clear to me that they have not understood the depth of concern in Scotland. My hon. Friends have admirably highlighted the uncertainties generated by these provisions; the Minister has not begun to answer any of them.

Once again, we have heard the protests that this is a wrecking group of amendments tabled by the Opposition. The Minister has given no serious consideration to them. He says that the Government do not need to clarify, yet when he introduced the paper from the Inland Revenue today, he said that it was the first of a number of papers whose purpose will be to clarify these issues. Those were his words—to clarify these issues. In saying that, he is accepting that there are doubts, that there are questions that need to be answered, and that clarification is required, yet when we seek to make a simple clarification in the Bill, he throws his hands in the air and says that he cannot accept it. Then he wonders why we are suspicious.

The Minister says that the business community in Scotland has moved on, that it is satisfied with the provisions, and that our need for clarification is not the need of the business community. Why, then, did representatives of the CBI go to see him on 30 January to ask for clarification and to get an assurance that capital gains tax would not be affected by the provision?

If the Bill and the arguments are so clear and so patent, and the Scottish people have seen and heard them for the past eight months, why does a senior organisation representing Scottish business take a different view and feel the need to ask for that reassurance? Why was the Minister so keen to give us that reassurance from the Dispatch Box again last week at Scottish questions? Because he, too, knows that there are doubts in Scotland, and that those doubts are dangerous and destabilising. He wants to offer reassurance not in the Bill, but from the Dispatch Box.

The Minister's attitude is breathtaking in its complacency. He was asked by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) whether he was satisfied that the Scottish business community was reassured about the uniform business rate. If I understood his answer, which was not easy to understand, he seemed to say that the business community was pathetically grateful that he had been prepared to talk to its representatives.

There are real business decisions—investment decisions—to be taken, all of which will be taken on the basis of the confidence that Scottish business has in the Government's proposals in relation to tax, but we have again heard nothing that creates any more confidence in that regard.

Mr. Wallace: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that even if all his amendments were accepted, it would make no difference to the powers of the Scottish Parliament in relation to the uniform business rate?

Mr. Ancram: Not these particular amendments—

Mr. Wallace: Those are the ones that we are discussing.

Mr. Ancram: I said earlier that the entire clause relates to confidence in tax varying. We have tabled new clauses that we shall discuss later, which deal with that specific problem, so the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that we are consistent in our approach.

I am sorry about the view that the Minister has taken. These were useful amendments, which could have created confidence. Throughout our consideration of the Bill, his reaction to any amendments tabled by the Opposition—even by the Government's friends, the Liberal Democrats, who are now protesting about not having any amendments accepted—has been arrogant resistance to any constructive suggestion. That is disappointing, but I shall not press the matter. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Heald: I beg to move amendment No. 356, in page 29, line 23, at end insert—

'(3A) The income mentioned in subsection (3) to which section 1A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 applied for that year shall also be treated as income of that kind even where the taxpayer's total income from all sources exceeds £25,500 in that year.

(3B) The income referred to in subsection (2) does not include income from any annuity purchased from a pension fund.'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to take amendment No. 357, in page 29, line 35, at end add—

'(6) Split year concessions shall apply to resolutions passed by the Scottish Parliament as they apply under the Income and Corporation Taxes Acts.'.

Mr. Heald: Amendment No. 356 proposes adding two new subsections, (3A) and (3B), to clause 69. New subsection (3A) seeks to ensure that any tax supplement resolved on by the Scottish Parliament should not have effect as against income from savings and distributions, even if the Scottish taxpayer's income exceeds £25,500 in that year.

To put that in context, clause 69(2) applies the income tax Acts to Scottish taxpayers so that the UK rate—the basic rate—is increased or reduced by the amount resolved by the Scottish Parliament. Clause 69(3) provides that income from savings and distributions is not to be considered for that purpose, but that is done by reference to section 1A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

Section 1A provides that income from savings and distributions is to be taxed at the lower rate in the United Kingdom, but if a taxpayer's total income exceeds £25,500, tax is paid on the top slice at the higher rate, and income from savings and distributions is considered under subsection (5) as the highest part of his income and taxed at 40 per cent. less the 20 per cent. already deducted.

The amendment seeks answers to two questions. For the purposes of the Scottish tax supplement, will income from savings and distributions be completely disregarded, or will such income be considered for tax as the highest part of the taxpayer's income and be brought into the Scottish tax supplement if the total income exceeds £25,500? In other words, will the tax supplement apply to basic rate taxpayers and those in receipt of savings and distributions income in so far as the total income exceeds £25,500, or does section 1A apply only to define the categories of income to be disregarded, and may subsection (1)(b) and subsection (5) of section 1A therefore be ignored for these purposes?

That was a fairly technical argument, but I can see that one or two Labour Members followed it closely. New subsection (3B) would remove pension income from the Scottish tax supplement. As at present drafted, clause 69, subject to my previous comments, would exempt savings and distributions income, but not pension income. It is an anomaly that senior citizens in receipt of a pension should pay the tax, while those who rely on other savings income should not.

The Government may argue that savings are made out of taxed income and should therefore be exempt from further taxation, and that it would be wrong to tax twice. However, as we have seen, the income under section 1A of the 1988 Act is already taxed, albeit at a lower level. It is true that pension contributions attract tax relief and that pensions in payment are taxable, but the agreement between the Government and the taxpayer has been that tax relief will be at the current UK tax rate, and that pensions in payment will be taxed at the current UK tax rate.

Pension scheme members have made their contributions, as have their employers, on the basis of the present situation, and have made their projections of the necessary required income for retirement on that basis. Is it fair to change the rules retrospectively and impose a new tax on those with fixed incomes—pensioners who have no opportunity to increase their income, because their working lives are over?

For the past 18 years, the Conservative Government were anxious to increase the number of people who had pension provision. The number went up by more than 6 million. That was against a background of falling income tax rates. In recent years, Labour has given people taking out pension provision the idea that Labour would agree to the system where tax rates fall rather than rise. It is doubly cruel now to increase the rate of tax for pensioners while leaving other savers untouched, as pensioners cannot change their position, claw back the money, put it back into their pension schemes and save the situation for the future.

Furthermore, is it right as a matter of policy to disadvantage pension scheme savers in comparison with other savers? Other savers have made their savings from taxed income, but at the current UK rate. They have not paid the Scottish tax supplement. If they are to be exempt from the tax supplement on the fruits of their investments, why should pensioners pay it?

There is an imbalance between the way in which two kinds of savers, both possibly saving for their retirement, are treated. Is it right for a Government to discriminate against pensioners? Pensions are thought by many to be the best form of investment for retirement. The money is set aside permanently, and employers are prepared to make contributions to pension funds as part of their employment policy. Everyone recognises that good-quality pensions help the individual to meet his expectations of retirement.

Until recently, all Governments have gone to great lengths to extol the benefits of pension provision, not least because it eases the burden on the public purse at a time when we face an increasing aging population. At present, there are three pensioners for every worker. By 2030, there will be five pensioners for every worker. Against that background, rather than abandoning that pension policy, should not the Government support those who make provision in that way? We have already seen the £5 billion pensions raid and now we have this discrimination against Scottish pensioners. I ask the Government to think again and to accept amendment No. 356.

There is a certain mean-spiritedness about this tax-varying power—grossing up charitable gifts not by the amount of the Scottish tax supplement but only by the United Kingdom basic rate; and not giving full relief for home income plans, which are restricted to the basic rate instead. There are 15,000 plans in the United Kingdom and no doubt there are many in Scotland. Do the Government wish to send the message, "Don't be a Scottish pensioner or a Scottish home income plan owner"? I do not think so. That is why the Government should consider the amendments seriously.

6.30 pm

Amendment No. 357 seeks to maintain the extra-statutory concession on split years for the Scottish tax supplement. Under United Kingdom tax law, anyone who is resident in the United Kingdom for part of a tax year is liable for tax for the whole year in respect of his whole income. In theory, if he is resident in the United Kingdom for a day and then moves to the United States, he is liable to pay tax for the whole year on his whole income. The Revenue has recognised the unfairness of that and has made an extra-statutory concession that involves splitting the tax year, so that income arising after departure is not subject to United Kingdom tax.

It is not clear whether that concession applies to the Scottish tax supplement if a person moves to England or abroad to the United States, for example. It is important that the Government clarify their position. It would be wrong to discriminate against those who seek to exercise mobility of labour. I ask the Government to consider both amendments seriously, and I hope that the Minister will accept them.

Mr. Dalyell: In the previous discussion, I asked whether donations to charities would be treated according to Scottish or United Kingdom taxation rules. I put that question then in the expectation that we might not reach these amendments, and I wonder whether it would be convenient for the Minister to answer now. I asked also about the treatment of annuities. The Minister did not touch on that issue in his winding-up speech, but that matter may be dealt with more properly now.

I have one more question about pay-as-you-earn treatment—forgive me if it does not relate to the amendments, but I do not know when it will be appropriate to raise it. Would it not create less of a burden and be administratively easier if tax years could be split? For example, if someone arrives in Scotland from England on 1 September, the Scottish rate will affect PAYE for the whole year of assessment. That creates an additional burden for employers and employees, which may result in an employer paying an additional salary or in an employee seeking to postpone his arrival in Scotland. Now is probably as good a moment as any to ask about the treatment of PAYE.

Mr. Wallace: I should declare an interest in the discussion, as I am the parliamentary adviser to the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Scotland. I have had discussions with the institute regarding some technical matters in the Bill—although obviously any political gloss I may put on them is entirely my own. I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for North–East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) has moved the amendments. This is the stuff of the Committee stage; we should examine the details of the legislation. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) also raised important detailed points.

The amendments raise concerns about the way in which clause 69(1) and (2) will interact with the general operation of income tax as it affects Scottish taxpayers. I understand that clause 69(2) makes the provision part of income tax legislation, so it should apply the next time we have a consolidation.

Given that the Scottish variable rate applies to income tax, does it apply also to tax relief? I note that the charitable deeds of covenant are covered by the consultation paper and that tax relief will continue to apply at the United Kingdom basic rate, regardless of the tax position of the donor. I am not 100 per cent. certain that the provisions in clause 69 will achieve that aim. We could have a political debate about whether they should achieve it—the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire said that the deeds of covenant should attract tax relief if someone pays a higher rate.

Many charities have found that successive reductions in the rate of income tax have led to reductions in their income. Putting aside that political point, I seek an assurance from the Minister about precisely how the position that he sets out in the paper with regard to the deeds of covenant can be achieved by the structure of the changes to the Scottish rate of income tax as set out in clause 69.

In terms of simplicity, there is much to commend the extra-statutory concession. We want simplicity, but I would hesitate to allow a Bill that deals with fundamental constitutional matters to make a major taxation change. There is much to be said for putting such extra-statutory concessions into taxation legislation. It is not satisfactory to achieve fundamental taxation change by way of extra-statutory concessions.

My final point relates to annuities. I understand that we have different tax rates to which annuities from pension funds do not apply, principally because the Conservative party made that distinction. I think that the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), introduced that provision. If there is a tax break going in, it is not unreasonable that there should be tax coming out. We seek confirmation from the Minister on that point. If, for the sake of argument, the tax rate in the Scottish Parliament is 24 per cent., would a contribution attract a tax break at 24 per cent? If that is so, it is not unreasonable that it should be taxed at the Scottish rate when the payment is taken out.

Mr. Swinney: I wish to make a brief contribution to the consideration of amendments Nos. 356 and 357. I believe that amendment No. 357 is the better of the two. In the past few weeks, I have received several representations from specialist organisations in the financial services sector and from the business community about some of the details surrounding these provisions.

I take the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace): there is concern about the publication of the consultation paper. It is felt that too many details about the application of the tax-varying powers will be settled by secondary provisions and do not form part of the Bill. A key concern that has been drawn to my attention is the definition of "Scottish taxpayer" in clause 71.

Mr. Heald: I am rather surprised by the hon. Gentleman's comments. He spends a good deal of time telling us that details do not have to be on the face of the Bill, and now he says that they should. Can he not decide?

Mr. Swinney: That is such a lot of rubbish that I will not even bother to respond.

The Government have introduced in the Bill the concept of Scottish taxpayers. I understand their motivation for doing that, but I disagree with the method and the mechanism that they have proposed.

This debate is similar to the one that I suspect we shall have on clause 71; the definition of Scottish taxpayers should be much more closely related to residence than the Government propose.

I am particularly concerned about split-year concessions. I have anxieties about the bureaucracy and the administrative hassle and costs of gathering information for the proposed days test, and I believe that the Bill should make clearer the issues relating to the split-year concessions. If the Revenue can deliver a split-year concession for individuals who leave the United Kingdom for other tax jurisdictions, I am sure that a mechanism could be designed adequately to protect the right to a split-year concession for people who leave Scotland for another part of the United Kingdom.

We need guarantees that such mechanisms will be implemented, but the days count is inadequate; it is cumbersome and unnecessary, and it does not provide sufficient clarity. I understand the Government's enthusiasm to maximise revenues, but they must do so through the consistent application of tax practice and definitions, which are sadly lacking in the Bill.

Mr. Grieve: This is an interesting debate; it has become clear that, far from being simple, the 3p income tax variation is a matter of considerable complexity. Nothing illustrates that better than the preferential treatment that will be accorded to those who are in receipt of unearned income from stocks and shares, as opposed to those who have saved for their pensions. Given the Government's proclaimed interest in pensioners, the fact that they are making such a differentiation comes as something of a surprise.

We hope that the Government will accept the amendments, which would ensure parity between those who receive unearned income and those who receive pensions. Pensioners tend to have nothing else to fall back on for their income, yet they will be unfairly penalised in comparison with those who enjoy unearned income from other sources.

Another illustration of the measure's complexity is the split-year concession, about which the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and other hon. Members have spoken tellingly. If income tax rates differ in Scotland and England, the concession will be of great importance to those who work in and out of Scotland, and the Government should take that into account when they consider how the income tax mechanism will work.

As I understand the Government's thinking, they have moved from the principle that tax variation will occur only in relation to income tax to the position that it will affect only taxed, earned income. If so, they would be wise to nail their colours to the mast and leave it at that; otherwise, we shall end up with a series of bizarre anomalies—one need only look, for example, at the wording of the Inland Revenue's detailed statement to realise that some items that would normally be treated as income will be exempt. That is a recipe for the system to be considered unfair. If tax variation will apply only to the income earned by those who are earning, so be it; if not, the Government should consider the whole matter again.

Mr. Collins: Again, this is an important debate, as it enables us to flush out the Government's intentions. Amendment No. 357 deals with split-year concessions, and we should be aware that it is somewhat naive to operate a system on the assumption that most people—or even a significant number—will move from Scotland to England or vice versa just as one tax year ends and another begins. The Bill should make clear provision to take account of the fact that most people will move at other times of the year.

It is important to note that, once again, more Conservative Members are present than Labour Members, even though there are, sadly, two and a half times as many Labour Members as Conservative Members. The Scottish Parliament is supposed to be the flagship of the Government's programme, but in this debate on a matter of great significance—taxation—the Labour Benches are not filled. Is that because Labour Members do not believe that these matters are important, or do they think that the Government's case is difficult to support?

With the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), Labour Back Benchers have been entirely silent all afternoon. That needs to be noted; it betrays not only the contempt in which many Labour Members hold the House, but their indifference to matters of taxation, income and the management of the Scottish economy, which are of great importance to the people of Scotland and to all those who want every part of the United Kingdom to operate a strong and prosperous economy under a clear financial framework.

Amendment No. 356 is important; we want the Government's attitude to people whose income is greater than £25,500 per year to be put on the record. Those who were around in the run-up to the 1992 general election—I was in a very junior capacity—will remember the Labour party's immense difficulties over whether someone who earned £21,000 or £22,000 per year was affluent. At a famous dinner at an Italian restaurant, which was attended by journalists, the then leader of the Labour party, Mr. Neil Kinnock, changed policy on the treatment of employers' national insurance contributions.

That was as significant then as it is now, as we need to know what the Government's rhetoric means. They talk about people who are prosperous, who can afford to pay and who should be encouraged to make sacrifices for the wider community, but at what income will the affluence test start to bite?

As we learned during the debate on the previous group of amendments, the Government are reluctant to specify in the Bill the assurances that they gave during the referendum campaign and on other occasions—that the Scottish Parliament will be given powers to vary only income tax. If they reject the amendments, there will be a suspicion that the Labour party is pursuing an agenda in which people of a certain income—it may be £20,000, £25,000 or £30,000—should pay more.

The amendments were tabled to find out how much the Minister believes people's income should be before it is reasonable to expect them to pay more towards services, whether they are in Scotland or the rest of the United Kingdom. I should be interested to hear his definition of the affluence test—an idea that the Secretary of State for Social Security floated during a famous "Today" programme interview, but which was denounced a few hours later by Mr. Alastair Campbell from No. 10 Downing street, who—unconstitutionally—holds much greater power than any member of the Cabinet, with the possible exception of the Prime Minister.

I hope that the Minister will make clear the Government's position on pensioners. The pensions tax that was imposed in last year's Budget gave us some idea, but we want the Minister to put it on the record whether the Government are interested in the concerns of pensioners, particularly those with private pension provision.

I hope that, in the Minister's response to amendment No. 356, he will also clarify the Government's position on the key question of people with middle incomes, to which many people below them aspire. Does he believe that they should be asked to delve deep into their pockets to pay for socialist spending plans, whether they be from Holyrood or Westminster?

Mr. Syms: I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) eloquently introducing the amendments. I think that all of us have been impressed by the technicality of the clauses that we are discussing. We have had to listen carefully to explanations of what they mean.

The arguments behind amendment No. 356 are telling. Unearned income will not be taxed, but pensioners will find themselves under a tax burden. We all know that many pensioners are on a fixed income. Many have planned for their retirement for many years, only to find that the burden of the proposed taxation will diminish their living standards in retirement. I support the amendment.

I support also amendment No. 357. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, split years are an important issue. People are moving from one address to another and changing jobs all the time. Many of those moves and changes take place within the United Kingdom and many are international. If we can have recognition of split years under our income tax and corporation tax arrangements for people who go abroad, it seems not unreasonable that we should have such arrangements for people who move between Scotland and England or from Scotland to any other part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLeish: The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) asked about the tax treatment of pensions. If the Scottish rate were to be 24 per cent., would contributions attract relief at 24 per cent? The answer is yes.

The hon. and learned Gentleman referred also to the treatment of charities and asked how that would be achieved in the Bill. That will be done by invoking the powers in clause 75(2) by regulation in so far as that is necessary. That is one of the issues on which the Inland Revenue is consulting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised the issue of pay-as-you-earn treatment. I can tell my hon. Friend that PAYE will operate as normal. Indeed, that was made clear in the White Paper. The Inland Revenue will be consulting employers on detailed operational matters, covering such issues as how best to deal with people who move to and from Scotland in any one year.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Inland Revenue considering a split year?

Mr. McLeish: I shall take up that question in response to the amendments.

The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) asked whether it is fair to tax pension payments at the higher rate at which the contributor obtained tax relief in contributing to his or her pension fund. If a Government committed themselves to tax pensions only at the same rate at which they gave relief on pension contributions, it would not be possible to alter tax rates, including lowering them.

I shall take up some of the substantial points that were made by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire. Amendment No. 356 is clearly based on a paper produced by Deloitte and Touche. The argument seems to be that section 1A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 is a form of allowance and that, after that slice of income is, in effect, cut out, the next slice can fall into the gap. But that is not quite right. Sections 1 and 1A of the 1988 Act and clause 69 work together.

The rules take account of a person's total income, as arranged in a certain way, which basically puts savings income on top. From this are deducted personal allowances, and what income is left is divided into rate bands. For 1997-98, the first £4,100 is taxed at the lower rate of 20 per cent. Income from £4,101 to £26,099 is taxed at the basic rate of 23 per cent. The balance is taxed at the higher rate of 40 per cent.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend will be aware of the concern of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Scotland, which is asking whether income tax is to be withheld at 23 or 26 per cent. Thereafter, will the payer be given tax relief for an annual charge of 23 or 26 per cent? Are there special rules for cross-border annual payments? That refers to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

Mr. McLeish: I intend to deal with the cross-border issue. However, at this stage I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland a few minutes ago.

The Scottish variable rate can apply only to the £4,101 to £26,099 band, which is taxed at 23 per cent. According to section 1A of the 1988 Act, the 23 per cent. charge cannot apply to savings income. Thus, the SVR does not apply to savings income. Contrary to what seems to be implied by the amendment, part of the balance of income in excess of £26,100 does not drop down into the space to be taxed at the SVR. In our view, the first half of the amendment is unnecessary.

There are two types of annuity to which the second half of the amendment might conceivably apply. They are what are termed as PAYE annuities, which are taxed under schedule E—that is income from employment—and payments to holders of retirement annuity contracts, which are annual payments taxed under schedule D. Basically, we are talking about pension income, and that has been alluded to by Opposition Members.

In the proposed terms of new subsection (3A), the amendment is unnecessary. Current legislation already achieves what is intended. As Deloitte and Touche made clear in its paper, even it is not sure whether there is a problem with the definition of savings income in the Bill. All that it wanted was an assurance, and I am happy to give that.

The amendment is not so attractive when we come to new subsection (3B). The sort of annuity to which it refers is essentially a form of deferred income. There is no reason why it should not be within the ambit of the tax-gathering power, along with other earned income.

Excluding certain pension income would produce a mismatch with the relief given to Scottish taxpayers on pension contributions. That seems wrong and would arguably be to the disadvantage of other UK-resident taxpayers.

Mr. Heald: Is it not the point that contributions attract tax relief at the current UK rate? The same is not true of the pension in payment, which will be taxed at the current UK rate plus whatever the Scottish tax supplement is. How can that be consistent with the treatment that the Government are giving to savers, which is entirely different? They paid the money in tax at the UK rate, yet they are being exempted from the Scottish tax supplement. The two approaches are unequal. Why are the Government discriminating against pensioners, of all people?

Mr. McLeish: If we take the two annuities that have been implied in the amendments, they would be regarded as pensions. However, the Deloitte and Touche report refers to purchased life annuities. As premiums do not carry tax relief, they are considered as savings and will be excluded.

In Scotland, pensioners will be subject to the powers on deferred income. However, fewer than 15 per cent. of over-65s will be affected and the average impact is £140 for aged taxpayers where the basic rate will be their marginal rate. There is a distinction that we are declaring openly and honestly in relation to savings as against deferred income. We believe that deferred income should be subject to the SVR.

I move on to the question of Inland Revenue extra-statutory concession—that is ESC A11—which is raised by amendment No. 357. It will apply in the normal way, notwithstanding the Bill's provisions. I can give the Committee that assurance. The argument that has been advanced this evening differs from the general issue of the extra-statutory concession.

If the intention is to apply the principles in the ESC to those who move between Scotland and elsewhere in the UK during any tax year, I am not prepared to accept it. It would be an administrative nightmare for employers and the Inland Revenue alike. It would be necessary to revisit Scottish taxpayers' status part way through the tax year. The only fair way to operate the rules in relation to in-year movers is to determine where in the UK they have spent most of the tax year, or where their UK principal home was for most of the tax year. We shall soon be discussing that matter. Clause 71 provides appropriate and fair rules, and nothing more is needed.

Mr. Swinney: How much more of an administrative burden does the Minister believe the information for a split-year concession would be, as measured against the colossal bureaucracy of the days test for every Scottish taxpayer?

Mr. McLeish: I would not accept that proposition. We shall have a chance to respond to it when we come to the specific question. We advise the Committee to vote against the amendments.

Mr. Heald: The Minister's reply was a disappointment. The Opposition have pointed to a gross discrimination against pensioners. People who paid tax at the UK rate will have their position on savings entirely protected, whereas pensioners who have made their contributions on the basis of tax relief for the UK rate are being discriminated against. There is no equality between the two.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said, we are dealing with a complex matter, but one of justice. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said, we are faced with an attack on pensioners. It is, indeed, a breach of faith. As my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) said, an individual pensioner living on a fixed income will be discriminated against when he has set his arrangements for retirement on the basis of certain knowledge that the current UK tax rate will be the contribution tax relief and the basis on which he is taxed. It is a breach of that agreement. We are dissatisfied with the Minister's answer. The answer on split years is equally wrong, giving no consideration to those who wish to exercise mobility of labour. On that basis, we shall press the amendment to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 69 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 70

SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): I beg to move amendment No. 408, in page 30, line 26, leave out 'tax–varying' and insert 'tax–increasing'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 366, in page 30, line 28, leave out '2000–01' and insert '2002–03'.

Mr. Gorrie: Our amendment would replace "tax-varying" with "tax-increasing". Opposition Members in the Scottish Parliament could propose a reduction in taxes, but only members of the Government could propose increased taxes. According to my hon. Friends, who are more experienced than I, that is the practice in this House. In giving Opposition Members as much freedom as possible, it would be reasonable to allow them to propose tax-reducing measures.

The amendment might appeal to Conservatives in particular. They are concerned about tax raising. If they succeed in having Members elected to the Scottish Parliament, they could propose tax-reducing measures. I am confused about where the Conservatives are coming from. Leaks to the press suggest that their leader is taking them in a new direction and that devolution and all associated with it is a good thing, although it should apply to the English as well as to the Scots. But today we are hearing the same old story: anything that the Scottish Parliament will be able to do must be bad.

Dr. Fox: The hon. Gentleman was not even here.

Mr. Gorrie: I beg your pardon.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is addressing the Chair in all remarks.

Mr. Gorrie: I beg your pardon, Sir Alan. I was being interrupted.

The amendment is straightforward. It is not of huge moment, but the conduct of the Scottish Parliament would be improved marginally if Opposition Members were allowed to propose a reduction in taxation.

We do not support the Conservatives' proposal which would deny the Scottish Parliament the right to introduce tax-varying powers as soon as it wished. If it is to be a serious Parliament and is to have those powers, it should be allowed to use them.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to ask about retrospection. What will be the combined effect of subsections (3) and (4) of clause 70? Subsection (3)(a) suggests that a determination of the UK Parliament may be made after the beginning of the year without it expressly being stated that such determination is necessarily to be effected in the year in question. Will not that have the consequence that, in theory, the tax-varying power could be applied retrospectively? In the hands of lawyers, that would be more than an arcane point.

I should also like to ask about double tax treaty relief. The vast majority of UK double tax treaties specifically refer to UK income tax. The provision that Scottish income tax will also qualify for double tax relief must be clarified. Clauses 69, 70 and 71 appear to replace the non-varied rate with a varied rate for Scottish taxpayers, but would the UK income tax rate still apply? Those two questions are rather significant.

Mr. Grieve: I was surprised at the comments of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie). I understood that the amendment would limit the power of the Scottish Executive to move a motion to increase taxes. That perhaps was not a total surprise because of the reality in which the Bill will operate, but it was still a considerable surprise in the light of the representations made by the Government in the referendum campaign.

Many hon. Members will have no difficulty in agreeing that in the Scottish Parliament the Opposition should be able to table motions to reduce taxation, but that is not what would be achieved. I stand to be corrected, but my reading of this simple alteration is that the Scottish Executive would be allowed to move a motion to vary tax only upwards.

Mr. Wallace: It would mean that only a member of the Scottish Executive could propose a tax-increasing measure whereas any Member of the Scottish Parliament could propose a tax-reducing measure, which is precisely the position in this House.

Mr. Grieve: If that is what the Liberal Democrats seek, a further amendment is required.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman has not read the amendment properly.

Mr. Grieve: I beg to differ.

Amendment No. 366 would postpone for one year the implementation of the tax-varying powers. It is not an attempt to curb the power of the Scottish Parliament: it reflects the debate that we have had this evening. It is abundantly clear that if the tax-varying powers are to operate successfully, they will require careful attention. The people in Scotland who will have to pay will need to prepare carefully, and may decide to save into pensions or into equities. Given the minutiae that the Inland Revenue has presented us with, it is abundantly clear that accountants and tax lawyers will have a field day interpreting these provisions.

I hope that the Minister recognises that I have accepted that we must smooth the way for these changes. The provisions must be seen in the context of the real changes in the relationship between Edinburgh and Westminster. These tax measures add an extra and complex layer to what is already an extremely complex period of change.

It is clear from the White Paper on devolution that the Scottish Parliament is intended to be up and running over a period from May 1999 onwards. In those circumstances, the tax-varying powers should be postponed for 12 months, so that we can experience how the relationship between the Scottish Parliament and the United Kingdom Parliament and Government operates in practice. We trust that the Scottish Parliament will have a long life, so that seems a small concession to prudence. It would be a worthwhile concession, given the burden that will have to be borne by those in office.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am puzzled about amendment No. 366, which would delay the change in the Scottish taxation provisions. Does it mean that the Conservative party has abandoned any attempt to lower the level of taxation that the Scottish Parliament can raise? Has it merely abandoned its attempt to do so until 2002-03, or has it abandoned any hope of doing so at any time?

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) misunderstands the position. We may argue in the future for a reduction in taxes in Scotland. We are concerned about the transitional period when these complex constitutional measures are being introduced. They will undoubtedly need to be smoothed through. I realise that the hon. Gentleman may not want them to be smoothed through, although he often argues to the contrary.

On a number of occasions, the hon. Gentlemen the has told the House that it is particularly important that the Scottish Parliament works for the benefit of the Scottish people. Assuming that he wants it to be up and running effectively, it may be more sensible for the stages to be introduced gradually. The hon. Gentleman has attended some of the debate, but not all of it, and if he had listened to the details of the tax principles, he would realise that there will be complex problems.

We take the view that there is no point adding to those problems. It may benefit the operation of the Scottish Parliament and smooth its relations with the House if, when it is up and running, there are no tax-varying powers for 12 months and those changes are held over until the following year.

Mr. McAllion: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his elevation to the Opposition Front Bench. He certainly improves the quality, although that is not very difficult. If he wants to postpone the tax-varying powers of the Scottish Parliament for 12 months, why does amendment

No. 366 postpone it for 24 months, from 2000–01 to 2002-03? Surely, if that is what he is trying to achieve, the amendment is wrong.

Mr. Grieve: I think not. The amendment would leave out 2000-01 and would insert 2002-03.

Mr. McAllion: That is two years.

Mr. Grieve: If that is the case, all the better. The purpose of the amendment is to allow a transitional period during which there would be no tax-varying powers.

Mr. McAllion: How long is that period?

Mr. Grieve: The amendment would introduce the powers in 2002-03.

Mr. McAllion: How long is that?

Mr. Grieve: If I may say to the hon. Gentleman, we have still not had complete clarity from the Government on how the transitional period from 1999 will operate.

I ask the Minister to consider the desirability of a transitional period before the tax-varying powers are introduced. I suggest that postponing the introduction of those powers until 2002 would be a valuable change.

Mr. Swinney: Before the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) intervened, I was going to welcome the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) to the Opposition Front Bench. As a result of his rapid promotion to the Front Bench, I thought that my hon. Friends the Members for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) and for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) may think that it was time for young men to be put into the limelight of debate, but perhaps they were not paying careful attention. Having heard the hon. Gentleman's contribution, I do not think that he is a threat to some of his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) referred to the ability of Back Benchers to propose a motion to reduce taxation. That is a sensible measure and reflects the established procedure of the House. It would enable Back Benchers outwith the Scottish Executive to utilise the powers that are given to the Parliament. In a strange way, it may give Conservatives something to do and on which to focus when they get into the Scottish Parliament. They could try to challenge the other parties, which they think are determined to use the tax-varying powers only to increase taxation.

Amendment No. 366 would delay the implementation of these powers. We must bear in mind some practical realities. The Parliament will be elected in May 1999, and it will assume its responsibilities in 2000. A party making a tax-varying proposal at the election in May 1999 should be confident of delivering that proposal in the time scale offered by the legislation. Such a proposal in an election manifesto would not stand up to scrutiny on the hustings if it could not be delivered in the time scale provided by the Bill.

The legislation enables parties to formulate their proposals and to judge whether they are able to implement them in the proposed time scale. I am not clear whether the Conservatives want to delay the implementation of these powers for 12 months or 24 months, but it seems to be more than 12. The amendment is symptomatic of the arguments that we have heard from Conservatives recently. They want to put obstacles in the way of the Parliament assuming the powers in the Bill, and to delay the Scottish people assuming responsibility for a proportion of their own affairs. The sooner the Scottish people are able to exercise their discretion over these matters of policy the better. I have no time for amendment No. 366.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield referred to the need for gradual change. Some of us are concerned that gradual change has been slow in coming. The people of Scotland have decisively voted for the Parliament to be set up on this basis, so we should not impede it from assuming the powers that it was promised.

Mr. McAllion: I did not want to speak in this short debate, but I felt that the Conservative Front-Bench contribution required a response from Back Benchers. I regard the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), who has been elevated to the Front Bench, as one of the brightest and best Opposition Members—certainly given what he has said during our debates on the Bill—but, when he cannot even tell the difference between the year 2000 and the year 2002, assuming that it is 12 months, we have to worry about the quality of the Conservative party and the likelihood of its returning to office. It is clear that even the brightest and best cannot count. But perhaps the Conservatives have an aversion to counting following the last general election, when results went badly against them.

Let us consider the substance of the debate. Hon. Members want the elected Scottish Parliament to be able to introduce a Budget in the first year in which it takes over—a distinctive Budget: the Budget of the Scottish Parliament, rather than simply a Scottish Office block that is decided here and handed down. They want a definite budget, which will draw its strength from the mandate received by Members of the Scottish Parliament from the Scottish people.

I cannot see the purpose of the amendment, other than dog-in-the-manger opposition to what the Scottish people have already voted for. A referendum has taken place, and a huge number of Scottish people voted to give the Parliament a tax-varying power. The Parliament will be elected in May 1999; there will be almost a "shadow" year during which it can come to terms with the new responsibilities that it will take. In that time, accountants and tax lawyers will be able to engage in consultations with the Parliament on what its first Budget may entail. But if the parties elected to that Parliament have been elected on the basis of a manifesto that states that it should vary the rate of income tax in Scotland—whether by 1p, 2p or 3p—by increasing it, that is democracy, and the Scottish Administration will have the right to introduce such a measure in their first Budget.

7.30 pm

Mr. Grieve: I take in good part the hon. Gentleman's views about my mathematical abilities, but let us confine ourselves to the principle for a moment. Surely the issue is not the Scottish Parliament's ability to deal with the matter; surely it is the fact that all the other associated bodies in Scotland—and the people, and the accountants, and everyone else—will have to prepare for the change. That is not a political but a practical issue, and that is why we sought the postponement.

Mr. McAllion: I understand that, since 11 September 1997, it has been clear to everyone in Scotland that the change is about to happen. That means that there are two and a half years in which to prepare for the change before the Scottish Administration introduce their first Budget in April 2000. I do not see the need for us to allow the extra two years that the Conservatives are suggesting. The fact is that they do not like the change: they would prefer the Scottish people not to have voted for it, and they would prefer the Scottish people to elect to the Scottish Parliament a party committed to not implementing it. That, however, is up to the Scottish people. It is not up to amendments tabled in the House of Commons to prevent the Scottish people from electing a party that will introduce the changes contained in its manifesto.

In an earlier debate, someone said that the proportional representation election system—which might lead to a coalition Government here—would lead to taxes being increased through the back door against the wishes of the Scottish people. Hon. Members seem to misunderstand the nature of that system. It means that, unless more than 50 per cent. of people back the Administration, that Administration will not be able to increase taxes in the Scottish Parliament.

It is almost like the old ladies in the Carlton club who said, when they heard in 1951 that a Labour Government had been elected with an overwhelming majority, "The country will not stand for this." They did not understand that the country had just voted for a Labour Government. The Tories have not yet understood that Scotland as a country has voted for a Scottish Parliament with tax-varying powers, and may well vote for parties that will use those powers when they are in government. There is no reason on God's earth why any hon. Member should stop or delay the exercise of democracy in Scotland. That is what devolution is all about.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is always very keen to bring my hon. Friends and me to task when we get things wrong. Will he tell us again who were elected to office in 1951?

Mr. McAllion: I believe that the Conservative party was elected, following the policies that a Labour Government had produced in 1945. If I remember rightly, the Conservatives adopted those policies lock, stock and barrel—much as new Labour has done with Tory policies.

The point that I am trying to make is that, under a system of democracy, the people decide how taxes should be levied in their country. That is why I am keen for my hon. Friend the Minister to oppose amendment No. 366, which I consider anti-democratic and very much in the nature of the Conservative party as it has been for the past 25 years. Sooner or later, the Conservatives will have to learn the lesson that they cannot continue to preach to the Scottish people that they do not know what they are doing, and that if they vote for tax-varying powers there is something wrong with them. Of course there is not; there is something wrong with the Conservative party, if it cannot accept the decision of the Scottish people and continues to try to oppose it in the House of Commons with useless amendments such as this.

As for amendment No. 408, I do not agree that a Scottish Parliament should operate in the same way as this Parliament. Here, the Executive has the right to raise taxes, but the Opposition can move motions only for reductions in taxes. I did not know before that that was the position here, but it is, and I hope that it will not apply in the Scottish Parliament. I feel that Committees in the Scottish Parliament should be very different from Committees in the House of Commons, and that the nature of sovereignty in the Scottish Parliament should be very different from the operation of sovereignty here. I do not want an all-powerful Executive in the Scottish Parliament that will do much as it pleases, like the Executive here. I want powerful Committees that have the right to initiate legislation.

I do not see why the Finance Committee, or its Chairman, should not be able to propose an alternative Budget. If the Budget can gain the support of Members of the Scottish Parliament, what is wrong with that? It is a different way of working from the way in which this Parliament works, but surely, for goodness sake, as we enter the next millennium we can move away from the 19th-century ideas that dominate the operation of this Parliament. Surely we can move into the new millennium along with the rest of the world, rather than being locked in the 19th century.

I do not think that my hon. Friend the Minister should accept either amendment. Both are intended to interfere with the rights of the Scottish people to govern themselves.

Sir Robert Smith: Yet again, the hon. Gentleman fails to understand that, without our amendment, the arrangements will be even more restrictive than those governing this place. The Government propose that only the Executive can do anything when it comes to tax powers; we seek, at least in part, to widen that ability to the whole Parliament.

Mr. McAllion: I did not understand that. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing it to my attention: if I had known that that was what the Government were about, I might have made a very different speech. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Minister, however, assures me that that is not the case, and, as he is such a nice man, I am prepared to trust him, if not others.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman keeps referring to 19th-century practices in this place. Does he not think that that is a bit unfair? I cannot remember anything quite as modern as the 19th century here.

Mr. McAllion: I think that this place had its heyday in the 19th century. In those days, there was a coherent set of principles to which both Government and Opposition adhered—liberal capitalism. The 20th century produced different views about how society should be organised, and the emergence of the Labour party. I rejoice in such differences, however, because they continue to divide Government and Opposition. I resent the idea that we should all come together again in one big consensus and accept the new world order, the new capitalism and so on.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going well wide of the amendment, in a debate that allows a limited amount of time.

Mr. McAllion: I am indeed going dangerously wide of the amendment, so I shall return to it.

If amendment No. 408 increases the powers of the Scottish Parliament over the Executive, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to accept it. If it does not, I ask him to reject it.

Mrs. Laing: First, let me correct something that was said by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion).

The Chairman: I hope that it is something that was in order.

Mrs. Laing: It was not absolutely in order, Sir Alan, but the hon. Gentleman is way ahead of his time if he thinks that there are any ladies in the Carlton club.

The Chairman: Order. I gave the hon. Lady a hint, and I think that she should have taken it.

Mr. Salmond: There are women in the Tory party.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Gentleman makes the point very well.

Let me turn to clause 70(5). With all due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), I must agree with the interpretation of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) of his amendment. It seems to me that to change the words

"only a member of the Scottish Executive may move a motion for a tax-varying resolution"

"only a member of the Scottish Executive may move a motion for a tax-increasing resolution" is a good idea, because it suggests that any other Member of the Scottish Parliament can propose a tax-reducing resolution. The amendment is good because only a Conservative Member of the Scottish Parliament is likely to move a tax-reducing resolution. History shows that only Conservatives aim at reducing taxes. Of course the amendment will be irrelevant when Conservatives control the Scottish Executive, and I am confident that they will.

Mr. Salmond: The Tory amendment delays any attempt to reduce taxes for another two years, and, in opposing the Liberal Democrat amendment, the Conservatives seek to delay a Conservative Opposition's ability to reduce taxes. It seems that Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen do not think that they will reduce taxes in government or in opposition and that implies that they do not think that they will be there at all.

Mrs. Laing: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but his interpretation is wrong. There is complete consistency in our attitude to the two amendments. Amendment No. 366 to change 2000–01 to 2002–03 aims to give a degree of certainty and stability to the Scottish people. Despite the way in which they voted in the referendum, the Scottish people do not deserve to have their tax and financial affairs and their political background changed every month or so.

Mr. Ancram: My hon. Friend makes interesting comments. I have some difficulty working my way through the double negative in the Liberal amendment. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a typical example of a woolly Liberal Democrat amendment? Would not it have been much easier to say that Standing Orders shall ensure that any Member of the Scottish Parliament may move a motion for a tax-decreasing resolution? That would have been totally clear.

Mrs. Laing: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend; it would have been much clearer. However, I give the Liberal Democrats some credit for doing the best that they can in the circumstances. Perhaps they do not have the faith to imagine that anyone will ever want to propose a tax-decreasing resolution. I certainly cannot imagine any Liberal Democrat introducing such a measure.

Mr. McLeish: I shall respond first to the questions that were posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He asked about the combined effect of clause 70(3) and (4) to allow a Scottish rate to be applied retrospectively. The Law Society of Scotland made that point and the degree of retrospection that it suggested is not possible. I want to give my hon. Friend and the Law Society of Scotland a more detailed answer. My hon. Friend also asked about double tax treaty relief. Double tax relief credits will be allowed against income tax that is paid by Scottish taxpayers at any varied rate that has been determined by the Scottish Parliament.

Amendment No. 408 would indirectly, through the mechanism of Standing Orders, allow a resolution to lower income tax in Scotland to be moved by any Member of the Scottish Parliament while any tax-increasing resolution could be moved only by a member of the Scottish Executive. I do not accept that there is any logic in distinguishing between the process of moving tax-increasing or tax-reducing resolutions. The key point of principle is whether tax resolutions that are to be considered by the Scottish Parliament should be moved only by members of the Executive or whether it should be open to any Member of the Scottish Parliament to move such a resolution.

In reaching a decision on these matters, we have been guided by the Westminster model and by the need for the Executive to maintain control over the sources of their income. For example, the Bill does nothing to prevent general tax relief motions being discussed and voted on in the Parliament. I have had to truncate my response, but what I have outlined seems a sensible, pragmatic approach while the proposal in amendment No. 408 would be less so. I ask the Committee to reject that amendment.

Amendment No. 366 would effectively prevent the tax-varying power being exercised before the financial year 2001-02. If Labour were the governing party in the Scottish Parliament it would not use the tax-varying power during the lifetime of the current UK Parliament, which may take us to 2002-03. However, that is not a reason for statutorily preventing the Parliament from exercising the power in its first full year of operation, not least because I am not prepared to pre-judge the Scottish electorate's decision in the forthcoming Scottish parliamentary elections. It will be for each of the Scottish parties to make its proposals on tax and it will be for the voters to decide on which party and, therefore, which tax policy they wish to see. The Westminster Government should not deny the Scottish electorate that choice until 2002. I urge the Committee to reject the amendment. The Government are on target to make sure that the requisite provision is in place by 6 April 2000.

Mr. Gorrie: We do not accept the Minister's argument, but the issue is not of such substance that we wish to push the amendment to a vote. Perhaps the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) is right and we should have had a more far-reaching amendment.

It being a quarter to Eight o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

No. 379, in page 31, leave out lines 25 and 26.

No. 414, in page 31, line 26, at end insert 'but excludes an oil rig'.

Mr. Swinney: I notice that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and his hon. Friends support amendment No. 341. As a member of a minority party in this place, but not a minority party in Scotland, I am always grateful for support, but the right hon. Gentleman can speak to that amendment for himself.

I heard over the weekend that the Secretary of State for Scotland is worried that some people may want to destabilise the Scottish Parliament. I also have concerns that the Parliament may be destabilised, not by forces from within my party, because we want the Parliament to succeed, but by the Government not taking full and genuine account of the real difficulties that the legislation will create. Our amendments in this group are designed to strengthen the Parliament by creating a clear and uncomplicated base on which it can found its actions.

The clause and the amendments seek to define who should pay any different rate of taxation that is applied by the Scottish Parliament. The Government propose that those who are resident in the UK for tax purposes and have their closest connections to Scotland should pay any different taxation that is levied by the Scottish Parliament. To define that closest connection, the Government propose to establish a days test that sets out to determine how many days a person spends in Scotland. If he spends more days in Scotland than in the rest of the UK, he will be eligible to pay any different rate of tax.

In addition, the Government rightly propose that Scottish Members of the Westminster Parliament, Scottish Members of the European Parliament and Members of the Scottish Parliament will also have to pay. It might be worth trying to add to the net Members of this Parliament who speak repeatedly on Scottish matters. By that device, Scotland might at least receive some modest compensation for some of the things that are said by the right hon. Member for Devizes and his hon. Friends.

My concern with the Government's proposals is that they are a sledgehammer to crack a nut. It is difficult to work out exactly why they are taking the steps that are set out in the clause. I assume that they are trying to create a clear mechanism that can withstand attack either politically or by tax avoidance. The Government are prepared to countenance different tax regimes in the United Kingdom and should bear in mind the fact that there is likely to be uncertainty about who pays.

That is nothing new. Each year, band D council tax payers in the village of Meigle in my constituency pay £730 in council tax to Perth and Kinross council. A couple of miles along the road, band D council tax payers in the first farm cottages in the Angus part of my constituency pay £670 in council tax. I do not detect many of my constituents contemplating moving that short distance to be relieved of a higher band D council tax, and the Government are perfectly happy to have a situation where different council tax rates are part of the fabric of decision making in the UK.

Mr. Wallace: Is the hon. Gentleman absolutely sure that some of his constituents in Perth and Kinross have not moved into Angus to set up a pub, on the same basis as people seem to be teeming into the constituency of the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins)?

Mr. Swinney: In the tradition of hon. Members representing North Tayside, I do not spend much time in pubs, so I cannot substantiate the hon. and learned Gentleman's point, but I shall certainly devote considerable time to finding out whether there is any demand.

The Government may be trying to create a mechanism by which any leakage of taxation due to the Scottish Parliament is obstructed. I suspect that they are trying to put obstacles in the way of individuals who move home from south Scotland to north England to avoid any additional taxation that is levied in Scotland, where they continue to be in employment. If so—I should be interested in the Minister's argument about the Government's motivation—the Government are using a sledgehammer to crack a nut.

The maximum additional tax burden that is envisaged under clause 69 is £660 per person in each tax year of assessment. Conveyancing, transportation and refurbishment costs of moving from Scotland to England to avoid any additional tax burden seem fairly excessive when placed alongside a maximum additional tax burden of £660. The number of cases—this is an absolutely fundamental point—to which the exercise of tabulating the days spent here and there will be relevant, will be utterly insignificant, but I fear that, in setting the legislation off in that direction, the Government will place a substantial burden on many, if not all, businesses and individuals, who will be asked to establish for themselves the means, methods and, inevitably, costs of proving that they are, or are not, affected by the test.

A very small number of people are likely to be affected, but I suspect that, invariably, all potential Scottish taxpayers will have to have sufficient information and documentation to prove whether they are eligible for the test. I therefore hope that the Government will think again about the provision and accept that there is a simpler way in which to define who should be in the Scottish Parliament's tax net.

The amendments that have been tabled by my hon. Friends and me are designed to change the test on whether an individual is liable to pay any additional taxation, based on the individual's principal UK residence. We aim to make the test fairly easy to undertake. We have included in our amendments, specifically in amendment No. 342, the characteristics of the definition that could be formulated. We suggest that terminology such as would be of benefit in establishing the rules that lay down the meaning of principal UK residence.

"habitual or family abode, his permanent home or the residence with which he has the closest personal or economic relations"

Amendment No. 342 also refers to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development model double taxation treaty. That reference is designed to give the authorities that are responsible for determining the collection of any tax that is separately set by the Scottish Parliament appropriate guidance on definitions and when they have to seek alternative opinions on whether individual cases comply with the legislation's definitions. In that respect, I should fully accept it if the Government wished to take away the amendments, to reflect on their contents and to discuss them more widely with the industry to arrive at an absolutely watertight definition, but our amendments try to reach the best possible definition.

One of the problems with the Government's proposal of "closest economic connection" is that it is a new tax term which has no established standing in the body of tax law. Having worked my way through many of those definitions during a previous life with Scottish Amicable and having ploughed through the double taxation treaties between the UK and various European states, I am thoroughly of the opinion that we do not need any new tax terms to add to the litany of others in policy and guidance.

On amendment No. 343, in the event that the Minister is not persuaded by my arguments about removing the days test, I raise one particular anomaly that must be addressed by the Government. According to the definitions in the Bill, an individual who lives in Carlisle but who works in Dumfries—I am glad to see the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) in the Chamber—will not be eligible to pay any additional taxation in Scotland because he or she will be deemed not to have spent a day in Scotland, according to the rules of the Bill.

According to my understanding of the clause, that analysis is okay so long as the person is a day-shift worker. If the person is a night-shift worker, he or she will start and finish the day in Scotland and, according to the rules, will be eligible to pay additional taxation, if it is levied. I am sure that the Minister will ask me to give the number of cases to which I refer, along with an explanation of the number of publicans in Scotland who are planning to reside in Westmorland, but I do not have an answer. However, I respectfully ask the Minister if he has an answer to my question: how many people will be in the net of the days test?

Amendment No. 343 would expressly deal with the anomaly that I have raised. It may not seem like a big issue, but I doubt whether it is of any less significance than the scope of the days test that has been constructed by the Government as a unique part of this legislation.

I hope that the Minister will thoroughly address the issues that I have raised and which will, I am sure, be raised by others. In doing so, will he specifically set out the position of offshore workers in relation to the days test? I simply cannot work out the answer to that point.

There is a danger that the Government, in their zeal to close loopholes, to answer every dilemma, understandably, to knock back every pedantic Conservative attack on their Bill and to ensure that they have thought of everything, pass into law some points that have the sniff of complexity and bureaucracy around them. This clause is an example of that. I hope that the Government will recognise that the amendments have been tabled to assist in addressing practical difficulties in implementing the Bill. They are designed to try to minimise needless bureaucracy that will be faced by individuals or businesses in trying to comply with the Government's tests. The amendments have been tabled to strengthen and to clarify the legislation and I hope that the Government are able to respond to them in that way.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and his Scottish National party colleagues have done the Committee and the discussion of the Bill a service by tabling these important amendments on the tax net. Following up immediately his point about the North sea, I shall ask a direct question. What about the person who works on an oil rig? Will the North sea be considered, in terms of clause 111, as "adjacent to Scotland"? There is a legal problem here, and perhaps tonight would be the time to clarify it.

What is the position of a Scottish soldier who has married quarters, let us say, in Arbroath but who served six months in Northern Ireland and three months in Catterick, Pirbright or somewhere else in England? What are the implications for him in terms of tax-raising powers? The whole issue of service men, who, by the very nature of their job, move around, has to be clarified.

There is the question of holidays. If a person takes his or her holidays abroad in the first part of the year, that could make that person into a Scottish rather than a UK taxpayer, if there is no principal home in England. It may seem that I am being pedantic about all this, but may I refer the House to my question to a former Prime Minister? I asked him to "ensure that legislation presented to this House is not drafted in obscure language."

He replied:

"I have every sympathy with, the hon. Member's objective. However, I am afraid that, in order to achieve precision in legislation which is complex and often technical, it is not always possible to avoid an impression of obscurity."

To which I replied:

"I accept the fact that the Parliamentary draftsmen must try to prevent those who would pretend to misunderstand from doing so, but is it not also important that we laity should understand legislation?"

The Prime Minister—Harold Macmillan—gave a classic and well-remembered reply, which gave me my come-uppance:

"I know that this is a difficult problem. I would remind the House of the very wise words of Sir James Stephen, one of our greatest authorities, who pointed out that since legislation is often the subject of litigation it is absolutely necessary not only that it should appear to be simple to those who read it in good faith, but actually precise. That is a very difficult art. Many things are simple. Let us take the sentence: 'When John met his uncle in the street he took off his hat.' That is a clear sentence, but it is capable of at least six different meanings."

Those were the days when Prime Minister's questions were heard in total silence. He continued:

"The point about legislation is that the courts have to interpret it in litigation based upon it, and it is therefore essential that it should be not so much simple as precise."

I think that that is the difficulty with clause 71.

8 pm

My friend—and he really was my friend—the late Brian O'Malley followed up my question with a question on the explanatory memorandum to a Finance Bill. The Prime Minister replied:

"I have every sympathy with the purpose of the hon. Gentleman. I think that Finance Bills dealing with a large number of subjects and sometimes fairly simple provisions seem very complicated. What we tried to do in 1962, where there was a fairly complicated provision, was to issue a special White Paper to explain that particular part. Other Finance Bills are fairly simple and involve the raising or reduction of the Income Tax or something of the kind. Therefore, I take account of what the hon. Member says."

So it went on, with a final question from the then shadow Chancellor, James Callaghan:

"Has the Prime Minister looked at the Finance Bill this year to see that it took us nearly 20 Clauses and seven Schedules to get rid of Schedule A? Would not that have been a very appropriate subject for an explanatory memorandum?"—[Official Report, 4 July 1963; Vol. 680, c. 583-85.]

The reason I have gone into such detail is that things have not altered all that much. We must take into account the fact that lawyers will try to extract every single penny possible from legislation. My fear is that the interaction between Holyrood and Westminster will be a lawyers' paradise.

I want to ask the Minister about the briefing that his advisers will have had from the Law Society. It states:

"With regard to Clause 71(1) the present position for UK tax is that strictly an individual should be taxed in the UK on the whole income of a year of assessment although only present in the UK for part of the year but under Extra Statutory Concession (A11) such a person is only taxed on income for the part of the year during which he is actually resident in the UK. There is, however, no provision for splitting the tax year in the Bill and it is submitted that this would be helpful since, without such a provision, for example, it appears necessary for an English employer of a Scot moving to England, say, in the second half of the tax year to operate PAYE at the Scottish basic rate for the whole year or if moved from England to Scotland after 1 month of the tax year would have to collect the Scots tax on English earnings of that month."

That may seem very dry, but in reality it is basic and very important. The Scottish Office has had notice of the matter from the Law Society and I expect some sort of response this evening.

The briefing continues:

"In respect of Clause 71(2)(b) it is suggested that time spent in Scotland alone is not a sufficient test if someone has his or her principal residence in other parts of the UK. For example, if a tax payer, having his own principal residence in England, but living in the Borders with family a few miles away, but across the Border, visits Scotland each weekend, arriving Friday and departing early Monday, and all public holidays and annual leave were spent in Scotland it might only require a fairly short additional period (say, 15 weeks) of work, perhaps as a Sales Representative or otherwise in Scotland to be subject to Scottish tax and vice versa in reverse for Scottish residents. It is suggested that there could be a number of people in this situation, e.g. professional sportsmen, particularly in the Borders area, who might, somewhat inadvertently, find themselves subject to Scottish tax and might not realise that were the case, which could have penalty consequences under the Self Assessment regime."

Those matters are nuts and bolts, but they are not unusual nuts and bolts; they are practical.

"In relation to Clause 71(2)(b) and (3), Inland Revenue leaflet (IR20) states that a visitor to the UK is treated as resident in the UK if physically present in the UK for 183 days of any tax year. The result of Clause 71(2)(b) and 71(3) could be that a foreign visitor might be subject to Scottish tax if in Scotland for only 92 days out of that 183 test period, whereas a permanent resident of another part of the UK coming to Scotland would have to spend 183 days in Scotland before being subject to Scottish tax.

It is suggested, therefore, that the definition of 'Scottish tax payer' should exclude persons ordinarily resident abroad unless in Scotland for 183 days to prevent foreign visitors being discriminated against."

Do the Government accept the Law Society's view? If not, why not?

I have spoken at length to both the Law Society and the Institute of Chartered Accountants. The ICA says:

"Clause 71(1) indicates the requirements to be met by a 'Scottish taxpayer' and hence who is liable to pay the Scots income tax. This is based upon the test of 'residence' which is a recognised test in deciding whether an individual has a liability to UK income tax. If the test of residence is met, a taxpayer will be liable to Scots income tax throughout the fiscal year. However, if a 'Scottish taxpayer' moves permanently to, say, Wales in October should his new Welsh employer be required to withhold Scottish tax under PAYE?"

The ICA thinks not. It recommends that

"the existing Extra Statutory Concession A11 should be included in the law to ensure that a person is only taxed on income for the part of the year during which he is actually resident in Scotland."

What do the Government say about that?

The ICA continues:

"Although it may be simpler to apply the 'Scottish taxpayer' test of residence for a whole fiscal year, it will add to the complexities of PAYE for those who move to other regions. To this end we trust that proposed guidance on the operation of an 'S' code for PAYE will be issued at an early stage for consultation with employers and other interested parties.

As a matter of interest in 71(1)(a) is 'an individual who . . . is treated as resident in the UK' the same as an individual who is actually resident? We do not think so."

I want to know what the Government think. This will be a matter for litigation; it will be a field day for lawyers unless the issue is clarified.

On clause 71(3)(b), the ICA says:

"One test in defining residence in clause 71 is whether an individual has his 'principal UK home' located in Scotland. This does not fit particularly well with the capital gains tax definition of principal or main residence."

People who are subject to capital gains tax legislation can afford very good tax lawyers. Tax lawyers will make a meal of the provisions unless they are cleared up.

Mr. Wallace: Does the hon. Gentleman think that people will engage tax lawyers to make a meal for, at most, £660 a year?

Mr. Dalyell: From my experience of Finance Bills, what tax lawyers and their lobbies can do is amazing. I am a relative layman in such matters, but I have experience of several Finance Bills. I do not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman has served on Finance Bill Committees.

Mr. Wallace: I have.

Mr. Dalyell: Then the hon. and learned Gentlemen must know what difficulties can be raised.

The ICA brief continues:

"Equally clause 71(4)(a) uses a test for an individual's day of presence which is not the same as that used for a UK test of residence and other related tests. The UK test is whether one is present at midnight whereas this test would treat one nonetheless as being present in Scotland. For example, if a person takes a morning flight to Brussels and stays there for two nights, then returning to Scotland using this test the person is out of Scotland for 1 day but in terms of s. 193 ICTA 1988 out of the UK for 2 days."

How are definitions to be made the same as those used in tax legislation to prevent unnecessary disputes?

The final point covered by the ICA brief is appeals. It says:

"Under the existing residence rules questions about a taxpayer's status can frequently take considerable time and expertise to negotiate. This involves both the Inland Revenue and the taxpayer in a relatively expensive process. To ensure as efficient a process as possible, particularly when only 3 per cent. of some income is at stake, we trust the Inland Revenue will establish a central processing unit at, for example, FICO Scotland."

Those are all seemingly dry details. They amount to what some of us have called the dewiring of the United Kingdom. During the debates on Welsh devolution, my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) has repeatedly talked of the unbundling of the United Kingdom. They are the difficult issues that have to be dealt with. They may seem dry, but they are very important and will be the source of endless litigation and trouble if we do not sort them out.

Mr. Ancram: The details that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has referred to may sound dry, but they are vital. He revisited a kinder, gentler time in the House of Commons when questions were answered and debate was real. If he is looking for a lack of obscurity in legislation after 34 years, I fear that he will have to wait a lot longer.

The points that the hon. Gentleman has made are important because the arguments about whether someone is liable to pay tax are centred not on how many people will pay but on whether it is fair that they should pay. The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) asked whether anyone would go to a tax lawyer over a sum as small as £630 or so. That is an extraordinary suggestion. We cannot decide whether someone is being rightly or wrongly taxed on the amount that they are being asked to pay. That is the Leona Helmsley line—only the little people pay taxes.

The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) said that he thought that we support one of his amendments. He may find that we are supporting part of his amendment. We are not on all fours with him. I have also found that the amendment paper describes me as a doctor in some places. I assure the Committee that I have not taken medical qualifications. I leave that expertise to my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox).

The hon. Members for Linlithgow and for North Tayside have rightly pointed out that the issues that we are debating will determine whether the system of taxation will work fairly. We talked earlier about the complexities of collection. We must have a clear definition of who pays. There must be no areas of doubt or confusion. I have told the Minister of my disappointment at his knocking back of every amendment. I hope that he can cast aside his prejudice on these amendments and think seriously about the impact on the Bill of leaving the confusion that exists at the moment.

Amendment No. 370 is slightly different from the other Conservative amendments in the group. It would prevent businesses in Scotland from facing a different tax regime from those in the rest of the United Kingdom. That was the clear aim of the White Paper. If I have read the complicated Inland Revenue paper lodged in the Library this afternoon correctly, it confirms the impression given in the Bill that unincorporated small businesses would be liable to pay any additional tax raised by the Parliament. The Inland Revenue paper refers to partnerships in particular. Sole traders and partnerships appear to receive different treatment from incorporated businesses. It cannot be fair that payment of the tax depends on whether a trader is incorporated. I hope that the Minister will consider the amendment carefully and will be able to accept it in principle. I am always prepared to accept that my drafting may not be perfect, but I should be delighted if he is able to promise serious consideration of it.

We run into difficulties with the definitions of the terms used in the Bill. Phrases in clause 1 such as "principal home", "places of residence" and "main place of residence" have not been used before in United Kingdom income tax legislation. A recent paper by Deloitte and Touche confirmed that. There are uncertainties about definitions. We can all pull out examples. Under the Bill, an employee of a Scottish company who owned a house in Edinburgh but was seconded to London for one year, where he stayed in a rented flat, would presumably be considered a Scottish taxpayer because his principal home was in Edinburgh, even though he performed no duties of employment in Scotland during that period. That immediately raises a substantial question about fairness and the grounds for taxation. I hope that the Minister will look closely at the terms.

Amendments Nos. 371, 373, 374, 377, 372 and 378 are probing amendments. We are trying to find out what is meant by the terms, to understand how the tax will impact on individuals. I hope that the Minister will explain why new terminology has been sought. If ever there has been a field day for lawyers, it is when legislation uses new terms of which there are no definitions in existing law. I suspect that lawyers are rubbing their hands in anticipation and planning their holidays in exotic parts of the world as a result of the work that will stem from the Bill.

Let us consider the example of a Scot whose family home is in Scotland but who is transferred to the London office of his company. Not wanting to move his family south, he spends his weekends in Scotland. Those of us who travel on the aeroplane see such people flying down to London on a Monday morning and returning on a Friday evening. Under the Bill, the Monday and the Friday will be counted as days in Scotland, even though the man is working in London on those days. He will be deemed to have spent four of the seven days of the week in Scotland, even though he spent five days of the week working in London. Even though his work is entirely outside Scotland, he will be liable to pay Scottish tax. Amendment No. 376 is an attempt to deal with what we regard as a patently unfair situation.

Mr. Swinney: The right hon. Gentleman is citing a number of examples of what could loosely be characterised as a fancy life style, which involves flying to London every week. Construction workers, for example, might live in the north of England and travel to work every week on a site in Glasgow or on the A74, if it is ever improved. They would be liable for the Scottish tax if they worked there for a prolonged period.

Mr. Ancram: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. If they were working on a construction site in Lanarkshire but travelling home to England every night, they would not pay unless they were working the night shift, in which case they would.

Mr. Swinney: But if they were living in digs?

Mr. Ancram: That is the sort of anomaly that arises, and it is important to highlight such examples. These cases may not be many, but the Minister would surely want to prevent even one case of the tax being wrongly or unfairly levied.

I do not travel to Scotland as often as I used to when I was a Scottish Member of Parliament—I sometimes used to go up two or three times a week—but I came down on an early morning flight today. It was packed with people coming to earn their living in London during the week who will travel back on Friday evening. Although they spend five days of the week in London, they will be deemed to be resident in Scotland and as having spent four out of seven days there. That seems to defy logic, and I hope that the Minister will consider the problem.

Let us consider the issue of multiple presence. The Deloitte and Touche paper produced two examples in this regard, both of which are relevant. The first related to someone who had a home in England but spent 121 days in Scotland, 121 days in England and 123 days in France. Such a person would be liable to Scottish tax because he would be a UK resident and would have spent as much time in Scotland as in another part of the United Kingdom, although he had in fact spent 244 days outside Scotland. Again, that seems to create extraordinary anomalies.

The second example is perhaps even more graphic. It involves someone who lives in Glasgow and has a house there for 180 days of the tax year. He then moves to London where he lives for the rest of the tax year. He will not be liable to Scottish tax because his period of residence in England exceeds that in Scotland. However, if instead of moving to London he moves to France, he will be liable for Scottish tax because the number of days spent in Scotland will exceed the days spent elsewhere in the United Kingdom. That is an enormous anomaly for which there is no logical explanation.

The hon. Member for North Tayside mentioned day and night shifts and movements across the border. As I understand it, it is common in Europe to have special rules for cross-border workers, yet there is nothing in the Bill to provide for that. I hope that the Minister will consider the point. We believe that the amendment would solve the problem.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman is making some important points, and it is important to tease out some answers. He cited the example of someone who moves to France rather than London. If that person has spent only 180 days in the UK, would he be treated as a UK taxpayer at all in that year? If not, the question of paying Scottish taxation would surely not arise.

Mr. Ancram: I am not a tax expert, which is why I said the amendments were probing. I cannot answer the hon. and learned Gentleman, but it is an interesting question because there might perhaps be a conflict between the Bill and the usual tax rules. It is important to avoid that conflict if we are to avoid the complications to which the hon. Member for Linlithgow referred. I appreciate that no legislation is ever perfect—if it were, there would be no lawyers—but it is important to examine such patent anomalies.

Deloitte and Touche also point out that, for overseas workers who are brought into Scotland, the tax may result in considerable extra costs for inward investment companies because those workers are paid on a net pay basis. In other words, a Japanese worker who has a certain net pay after tax in Japan will be guaranteed the same net pay after tax in the United Kingdom. The Japanese company will therefore pay him sufficient gross pay in the United Kingdom to result in the desired net pay after taxes. Were Scotland to have an additional 3p on the basic rate, the gross pay would have to be higher than in England to arrive at the same net amount.

As we know, Scotland is always looking for inward investment and I suggest that the cost to a major new investor bringing in, say, 40 Japanese workers paid on average £25,000 a year could be as much as £40,000. That might be taken into consideration if an inward investment decision were in the balance.

Mr. Swinney: I have studied very closely the material from Deloitte and Touche; I thought that that example was rather weak. I accept that choices will be made at the margin but, in the great scheme of an inward investment decision, £40,000 as the difference between one bid and another will probably not be a major factor.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman may be right. It may not be a major factor, but with bids from various parts of the United Kingdom for inward investment becoming increasingly competitive, if £40,000 were the difference, I suspect that it could tip the balance. These matters have to be considered. It is terribly important that we do not pass clause 71 without consideration. When I said at the beginning of today's proceedings that I find this part of the Bill confusing and obscure, I was in large part referring to this clause. It is important that we try to cast some light on it, which is the purpose of the amendments.

Amendments Nos. 379 and 414 refer to employees and passengers on oil rigs and ships and trains. Under clause 71(6), offshore workers on oil rigs, fishing boats and other things will still be liable to pay the tax. Clause 111(1) defines Scotland as including

"so much of the internal waters and territorial sea of the United Kingdom as are adjacent to Scotland".

The hon. Member for Linlithgow also made this point. None of us know—at least I do not know—what is meant by "adjacent". Perhaps the Minister will tell us, because it will be crucial to any assessment of whether an oil rig worker or someone who is a passenger on or working on a ship is liable for the tax. It may be a question of a line very carefully drawn somewhere in the North sea.

In the old days of international law, I seem to remember talking about how to draw international boundaries; taking a point from one side of the border to the other and continuing it across the water. Hon. Members who represent Aberdeen—I see at least one here—were, at least in those days, very interested in where such lines were drawn. Now, however, one's eligibility for tax may depend on something as esoteric as that.

If amendments Nos. 379 and 414 were accepted, they would remove ship and oil rig workers from the tax provision. Indeed, amendment No. 414 deliberately excludes an oil rig in order to achieve that. For many people who work on oil rigs, their only connection with Scotland is flying through Aberdeen airport on their way to the platform, and they could well be coming from elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

The final example that I want to cite highlights the difficulties caused by clause 71. There is a problem in defining what constitutes being in Scotland if one is on a lorry, bus or train. Those of us who occasionally travel on the sleeper know that it leaves Edinburgh at 11.55 pm. Passengers will certainly be liable for tax on the day they board the train, because they will be regarded as having been in Scotland that day, but, under clause 71, I think that they will also be liable for the following day—the train will have left only five minutes before midnight and, for at least 25 minutes afterwards it will be travelling through Scotland on its way to London. Someone who gets on the night train may find that for the day he gets on the train and for the next day he is counted as being in Scotland although he is on the sleeper and is going to work in London.

If the Committee thinks that that is difficult, let us consider the case of the late-night lorry driver who starts his journey from Scotland to the south before midnight. Is he liable for the following day if his vehicle is still in Scotland?

Mr. Swinney: On a point of order, Mr. Lord. I do not want to interrupt the interesting flow of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, but many substantial issues have been raised to which I certainly would appreciate answers from the Minister. I wonder whether we shall have an appropriate opportunity to hear those answers.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): It is for the right hon. Gentleman himself to decide what are and what are not substantial issues.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman spoke for quite some time at the beginning of the debate and he has just taken a little bit more. I am sure that the Minister realises that these are not just serious issues, but real ones which will arise in future if the Bill is not amended. When they do, they will cause a great deal of consternation and, if we are not careful, there will be much derision about the way in which the system works. We have a genuine chance to clean up the Bill, get it right and make the tax work, so I ask the Minister to examine our amendments closely.

8.30 pm

Mr. Wallace: I echo the point that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) has just made; it is important that there is as much clarification as possible of who will be liable to tax. However, he may have misinterpreted what I said. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) created a vision of the courts regularly being filled with huge, expensive litigation.

[Mr. Wallace]

I did not suggest that that would be the case in respect of individual taxpayers, although that is not to say that it is not an important issue for the individual taxpayers concerned—and there should be as much clarity as possible.

I shall not elaborate on points that have already been raised, but I plead with the Minister to respond positively to the debate and to indicate his willingness to go away and think again about certain points. The one that I would emphasise is that the same test of residence should apply to Scotland as to the rest of the United Kingdom.

I understand that the test of residence in the United Kingdom is whether one is present at midnight. That may not be the case in respect of the Bill. As in the example mentioned by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, someone taking a morning flight to Brussels and staying away for two nights before returning to Scotland would be out of Scotland for one day under the Bill, but out of the United Kingdom for two days in terms of United Kingdom tax legislation. That anomaly will give the tax powers in the Bill a bad name. It is important for those of us who want the tax powers that there is as much clarity as possible.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I rise briefly to address one of the issues that has given rise to the huge complexities that will result from the Bill. The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) has done the Committee a service by trying to expose some of the issues, as has my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram).

I should like to pursue a point raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in respect of service men, as I represent the home of the British Army at Aldershot and quite a large number of Scots serve in the British Army in various parts of England. The hon. Member for Linlithgow raised an important point about the time that they might spend either at home in Scotland or on duty there. I hope the Minister will address that in his reply to the debate. I shall not trespass too much on his time so that he can answer the detailed questions that have been raised.

Clause 71 raises some important points of law. It will be a lawyers' paradise and there is a grave risk that lawyers will play it off against sections in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. That will create considerable difficulty for the Inland Revenue and it will certainly add to the costs that the Bill will impose on the body of taxpayers. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about which law will prevail if there is a conflict and how the courts and judges will interpret between the Bill and that other body of law which already deals with Inland Revenue issues and residence location for tax purposes.

Finally, I return to the point that my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes made about the train departing at 11.55 pm. That provision could also affect airline pilots who are often required to work away from home. Given that it is a particular feature of the clause that one is caught at the beginning or the end of the day—rather than at a specified hour, such as midnight—the airlines could also be affected. For instance, a shuttle pilot on the route between Heathrow and Edinburgh or Glasgow could find himself spending quite a lot of time in Scotland although his principal residence might be in England. The opposite could also arise. There should be some consistency, and I hope that the Minister will be able to clear up some of the points that have been raised by Members on both sides of the Committee.

Mr. McLeish: In the 10 minutes that remain, I shall attempt to respond to some of the points that have been raised in an important debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked a number of specific questions. He referred to the Law Society. The Scottish Office and Inland Revenue officials have had a number of useful meetings with the Law Society at which all the main points raised by hon. Members were covered, in most cases satisfactorily.

Professional sportsmen have been mentioned. The example seems a bit far-fetched in my judgment, but in the circumstances described the individual would be a Scottish taxpayer. As far as possible, taxpayers will be informed of their status by the Inland Revenue.

Service men with married quarters—and, possibly, a principal home—in Scotland, who spend six months in Northern Ireland and three months in England might be liable to pay tax on the "principal home" test, depending on the circumstances. However, we are aware of the particular circumstances of military personnel and I am discussing the issues with colleagues.

The point about splitting tax years was addressed when we discussed amendment No. 357. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow also raised the question of the North sea adjacent to Scotland as described in clause 111. Clause 111 confines the boundaries of Scotland for purposes of the Bill to the "internal waters or territorial sea . . . adjacent to Scotland."

Much of the North sea is outside the 12-mile limit and is not adjacent to Scotland. Further to that, the Government plan to make available to hon. Members during the passage of the Bill a working draft order defining Scottish adjacent waters under clause 111.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. McLeish: No. I have very little time in which to respond.

Chartered accountants' comments about individuals being treated as United Kingdom residents under clause 71(1) have been mentioned. We are quite certain that it means the same thing in that context.

The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) mentioned the example of the business man who flies to London on Monday morning and returns to Scotland on Friday. Such an individual would be a Scottish taxpayer as his family home is in Scotland. The number of days test would not apply.

The substantive amendments relate to the critical issue of who should be liable to pay tax at the varied rate proposed by the Scottish Parliament. Before I deal with them, I should say that the long experience of the Inland Revenue in income tax matters dating back to 1849 has proved invaluable in terms of negotiating us through particularly tricky policy issues.

Drawing up tax proposals is seldom, if ever, a simple matter. Judgments have to be exercised, weighing up and balancing issues of fairness, workability, scope for avoidance, cost of administration and, of course, tax take.

Those judgments have to be informed by in-depth experience and I remain convinced that the Government's conclusions, properly informed by the Inland Revenue, stand up to scrutiny.

Amendment No. 344 aims to link the definition of who will be a Scottish taxpayer to a complete year of assessment and to have it apply only for the tax year 1999-2000—the first full year of the Bill being enacted—and beyond. The amendment is unnecessary on both counts because clause 71 already relates the definition of who will be a Scottish taxpayer to whole tax years and because clause 70(6) makes it clear that the tax-varying power will not be available for use before the tax year 2000-01.

Amendment No. 370 would appear to be trying to exclude small, unincorporated businesses from the definition of Scottish taxpayers. I do not think that it succeeds, but, in any case, I am not persuaded that unincorporated businesses should be exempt from the tax-varying power. They do, after all, pay income tax at present and, since the maximum extra tax any individual will pay is £660, exercise of the tax-varying power will not damage small businesses. There is no reason why the self-employed and partnerships should not pay their fair share if others pay income tax in Scotland. They will benefit from exactly the same services provided by the Parliament as employees and other Scottish taxpayers.

Amendments Nos. 336 to 339 and 341 are all aimed at deleting the test whereby a UK resident would be a Scottish taxpayer if he or she spent at least half the tax year in Scotland. There has been a fair amount of comment about the test recently—not all of it, by any means, well informed. We have looked carefully at the test and concluded that it fully meets the requirements of fairness, practicability and cost effectiveness.

Taking into account time spent in Scotland is a fair way of ensuring that all those who might benefit from what the Scottish Parliament has to offer—including how it applies the proceeds of a resolution that increases the basic rate of income tax—should pay the appropriate share of the tax. It is only right that those who spend most of their time in Scotland should therefore pay at the Scottish rate.

Mr. Swinney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McLeish: I am reluctant to give way, partly because I want to address some of the important amendments tabled by the hon. Gentleman.

A test based on days spent in Scotland is consistent with tests of residence for UK tax purposes generally. I accept that the test involves decisions about where precisely its boundaries should lie—all residence-based tests do—but most of the examples I have seen quoted, in the Deloitte and Touche paper and elsewhere, are quite clear cut. The clause as drafted already gives the most equitable and practical solution in those cases and I would not wish to change it.

Treating someone as spending a day in Scotland if they are there at the beginning or the end of the day is a necessarily strict test to deter avoidance. The transaction costs of avoidance in the "within UK" context are relatively low and have to be guarded against. Better that than a test with glaring loopholes.

I should stress that there will be no extra costs for employers in operating the "days spent" test. No employer will deduct tax at the Scottish rate unless the Inland Revenue tells them to. As is usual, the onus will be on the taxpayer to get his tax affairs right. That again is consistent with other tax law, including UK residence rules. The costs for the Inland Revenue of ensuring compliance with the rules have been taken into account. The number of taxpayers likely to be caught solely by that test is thought to be relatively small.

Amendments Nos. 371 to 374, 377 and 378 would, when taken together, mean that a person would be a Scottish taxpayer if he had his UK home in Scotland, regardless of whether he lived there at all. Amendment No. 378 would remove the provision that decides which property, if a person has two or more homes, should be regarded as the person's residence for the purposes of the Scottish tax. That could mean that anyone with a place of residence in Scotland, such as a holiday home, could be a Scottish taxpayer.

I hesitate to suggest it, but it smacks uncomfortably of an attempt by the Conservative party to reintroduce by the back door the poll tax on holiday homes—a matter in which the right hon. Member for Devizes is well versed. I am not prepared to countenance that. In practice, however, there must be sensible rules to deal with individuals who have homes in Scotland and elsewhere in the UK. It would not be fair that everyone who had a place of residence in Scotland should automatically be a Scottish taxpayer.

Amendment No. 340 would widen significantly the "principal home" criterion whereby a person could be adjudged to be a Scottish taxpayer. Although I understand that the amendment is linked to the SNP's concern to remove the criterion of "days spent in Scotland" from the Bill, it would in practice create bizarre and unfair effects, and should be resisted. The effect of the amendment can best be illustrated by an example. If the amendment were accepted, a person moving with his family to Scotland on the very last day of a tax year, 5 April, would be adjudged to be a Scottish taxpayer for the whole of that year on the basis of the test at clause 71(3)(a) and (b), because he would have spent part of the year—one day—in Scotland and, for at least part of that year, his principal UK residence would have been in Scotland.

Amendment No. 343 picks up a point raised in the paper published by Deloitte and Touche about the potential liability for the Scottish tax of cross-border night shift workers. That situation was one we had identified when drawing up the proposals, but we reluctantly concluded that the balance of advantage lay with living with it rather than with trying to resolve what may in practice be a non-problem. I shall briefly explain why.

A night shift worker living in England but working in Scotland could become liable for the Scottish tax if he or she clocked up, under the "days spent in Scotland" rule, at least 183 days in Scotland. We have, however, to put that point into some sort of context: we are talking about a very small number of people who commute daily between England and Scotland; very few of these few daily commuters will be night shift workers; and very few night shift workers will spend 183 days, as defined in the Bill, in Scotland. Most night workers do not spend all their year working nights and most have significant time off which, when added to holidays, means that they would fall below the 183 day limit.

[Mr. McLeish]

I accept that that is not a reason to leave matters as they stand.

Mr. Swinney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McLeish: I want to come to the specific point. The question of night shift workers is extraordinarily difficult, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the Inland Revenue continues to work on this specific point. We want to discover the extent of the problem as it exists in reality and to find out whether there is a problem to be addressed. I give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that the matter will be examined.

Mr. Swinney: The Minister has said that it is likely that the number of people who will fall into the "days spent" category will be small, but that contradicts his central argument. It is no answer to my amendment about night shift workers—I find his response inadequate.

Mr. McLeish: If one takes a specific group, large or small, and starts to look for potential anomalies in the system, one may find that there are knock-on consequences—

It being a quarter to Nine o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 71 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 72

CHANGES TO INCOME TAX STRUCTURE

Dr. Fox: I beg to move amendment No. 381, in page 31, line 31, leave out from 'Board,' to 'and' in line 33.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 382, in page 31, line 34, leave out

'have a significant effect on the practical extent'

and insert

'increase or decrease the revenue available to the Parliament by more than 5 per cent. of the amount available had the maximum tax power been used in the 1997–98 tax year,'.

No. 384, in page 31, line 37, leave out

'as soon as reasonably practical'

and insert 'within one calendar month'.

No. 409, in page 31, line 38, leave out from 'proposal' to second 'to' in line 40'.

No. 385, in page 31, line 38, leave out

'as soon as reasonably practical'

and insert 'within one calendar month'.

No. 387, in page 32, line 3, after 'to,' insert 'basic rate'.

No. 388, in page 32, line 4, leave out 'conditions' and insert 'condition'.

No. 389, in page 32, line 5, leave out 'subsections (4) and (5)' and insert 'subsection (5)'.

No. 390, in page 32, leave out lines 9 to 17.

No. 392, in page 32, line 14, leave out from 'would' to end of line 17 and insert

'be to raise or forego £450 million in 1997–98 prices, increased in line with the general government implied deflator.'.

No. 393, in page 32, line 15, leave out

'broadly the same from year to year as'

and insert

'within 5 per cent. of the amount'.

No. 396, in page 32, line 21, leave out 'generally'.

No. 397, in page 32, line 21, leave out 'significantly different from' and insert

'within 5 per cent. of'.

Dr. Fox: It will take me about as long to deliver this speech as it took you, Mr. Lord, to read out that long list of amendments.

Clause 72 is one of the most important in the Bill and, as anyone who has read the Bill will know, one of the most complex. It was an essential part of the referendum that the Parliament should be able to raise, in the words of the White Paper, £450 million or an index-linked equivalent sum, but that is not in the Bill; it is couched in different terms. Why is there no reference in the Bill to the £450 million? Why was it left out? The clause is more loosely drafted, imprecise and unclear than most in the Bill. Indeed, it is contradictory. We therefore need to ask two questions at the outset: what did the electorate believe they were voting for in the referendum; and what are they getting in the Bill as a result?

[Dr. Fox]

I shall begin with the clause's imprecise nature. Subsection (1)(b) is a clear example of the problem. It says:

"that proposal is one made and published by the Treasury or the Board, or (without having been so made and publicised) appears to the Treasury to be a proposal to which effect is likely to be given by Act of Parliament."

That would hardly get a plain English award.

More important, we are concerned about some of the terms in the clause. What are we to make of terms such as "significant effect", and "likely"? Amendment No. 382 would define "significant effect" as varying revenue by 5 per cent. As the Bill stands, the Treasury alone will decide what is significant. What if the Scottish Parliament decides that changes to income tax Acts are significant? Will that count? Even if there were some sort of arbitration, "significant" is ill defined. It would be far better to stipulate it in the Bill, so that there was no question of friction as a result of imprecision. I readily confess that the figure of 5 per cent. is arbitrary, but I hope that the Minister will think about the matter again and table an amendment at a later stage so that we shall be rid of such extremely unhelpful imprecision.

"as soon as reasonably practicable",

The main issue in clause 72 is whether and how the Scottish Parliament's extra revenue would be maintained in the light of changing economic circumstances. We must consider the clause in conjunction with clause 69, which leads Scottish voters—as did the referendum campaign—to believe that 3p would be the limit of the Scottish Parliament's tax-raising power, but, in two potential situations, major changes may occur. Either a United Kingdom Chancellor of the Exchequer raises thresholds and, as a result, produces a decreased number of basic rate taxpayers, or, as a result of a recession or adverse economic circumstances, the number of taxpayers falls. How, then, would revenue be maintained? It would not, as the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) said in an earlier debate, just be tough for a Scottish Parliament, because the Bill appears to make provision for just such circumstances.

Under clause 72(2)(a), if

"in the Treasury's opinion, an amendment of the Parliament's tax-varying powers is required as a consequence of the proposal", the Treasury would act to make up the amount of money that might be lost. It must take account of subsection (4)(b), which says:

"after making due allowance for annual changes in the retail prices index, that the practical extent of the Parliament's tax-varying powers would remain broadly the same from year to year as it would be if . . . the law relating to income tax were the same from year to year as it was in relation to the year 1997-98."

As I understand it, that part of the Bill is to protect the Parliament's revenue-raising powers and ensure that it works with a consistently similar sum of money. I can draw only two conclusions from the two paragraphs when they are taken together. First, the Treasury could produce a situation that might result in the need to raise more money from fewer income tax payers, as it is committed to making the "practical extent" of tax-raising powers consistent. Secondly, that could require a rise in income tax of more than 3p.

It is only common sense that, if the Parliament has to raise the same amount of money—index-linked—and the number of taxpayers who are paying it shrinks, the amount that has to be raised from each taxpayer must rise. Unless there is something fundamentally amiss with my arithmetic, every hon. Member should accept that. That means that what voters thought they were voting for in the referendum—a 3p ceiling on tax-raising powers—is not in fact a ceiling. Especially as the Minister has consistently said today that the changes must be confined to income tax, I can see no way of maintaining income other than a rise of more than 3p.

The Opposition tabled amendment No. 387 to provide protection for taxpayers and to clarify the Government's intentions. Making the basic rate explicit will stop exactly what the hon. Member for North Tayside seemed to want: to be able look at other areas of income tax, such as raising the top rate, moving other income taxes around or even introducing new income taxes in Scotland. All that would be allowed if the words "basic rate" were not stipulated in clause 72(3)(a).

Mr. Dalyell: Is not that what the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and his colleagues are quite legitimately and honourably all about? They do want that.

Dr. Fox: It might be legitimate, but I am not sure whether it is particularly honourable to campaign in favour of one economic change in a referendum but knowingly to want to introduce quite a different one.

As we have said from the outset, we want to minimise potential points of friction. It is far better to include such stipulations in the Bill than to leave it open to vague interpretation. I whole-heartedly entreat the Minister to consider amendment No. 387. If the Government intend any changes to be limited to the basic rate, they must say so. Otherwise, various income taxes may be changed.

If clause 72(4) is to protect against loss of revenue, subsection (5) is clearly designed to reassure taxpayers. It states that will be much the same as in previous years of assessment. That is quite different from the notes on clauses. The question is how we interpret subsection (5). If basic rate taxpayers are to be protected, how could subsections (2) or (4) be put into effect? They would become contradictory. Do the Government not intend "taxpayers" to mean "basic rate taxpayers"?

"the effect on the levels of the after-tax income of Scottish taxpayers generally"

The Opposition's suspicion begins to rise given that the notes on clauses say:

"the proposed revised powers must, if exercised, have broadly the same impact on the after-tax income levels of individual tax payers as the existing powers".

Which taxpayers are we talking about? Are we talking about all taxpayers, basic rate taxpayers, or could the word "generally" in subsection (5) mean average, across-the-board Scottish taxpayers? Therefore, if some taxpayers are taken out of the tax bands, others' taxes will have to rise to keep the general level of income the same.

That would be open season on basic rate taxpayers. It is what we have warned of all along. We have always said that the danger would be that the Bill was not watertight; that it would be so loosely drafted that it would open the door to those who wanted to set higher basic rates for those in the middle bracket in Scotland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom. That means that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced taxation by raising thresholds, the burden would immediately fall on Scottish basic rate taxpayers, by virtue of this clause.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with my interpretation of the clause, which is that it gives the power to change these arrangements in future to the Westminster Parliament, not the Scottish Parliament? Given his views, the hon. Gentleman should be happy to see the Scottish Parliament's powers of taxation being regulated by this House.

Dr. Fox: A neat try—but we want any changes made explicit in the Bill. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) rightly pointed out just now that this is exactly the sort of friction that the nationalists want in the Scottish Parliament. They want the Bill left vague, because that maximises the possibilities of future trouble-making. They want nothing fixed in statute. The hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) said during the referendum campaign that he wanted £450 million to be the limit; now, he does not want it to be the limit. He wants the clause to be unamended, because that maximises the chances of making trouble once the Parliament is set up.

We believe that the clause is dangerously drafted, confusing and contradictory. Many of our amendments are designed to probe, but amendment No. 390 is extremely important in its own right. If we get no satisfactory answer on it from the Minister, we shall push it to a Division to show that we understand the dangers that basic rate taxpayers could be up against if these plans come to fruition. We warned about an open season on Scottish taxpayers; unfortunately, that is what the Bill provides for.

Mr. Dalyell: Clause 72 presents real problems. First, I should like to ask a technical question posed by Martin Jones of Maclay, Murray and Spens, Glasgow tax experts. I talked to him at some length this morning about subsection (1)(b). He wants to know about the cumulative effect of modifications as distinct, first, from each modification separately; or secondly, the modifications of each year taken separately. What happens about three years of changes to the lower band, or about capital allowance changes? Serious lawyers would like an answer to that question.

My true concern has to do with the delineation of devolved functions. The delineation of functions is always a challenging task. There are, of course, many existing federations which, by definition, have such delineations in place; but most of them—at least the developed states with a political and public culture broadly comparable with ours—have been federations for a century or more. Their basic delineations were accordingly established at times when governmental functions were usually much less dense, extensive and interactive than they are now. The dividing lines have, by and large, evolved gradually and pragmatically within cultures familiar with acceptance of the federal concept.

Here, however, we are not talking about a federal concept; we are talking about a unique kind of semi-federal concept. Leading examples of the genre such as Australia, Canada and the United States stretch across large territories, so cheek-by-jowl comparison is less intense. It is without parallel anywhere else in the world to try to draw an entirely new legislative and financial boundary through a complex governmental scene, in a relatively small and densely populated island, with a powerful culture and an unusually strong nationwide media structure, giving rise to expectations of consistent treatment right across the UK.

Two basic questions arise in consideration of the crucial problem of delineation. Should the line be drawn by describing what is devolved and what is not devolved? In 1974–77, the former route was taken. Furthermore, should the line be drawn by broad description of subject or by detailed mapping according to current statutes? In 1974–77, the latter route again was taken. The 1974–77 approach produced long, complex Bills and was accordingly much criticised at the time and afterwards. The White Paper and the Bill indicate the opposite approach, but it should be recognised that there are considerable practical difficulties in regard to both approaches, whichever course is preferred. There is no logical reason why the difficulties would be removed simply by reversing the approach adopted in the 1998 Bill.

The problem is policing the delineation. The choice of approach to delineation on financial and legal matters interacts with the question of how the delineation is to be policed. Who is to decide whether the Scottish Parliament has overstepped its powers? During the 1974–77 saga, that was a matter of considerable argument in the Government, centring on the issue of judicial review.

That bring us to the question of judicial review and who is to decide when the Scottish Parliament asks whether it is to have more taxation. It is absolutely certain that that will come up soon after Holyrood is established. The expectations have been raised out of all recognition. All sorts of problems—lone parents, tuition fees; you name it—will be solved when there is a Scottish Parliament. It is not laws, let alone speeches in that Parliament, that will deal with those matters, but resources. The demand for resources will be huge. That is why delineation is crucial. This is the point in the Bill at which to ask questions about it.

9.15 pm

One argument, advanced virtually as a matter of basic legal and constitutional principle, is that it would be wrong to deny citizens the right to argue in the courts that a Scottish Parliament Act disadvantaging them exceeded the powers granted by Westminster in a devolution statute. The other argument, arising partly from an awareness of the boundary complexity problem, is that it would be unreasonable in practice and politically objectionable in Scotland that primary legislation and financial regulations of the Parliament should be liable at any time, perhaps long after enactment, to be struck down by the courts as ultra vires. The more broadly drawn the delineation, the greater the risks.

[Mr. Dalyell]

If this argument prevails, the question still arises as to who is to police the boundary. At some point, somebody must. If there is no general right of post-enactment judicial review of the vires of primary legislation or financial legislation, there must be some procedure—legal or Westminster parliamentary—for providing a nihil obstat at the time of enactment. We come back to the lawyers. The procedure for considering vires and resolving disputes must be clarified before the Bill passes into law.

No course is free from difficulty. It is fair to acknowledge that in the past 20 years public opinion has become more accustomed—because of the operation of the European Court—to the idea that the legal system might be able to overrule statute passed by a democratically elected body. That does not make the experience politically comfortable. The scale and weight of those incidents might—depending on the quality and style of the devolutionary delineation, the political climate, and how widely any right of challenge to vires extends—be a good deal more onerous than in the European dimension, as it would be additional to that dimension.

Dr. Fox: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that with the spectre of judicial review looming at any time, it would be far better for terms in the clause such as "significant effect", "likely" or "reasonably practicable" to be defined much more closely? Are we not asking for trouble with judicial review later by leaving the Bill so loosely phrased?

Mr. Dalyell: I shall reply to that by asking the Minister a question. What is the legal advice on all this? I agree with the views expressed from the Opposition Front Bench on this matter. The terms are very loose. That is also the view of the Law Society and other lawyers who have studied the Bill. Are the Government saying that, according to their legal advice, the Bill is sufficiently watertight to avoid a challenge in the courts such as Jarndyce v. Jarndyce?

Incidentally, that would lead to tremendous political discontent on the part of all Members of the Holyrood Parliament, including Conservative Members. Let us not assume that the Conservatives would avoid those pressures. They would face the same problems because of the expectations that have been raised in Scotland. The entire Parliament would create those pressures.

I conclude with this question: what legal advice have the Government received about these very delicate and important matters?

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) said about the possibility of the Treasury's changing the rules so that the Scottish Parliament could levy a higher taxation rate than 3p in the pound. My hon. Friend has covered that point, but it is extremely important as regards democracy.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: The Bill does not give the Treasury the power to change any rule: the Treasury is given the power to suggest changes to the House .

Mr. Robertson: The Scottish people were asked to vote on whether they wanted the Scottish Parliament to have tax-varying powers. They understood that the rate would be no more than 3p in the pound, but it could well be more than that.

I refer to the constraints that might be placed on the Treasury. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said—I believe very reasonably—that he might want to introduce a taxation rate of 10p in the pound. What effect will that have on the Scottish Parliament's ability to raise £450 million? Will it not place the most enormous constraints on the Treasury's ability to act for the whole United Kingdom? I ask the Minister to reply to those two points.

Mrs. Laing: Once again, I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He has made some serious points tonight that are often overlooked in the public debate about the Bill. He referred, in particular, to the difficulties of delineation and the problems arising from it. It is an understatement to say that the confusion and conflict that the problems will create are a lawyer's paradise. I know many lawyers, both north and south of the border, who must be rubbing their hands with glee at the thought of the business that will come their way in the next few years.

We begin to suspect that the Government have no wish to clear up the confusion in the Bill. We offer clarity through our amendments. The Bill would become clearer if the Government accepted the amendments. However, they will not, so we must assume that they wish to preserve the conflicts and the uncertainties that we have pointed out time and again.

This warning has been issued many times: if the conflicts that exist on the face of the Bill are not resolved, the Scottish people will not get what they voted for in September. They voted for a limited amount of devolution and a little variance on tax. If the conflicts are not solved now and the Bill is not clarified, devolution will not work. If devolution does not work, the Scottish people will get what Scottish National party Members want them to have: a separate Parliament and a separate Scotland. The Government have been warned about that time and again, but they constantly ignore our warnings.

Mr. Prior: It is likely that, in the not-too-distant future, a Budget will raise thresholds for paying basic rate income tax, so that the tax base in Scotland will fall. If it falls from £450 million to £350 million, for example, the Westminster Parliament will have to decide whether to extend the tax base in Scotland—that will be a clear example of the problem of delineation that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned. Until delineation between the two Parliaments is sorted out, problems over taxation will continue each year.

Mr. McLeish: It would be helpful to remind Conservative Members in particular of the intention behind the clause—to provide protection from the erosion of the tax base. Conservative Members have claimed that the clause is imprecise, but it is important to be flexible in these matters. We cannot be precise, as the future shape of the United Kingdom tax structure, in the context of which any change to present arrangements would be made, is not known. Any changes would be to the income tax system, not to any other form of taxation; they would maintain, as far as possible, the tax's current distributional effects—the same people will pay roughly the same amount of tax as they will under the proposals in clause 72.

It may also help if I briefly outline how what I regard as the fall-back power in clause 72 will work. The clause falls into two parts. Subsections (1) and (2) set out the process whereby any fall-back power would be introduced. In effect, what will happen in most foreseeable circumstances is that, first, the Treasury would internally develop a proposal to change UK tax arrangements. Secondly, if the Treasury assessed that that would significantly reduce or increase the Scottish tax take, it would, if it thought it necessary, again draw up internally proposals for changing the Bill's powers.

Thirdly, when the UK tax changes became public on Budget day or possibly in a Green Budget, the Treasury would be obliged, as soon as reasonably practicable, to lay before the House in a statement whether it believed that the Scottish power needed to be changed and what the changes, if any, should be.

In practice, the Treasury would be expected to consult the Scottish Executive before laying revised proposals before the House as soon as was reasonably practicable. Once a proposal had been laid before the House, it would be incorporated into the Finance Bill as an amendment to the Scotland Bill's powers.

Subsections (3) to (7) set parameters to any revised power—in effect, that roughly the same people should pay roughly the same amount of income tax as they would under the power that is currently proposed. Once any new power had been implemented, the Scottish Parliament would either stick with any tax resolution that it had already made under its formal powers or make a new in-year resolution under the new power.

Of course, we should note that the new power would need to include provision allowing an in-year resolution to be made in these circumstances. Under clause 70, such an in-year resolution would be considered.

I understand from the Conservative party's hostility to the referendum result in favour of a Scottish Parliament that it will exaggerate and distort; it can never regard an issue such as the one covered by the clause as simple and straightforward.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McLeish: I shall not give way just now.

I respect what my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said; it was principled, and he, at least, has been consistent in his opposition over many years. However, on this and other clauses, the Opposition have tried to hide behind a smokescreen of distortions and exaggerated claims about a lawyer's paradise; in fact, their basic hostility creeps through on every possible occasion.

The Committee's objective is to scrutinise the Bill; and it is, of course, acceptable for hon. Members to make political points. However, let us not pretend that those are the same things.

Dr. Fox: Under the Bill, as drafted, would it be possible for the Treasury to increase Scottish tax-raising powers by more than 3p in the pound?

9.30 pm

Mr. McLeish: I repeat that the key purpose of the provision is to protect the tax take. It does not need a great deal of imagination or intellect to appreciate what that is. The Bill, which will become an Act, will have the ability to raise or lower the basic rate of income tax by 3p. In future, however, changes made by any Government or any Treasury could have an impact on the tax take. The clause provides an important fall-back mechanism for the Westminster-based Parliament and the Treasury to ensure that the level of tax take that we try to build into the Bill is taken forward in subsequent years. That is straightforward and common sense.

There must be flexibility, and that is provided by a fall-back power. Where would flexibility lie if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in this place, changed the basic tax system? A fall-back power is essential because it will protect the Parliament, the tax take and the integrity of the tax-varying power. In addition, it will protect the taxpayer.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does not the clause and everything that the Minister has said confirm that we are talking about tax-raising powers? We are not talking about tax-varying powers. The clause, and the Bill in general, is geared towards increasing the tax burden on the Scottish people. Will the Minister not come clean about that?

It is not only the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) who has principles about these issues. It is the duty of the Committee to point out to the Minister the practical consequences of what could arise for the Scottish people, as drawn from a detailed study of the Bill.

Mr. McLeish: With great respect, that is complete and utter nonsense. The situation has been well discussed in Scotland, in the publication of the White Paper, in the referendum and in the publication of the Bill. It is interesting that the Conservative party used to help the business community through some of its difficulties. Nowadays, however, only the Conservative Opposition see the perceived dangers—they make them up as they go along—as we consider the Bill in Committee.

Mr. Hayes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McLeish: No. I am not giving way at this stage.

No self-respecting Parliament with a working tax-varying power could avoid a fall-back position. That having been said, I shall deal with the specific amendments.

Mr. Dalyell: Neither my hon. Friend the Minister nor I is a tax lawyer. Rather than asking my hon. Friend to answer the question that I posed on cumulative accumulation of tax, may I suggest that a tax expert from the Scottish Office gets together with Martin Jones of Maclay Murray and Spens and the Law Society's tax committee to sort out this issue? I suggest that my hon. Friend writes to us or returns to the House with a closer definition on Report.

Mr. McLeish: Inland Revenue and Scottish Office officials are in consultation with many groups about the rules and duties that will be taken on board through the tax-varying power. I take my hon. Friend's suggestion on board, but consultation is taking place.

The group of amendments is concerned with what, for convenience, I shall term the fall-back power. Amendments Nos. 381 and 409 would remove from the Treasury the duty to start taking steps to consider a replacement tax-varying power in circumstances where it was obvious that it should be doing so. The circumstances in question would be where it looked likely that a major change to the UK tax structure was likely to be enacted, but, for some reason, that had not been formally proposed or published by the Treasury or Inland Revenue. Thus, for example, the Treasury would not be under an obligation to act when, as has happened, the Government accepted an amendment to income tax provisions during the passage of a Finance Bill, but had not formally proposed or published the policy enshrined in that amendment. That would plainly be absurd, and I hope that the amendments will be withdrawn.

The purpose behind amendment No. 382 is to put a figure on the trigger for clause 72 coming into play. The Bill as drafted leaves that undefined; this is deliberate. If we were to determine a particular figure, whether a 5 per cent. increase or decrease in potential tax take, or some other figure, that could easily trigger the clause when it was in the interests of nobody to trigger it. Alternatively, it could deprive the Scottish Parliament of an important opportunity to enter negotiations with the UK Government.

I simply do not accept arguments that a lack of definition will lead to conflict. Of course, there may have to be negotiation in particular circumstances, and I have no doubt that those negotiations may sometimes be tough, but I would argue that is a much more stable and mature arrangement than sticking an arbitrary, non-negotiable statutory marker in the ground. Therefore, I do not accept the need for the amendment.

Amendments Nos. 384 and 385 bring those of us who are accustomed to the work of Standing Committees on to familiar territory—the respective merits of a requirement to do something as soon as "reasonably practicable" or within a particular, specified time frame. Amendment No. 384 at least has the merit of making sense, although I do not accept that, in all circumstances, it would be desirable to require the Treasury to lay material before the House within a month of publishing or proposing a tax change. Amendment No. 385 should be rejected.

Amendments Nos. 387 and 390 are an attempt to provide that any replacement power should apply only to the basic rate of income tax. The deletion by amendment No. 390 of one of the particular conditions that any replacement tax would have to meet is, I assume, intended as being consequential, but that requirement is itself potentially completely unworkable. It is precisely for that reason that we have not limited the replacement power, but nevertheless have included the detailed provisions at clause 72(4) and (5) to ensure that, under any future power, broadly the same people would end up having broadly the same liability for the Scottish variable tax.

Amendments Nos. 392 and 393 are not acceptable. Amendment No. 392 seeks to put a precise figure on the tax that any replacement tax power should be capable of raising.

Amendment No. 393 attempts to provide relative precision in an area where a more broad-brush approach is the only practical way forward. The design of any replacement tax system will inevitably have to take into account a whole range of factors.

Amendment No. 396 strives for too great a degree of precision. The clause makes it quite clear that Parliament expects the effect of any new tax power generally to be broadly similar, as it affects individuals, to the power currently in the Bill. Again, precision is the enemy of the setting of sensible, workable parameters. The amendment should not be accepted.

Amendment No. 397 attempts to establish 5 per cent. parameters—this time on the effect of any replacement tax power on individuals' income after tax. Because of the way in which it has been drafted, it would prevent any new after-tax income level coming within 5 per cent. of previous levels. I suspect that that is not something any of us want.

This has proved to be a wide-ranging group of amendments, testing the fall-back power provisions. The Government's approach in relation to that power has been to put into statute the general framework of how any replacement power would be designed, in accordance with the undertakings that we gave in the White Paper. I am convinced that that is the right approach, given that we cannot begin to predict the specific circumstances in which the power will operate. Therefore, I ask the Committee not to accept the amendments.

Dr. Fox: Anyone who has read the clause or heard the Minister's response to the debate will realise why we had a pre-legislative and not a post-legislative referendum: people might have recognised what recipe the Government had for them. The Minister's inability to accept any amendment, or even the arguments made in good faith by Opposition Members, is sad. The Government's ability to speak with a forked tongue on these matters is extraordinary, and their condescension staggering. The Bill is loosely drafted.

The Minister paid tribute to the integrity of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and then proceeded to disregard all his arguments about the potential for judicial review, and the terms in which the Bill is drafted. The Secretary of State urged us on Second Reading to look at everything on a worst case scenario. Now the Government ask us to welcome a situation in which Westminster will decide any changes to Scotland's taxes, which will be different from the position in England. That is what they used to complain about when the poll tax came into operation. They now suggest that it will be all right; that it will not be exploited by the nationalists; that we have nothing to fear from this process, and that we are scaremongering by bringing up these subjects.

This is a recipe for friction. That is one of the many reasons why we cannot accept the Minister's arguments, which are contradictory. Clause 72(4) seeks to protect the Parliament's income. Clause 72(5) seeks to protect the taxpayer's income. In the Minister's words, roughly the same people should pay roughly the same tax—how precise for a financial measure. We simply cannot accept that, but I guess that we should not be upset about contradictions from a Government who are introducing a tax-raising power, with a Prime Minister who says when he goes overseas that raising tax is a threat to jobs but thinks that it is all right to introduce it in Scotland, where, apparently, the laws of economics will be suspended. I shall seek to withdraw amendment No. 381, but press amendment No. 390 to the vote.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 72 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 73

ACCOUNTING FOR ADDITIONAL SCOTTISH TAX

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): I beg to move amendment No. 399, in page 32, line 35, at end insert

'provided that all costs incurred by the Board and the Inland Revenue in collecting such amounts shall be defrayed from the Scottish Consolidated Fund.'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 400, in page 33, line 13, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

No. 401, in page 33, line 17, at end insert—

'(5A) Arrangements under subsection (4) shall not include provision for the adjustment of the amounts paid into the Scottish Consolidated Fund under this section on the basis of changes in the taxable income of the generality of Scottish income tax payers deriving from economic fluctuations in the United Kingdom as a whole.

(5B) Arrangements under subsection (4) shall include provision for the adjustment of the amounts paid into the Scottish Consolidated Fund under this section on the basis of changes in the taxable income of the generality of Scottish income tax–payers deriving from economic fluctuations attributable to previous resolutions of the Parliament.'.

No. 402, clause 74, page 33, line 37, at end insert,

'together with all costs incurred by the Board and the Inland Revenue in receiving such payments.'.

No. 403, in page 34, line 13, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

No. 404, in page 34, line 17, at end insert—

'(5A) Arrangements under subsection (4) shall not include provision for the adjustment of the amounts paid from the Scottish Consolidated Fund under this section on the basis of changes in the taxable income of the generality of Scottish income tax-payers deriving from economic fluctuations in the United Kingdom as a whole.

(5B) Arrangements under subsection (4) shall include provision for the adjustment of the amounts paid from the Scottish Consolidated Fund under this section on the basis of changes in the taxable income of the generality of Scottish income tax-payers deriving from economic fluctuations attributable to previous resolutions of the Parliament.'.

Mr. Jenkin: Clause 73 concerns the treatment of the revenue raised from the SVR—or Scottish variable rate, as we must now learn to call it. Amendment No. 399 merely clarifies the fact that the costs of collecting the tax should fall not on the United Kingdom taxpayer but on the Scottish consolidated fund, in line with paragraph 7.18 of the White Paper. The substance of the amendment may lie elsewhere in the Bill; we merely ask for clarification.

The other amendments, including Nos. 400 and 401, are much more substantive. They are probing, but they are for serious consideration. Clause 73(3) specifies that the Inland Revenue should pay into the Scottish consolidated fund an amount equal to the estimated yield from the additional tax to be paid by Scottish taxpayers. I am bound to say that that cannot have been the expectation of people reading the White Paper, which clearly guaranteed £450 million. The main burden of the clause, however, is to ensure that the yield from the tax is paid into the consolidated fund.

Clause 73 leads to the need for the legislative gyrations in clause 72. Clause 73 on its own would not guarantee the £450 million promised from the full yield of the tax referred to in paragraph 7.13 of the White Paper. Should the £450 million guarantee apply in all cases? Clause 73(5) says that the Treasury may make adjustments to estimates of the tax yield in the light of the initial estimate being wide of the mark. The operative word is "may". Our amendment No. 400 suggests that the word should be "shall".

The Bill establishes the principle that the extra revenue that is gained or forgone by the Scottish Parliament should reflect the tax yield. If it emerges that the Treasury or the Board has made a mistake, whichever is responsible should put it right. It would not be right for the Scottish consolidated fund to collect money that has not been raised for it, just as it would be wrong for the Parliament to forgo funding that has been raised on its behalf. That is the principle that the amendments seek to establish.

Amendment No. 401 proposes an exception. The White Paper was clear about the effects of changes in the tax system, but not clear about the effects of changes in economic circumstances. The amendment proposes two new subsections. Where possible, the Scottish Parliament deserves stability in its funding because it is not to be given the kind of borrowing powers that will enable it to deal with cyclical fluctuations in economic activity. Our proposed subsection (5A) is intended to protect the Scottish variable rate tax yield from the effects of economic fluctuations in the UK economy.

We do not think that the Scottish Parliament should be immune from the effects of its own decisions. Our proposed subsection (5B) would mean that any increase or decrease in the yield from the Scottish variable rate as a result of the Parliament's decisions would be reflected in payments to the Scottish consolidated fund. For example, if there were a big increase in the business rate poundage in Scotland or if the tartan tax drove people away from Scotland or was levied at the higher marginal rate, as suggested in clause 72, it could have a detrimental effect on Scotland's economic activity. It would reduce the tax yield in line with what is called the Laffer curve and that loss of revenue should be borne by the Scottish Parliament.

There is an alternative scenario. If the policies of the Scottish Parliament took Scotland well ahead of the rest of the UK so that employment rates were higher there, the yield from tax increases would be greater and the Scottish Parliament would be able to collect the dividend of its policies or perhaps levy for the same yield with a lower SVR rate. I commend the amendments to the Committee.

Mr. Dalyell: I have a short question. What happens if there is a shortfall in relation to the yield and the estimates of the Scottish Treasury or the Treasury in London are not achieved? It is a question of contingency planning for a shortfall and for what happens thereafter.

Mr. McLeish: Amendments Nos. 399 and 402 seek to ensure that the costs that are incurred by the Board and the Inland Revenue of running the tax-varying power are met by payments from the Scottish consolidated fund. I give the Committee the absolute assurance that the Inland Revenue's costs will be met by the Scottish Executive. However, it is a matter for administrative arrangement rather than for statutory provision.

Amendments Nos. 400 and 403 seek to strengthen the provision to review the arrangements for estimating what income tax receipts should be paid by or to the Board if the tax-varying power is applied. No such strengthening is needed, as the current wording permits the Board to take into account any adjustments to those arrangements that may be necessary.

Amendments Nos. 401 and 404 seek to ensure that the estimate of income tax receipts paid into the Scottish consolidated fund is not affected by changing economic conditions unless those changed conditions are the result of previous applications of the tax power. The amendments are at odds with all the principles of the overall income tax system of which the Scottish Parliament's tax-varying powers are an integral part. There is no convincing argument for making the proposed adjustments. Even if there were, it would be impossible to disentangle economic effects from other effects on tax take or, more particularly, from the effects on the economy of past Scottish tax changes or from a welter of other influences. The amendments are unhelpful and unworkable. I hope that they will not be pressed.

Mr. Jenkin: The Minister's reply leaves the question of the £450 million guarantee more confused than ever, but, in view of the pressure of time, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 73 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 74 and 75 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

REMUNERATION OF MEMBERS OF THE PARLIAMENT AND EXECUTIVE

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move amendment No. 415, in page 35, line 13, at end insert—

'(1A) Salaries paid to a member of the Parliament under subsection (1) shall not exceed those for the time being paid to members of the House of Commons.

(1B) The salary paid to the First Minister shall not exceed the average salary for the time being paid to a Secretary of State in the United Kingdom Cabinet.

(1C) The salary paid to a member of the Scottish Executive other than the First Minister shall not exceed the salary for the time being paid to a Minister of State in the United Kingdom Government.'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 416, in page 35, line 14, after 'allowances', insert 'and expenses'.

No. 417, in page 35, line 15, at end insert—

'(2A) Allowances paid to members of the Parliament or members of the Scottish Executive under subsection 2 shall not exceed the allowances for the time being paid to members of the House of Commons.'.

No. 418, in clause 77, clause 77, page 35, line 35, after 'salary', insert 'or allowance'.

No. 419, in page 35, line 37, after 'salary', insert 'or allowance'.

No. 420, in page 36, line 1, leave out 'salary' and insert 'allowance'.

No. 421, in page 36, line 4, after 'salary', insert 'or allowance'.

No. 422, in page 36, line 6, at end add—

'(3) The Parliament shall ensure that the amount of salary is reduced by the amount of salary payable to the member as mentioned in subsection (1) (a) or (b).'.

Mr. Jenkin: The purpose of the amendments is to establish reasonable limits to the salaries of Scottish Ministers and Scottish Members of Parliament, and to their allowances, and to provide—

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 76 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 77 to 80 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Sir Alan. As I have spoken at some length on important matters in previous debates, it is as much my fault as anyone's, but it is unfortunate that the Government have not had the opportunity to make a statement on the salaries, remunerations and conditions of Members of the Holyrood Parliament because it is a matter of considerable interest. [Interruption.] Not personal interest—I chose the word delicately. I do not think that anyone would select me.

The Chairman: I think that the hon. Gentleman has made his point. He knows that, as a result of the motion that has been agreed by the House, that is not something over which the occupant of the Chair has any control.

Clause 81

SCOTTISH REPRESENTATION AT WESTMINSTER

Dr. Fox: I beg to move amendment No. 258, in page 37, line 32, leave out from 'is' to end of line 33 and insert

'120 per cent. of the electoral quota for England.'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss clause 81 stand part and the following: amendment No. 259, in clause 114, page 52, line 13, at beginning insert—

'Subject to subsection (3) below,'.

No. 260, in page 52, line 17, at end add—

'(3) With the exception of an order relating to section 81, no order may be made under subsection (1) until each House of Parliament has approved any draft Order in Council which may be required to give effect to the first report of the Boundary Commission for Scotland to be submitted after 31st December 1997 under section 3(2) of the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986.'.

New clause 6—Restrictions on voting rights of Scottish members of House of Commons—

'As from the day on which the Parliament first meets, no member of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Scotland shall be entitled to vote in that House on any matter certified by the Speaker as relating solely to another part, or other parts, of the United Kingdom.'.

New clause 16—Restrictions on voting rights of Scottish members of House of Commons (No. 2)—

'Members of the House of Commons representing constituencies in Scotland may continue to participate in any vote in that House unless the Speaker deems the vote to relate to matters exclusive to England, or to England and Wales.'.

New clause 19—Restriction on voting rights of Scottish Members (Committees on English Affairs)—

'.—No member of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Scotland shall be entitled to vote in, or participate in any other proceedings of, any committee of that House established under any enactment or by the Standing Orders of that House, the functions of which are to consider matters exclusively in relation to England which are not reserved matters within the terms of Schedule 5 to this Act.'.

Dr. Fox: In this, the off-peak part of the debate, some of us will have a chance to delineate arguments that will, no doubt, be taken further by hon. Members who wish to star in the peak viewing time part of the debate on the next day that we consider the Bill, but a few points need to be made at the outset.

We shall debate what has come to be known as the West Lothian question. It is worth pointing out at the outset that we have to get one thing into perspective. Despite what I think is often a distortion in the Scottish media, when we discuss constitutional relationships between Scotland and the rest of the UK, we in this House have to remember that Scotland constitutes 10 per cent. of the UK population and it is unacceptable to force a constitutional change on the rest of the UK because of what 10 per cent. of the population may want, however much it is their right to have that. We have to keep that in mind when we consider the possible alternatives and answers to that question.

There are two reasons for tabling this group of amendments. The first is to deal, or at least to address, the West Lothian question. It is not possible to deal with, or to answer, that question within the constitutional relationships that we are being asked to discuss. The second reason is to ensure that the Scottish Parliament is set up in the most practical way possible.

As I have mentioned in a previous debate, the Secretary of State for Scotland has asked us to imagine the worst case scenario in all our considerations. That is what we seek to do in all our amendments—to minimise potential friction when the Scottish Parliament is set up.

There are two different parts to the West Lothian question. The first involves Scottish Members of Parliament of this House affecting and voting on English issues, where English Members of Parliament cannot affect the same issues in Scotland. The second part involves Scottish Members of Parliament in this House affecting English issues, when they themselves cannot affect Scottish issues in their constituencies, as a result of a devolved Parliament having been set up.

Mr. Swinney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Fox: I have hardly said anything yet. However, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, whose intervention will be as relevant when I have said nothing as when I have said something.

Mr. Swinney: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity. Will his arguments tonight be the same arguments deployed by the Conservative party at the next sitting of the Committee when this debate will be continued, bearing in mind that the Leader of the Opposition is making a landmark speech on this subject tomorrow evening?

Dr. Fox: There is obviously some confusion of terms if "generosity" is how the hon. Gentleman sees me registering despair—but, having heard the hon. Gentleman's intervention, I understand why. If the hon. Gentleman reads my right hon. Friend's speech, he will realise that the Conservative party has moved on. We have done so because events have moved on. We did not seek to have a debate on the changing constitutional relationships within the United Kingdom, but that debate has come about because of the result of the referendum. We campaigned, I believe honourably, for our point of view—that is what one does in a democracy—but that view was rejected and instead the Scottish electorate voted for the establishment of a Parliament, with tax-raising powers. That is where the debate now starts.

I say to one or two of my hon. Friends on the Conservative Benches and to some in my party outside the House that to talk of an evolutionary approach to the constitution, when the Government's agenda is to throw up the pieces of the jigsaw of constitution and hope that they fall down in something like a coherent manner, is no longer on the menu for our party. We must move on and address the issues as they are presented, and do so within the Government's time scale. However, that does not mean that we should not deal with the issues in an intellectually coherent manner. The debate that we are having is an inevitable result of what has happened in recent months, not least the election of a new Government.

The are several ways in which we can respond to the West Lothian question, but we cannot answer it. As I have said previously, there is no answer to the West Lothian question within devolution, because devolution pretends, wrongly, that we can change the constitutional relationship between Scotland and the remainder of the United Kingdom without changing the relationship within the remainder of the United Kingdom.

We must do what we can to deal with the question, and several options are open to us. There is the option to do precisely nothing—to make no change to our arrangements here or to our other constitutional arrangements, and just wait and see what happens. That is not a particularly constructive approach.

There is the possibility of developing English regional assemblies, moving down the federal path. The small problem with that, and something I find rather interesting when studying the Scottish media, is that it appears to be of no importance to certain political traits in Scotland that there is no demand for English regional government. Indeed, there is so little appetite for the proposed regional development agencies—the precursors for English regional government—that we wonder whether, if regional government will ever come.

A third option would be to set up an English Parliament, a separate body elected in the same way as the Scottish Parliament and with devolved powers set out in the same manner as the devolved powers for the Scottish Parliament are set out in the Bill. We could also have designated English legislation—which is dealt with in new clause 16—but there are drawbacks to that proposal, which is favoured by many. Who will decide what is to be a designated English Bill? Should it be left to the discretion of Madam Speaker? It would be a heavy burden for any constitutional politician. If it is to be decided by a resolution of the House, would Scottish Members vote on what should be an English-designated Bill? The practical difficulties would be enormous.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the decision on whether Bills should be sent, for example, to the Scottish Grand Committee, is made by Madam Speaker, who has to determine whether a Bill relates exclusively to Scotland. Why should Madam Speaker have any greater difficulty in determining whether a Bill relates exclusively to England?

Dr. Fox: That is a matter of degree. We have a Scottish Grand Committee. There could be an argument for an English Grand Committee operating in the same way, but there would be a problem of scale with such a Committee. That is not an insurmountable difficulty, but it is not sensible to pretend that it does not exist if we are to have a rational debate on how to proceed. We could have English only—or English and Welsh only—sessions in the House, which would effectively be an English Grand Committee, as is suggested in new clause 19. All the options will have to be considered. If the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney), who is about to leave, would like a copy of the speech to be made tomorrow night by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, I shall send him one, so that he does not feel that he has missed anything from the rest of the debate.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): As the principal Opposition spokesman on the amendment, my hon. Friend is rightly posing a series of questions. Is he aware that most Conservative Members of Parliament have a forthright view on the issue? We are not prepared to accept Scottish Members being able to come here to vote on matters over which we have no control in Scotland. They must accept either that such Bills should be marked or that their representation should be reduced. There is increasing anger on the Conservative Benches about that. We want the Government to address those issues firmly, properly and fairly.

Dr. Fox: My hon. Friend makes the points more clearly than I could. Devolution will inevitably create tension in the House and the United Kingdom unless the West Lothian question is addressed swiftly. There will be a feeling that Scottish Members have undue influence over affairs in England, with no reciprocal arrangement.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): Does the hon. Gentleman recall the poll tax? A majority of English Members voted through a tax that at one time applied only to Scotland. Does he recognise that at no time will Scots form a majority in this Chamber, as the English Tories did when they voted for the poll tax to operate in Scotland? Does he not accept that such behaviour, not the anomalies that we might have now, threatens the Union?

Dr. Fox: Several responses immediately come to mind. England accounts for around 90 per cent. of the UK population. It will inevitably provide the largest number of Members in a united Parliament. The hon. Gentleman would do well to remember that, in recent weeks and again tonight, he has voted for clauses that give the English Parliament the same rights to impose legislation like the poll tax that he so abhors. Clause 27(7) made that clear—

Mr. McAllion: Does the hon. Gentleman realise what he has just said? He said that we voted to give the English Parliament the right to legislate over Scotland. I hope that, as a Scotsman, he will retract that abhorrent statement and remind himself that this is the United Kingdom Parliament, not an English Parliament.

Dr. Fox: I meant the Union Parliament. One of the things that I hate most, particularly when I am watching football, is for the United Kingdom to be referred to as England. Even worse is Scotland being referred to as England.

Clause 27(7), which we debated recently, gives this House a right to legislate on all matters, including economic matters. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) voted for that power. If it is ever used, he should remember that. Even if I accepted what he said about undue influence in one direction—which I do not—there is no excuse for similar influence in the other direction. We must have a clear relationship with no potential for English Members of Parliament to feel that they have too little influence over affairs in other parts of the United Kingdom when Members of Parliament from that area have an influence over their constituencies. It is simply a matter of fairness, given that we have already started down the road of devolution. It is a matter of balance—[Interruption.] Hon. Members talk about fairness, but if they are as stubborn as those who refuse to accept that we have now entered a new constitutional landscape, it will lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom and play directly into the hands of the nationalists who seek to maximise friction through the Bill.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Fox: How could I mention Scottish nationalists without giving way to their current personification?

10.15 pm

Mr. Salmond: Personification—that is good; I quite like that. On the subject of friction, Sir Malcolm Rifkind, one of the hon. Gentleman's former—defeated—colleagues, said yesterday that if an English Grand Committee were set up and if the House overruled that Committee, he could see that leading to a constitutional crisis. Does the hon. Gentleman think that if clause 27(7) were used to overrule a Scottish Parliament, that would lead to a constitutional crisis?

Dr. Fox: We remain a Union Parliament, and clause 27(7) simply states what we are—the supreme law-making body in the United Kingdom. My former colleagues, like my current colleagues, are entitled to their views. It is a testament to the current resurgent intellectual health of the Conservative party that we are having such a wide-ranging and fruitful debate. [Interruption.] Of course I am smiling; I am looking forward to the future when, as a resurgent, intellectual Conservative party, we take more than a large share of seats in the Scottish Parliament.

Amendment No. 258 deals with the relative size of electorates.

Mr. Dalyell: It is just a thought, but would the hon. Gentleman have said that when he was a junior Foreign Office Minister?

Dr. Fox: As a junior Foreign Office Minister, I would not have presumed to say anything about Scotland. Given my departmental remit, I was happy to comment on the constitutional relationships in Sri Lanka and Nepal, but I would not have dared to stray on to the territory of the Scottish Office.

Amendment No. 258 deals with the relative size of the electorates who will return Members to this House. We have to ask in all seriousness why Scottish Members of Parliament should have the same size of electorate as proposed in the Bill to come to this House when they will not be dealing with the same work load as Members representing seats in England and Wales. The Scottish Members who come to this House will not be dealing with health or education, but, as the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) said, those issues take up two thirds of his work load. To tell the electorate that they must send a Member of Parliament to the House of Commons to do a third of the work that Members in England are doing would smack very much of snouts in the trough. I admit that that mentality is currently the hallmark of the Government, but it is not a sound constitutional model for the future.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): My hon. Friend is deploying some very profound arguments. He has dealt with the West Lothian question, representation at Westminster, and the relationship between ourselves and the proposed Scottish Parliament. Will he explain why we are on a one-line Whip, given that we are debating a fundamental matter that affects the very future of the United Kingdom?

Dr. Fox: I think that it would be out of order to discuss such matters, and the party's internal organisation is not a matter for me at this point, or, with respect, for the Committee.

Amendments Nos. 259 and 260—[Interruption.] I have not eyes to see.

Mr. Salmond: Within the sight of the Committee, an hon. Member made an intervention and is now being spoken to by a Conservative Whip. I hope that no restraining influence is being used, against the procedures and wishes of the House.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. Gentleman is in danger of compounding a felony.

Dr. Fox: I always thought that the hon. Gentleman was fully in favour of rehabilitation.

Amendments Nos. 259 and 260 deal with the timetable for the implementation of the Bill and the setting up the Scottish Parliament. We feel that it should not commence until the next report of the boundary commission as it affects Scotland. There is a simple, practical reason for that. The Scottish Parliament will be set up with about 129 MSPs. Yet, under clause 81, within the first term of the Scottish Parliament their number will be reduced. It does not seem a stable, practical basis for setting up a Parliament to say to the newly elected MSPs, "Off you go to Parliament, all 129 of you but, by the way, in the first term your numbers will be cut and some of you won't be there the second time around." That is hardly a recipe for harmony. Surely it makes sense to set up the Parliament with the numbers that will run for several terms. Would that not be a far more stable and sustainable basis on which to set up any new legislative body?

Sir Robert Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman not realise that the previous Government established a principle of exactly the opposite only a few years ago when they set up Aberdeenshire council with 47 councillors, only to inflict a boundary commission review increasing that number to 68?

Dr. Fox: If the hon. Gentleman found that so unpalatable, I am sure that he will support our amendment. Having experienced something that he did not like, he should try to avoid it happening again. That is what we are seeking to do. It is typical of the Liberal Democrats with their recent defector recruits—if I said defective, I apologise—the party for whom the Bells toll, that they should try to apply something that they do not like out of some bizarre sense of consistency, irrespective of the damage that it might do.

We are making a sound and practical proposal. As there will be a problem of relative over-representation in Scotland, why can we not have a single boundary change to establish the number of MSPs after the first election? Our amendments seek to introduce equality that does not exist in current legislation.

I am conscious of the time and I know that other hon. Members wish to speak as there are important issues to be considered. I know that my hon. Friends want to discuss some of the specific options in detail, but what is not on offer is that we do not address the West Lothian question. Some Labour Members profess themselves to be Unionists and I take no issue with their integrity on that, but if they wish to preserve the Union and want the new constitutional relationship to work, the problem must be addressed. Not addressing it will trigger a residual English nationalism which is just as potentially destructive for the Union as Scottish nationalism.

We all want to see patriotism in our politics, but we should avoid nationalism tinged with xenophobia. That is the issue which the House has to discuss and, if we get the arrangement wrong, it is not we who are doomed, but the Union itself.

Mr. McAllion: I shall be brief to allow the European experts to try to channel the debate into European byways, but I have to quarrel with the final sentiments of the hon. Member for Woodspring(Dr. Fox), who tried to draw a distinction between patriotism, which was wholly good, and nationalism, which was wholly bad. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that it was a false distinction.

Nationalism is not a single beast. There are different varieties of nationalism. It can be well argued that some of the speeches by Conservative Members—particularly those who regard themselves as Eurosceptic—are nationalistic. It seems that British nationalism is fine, but any other nationalism—Scottish, Welsh or Irish—is bad. That is not an acceptable distinction. If I were to draw such a distinction, it would be between ethnic nationalism, which is bad and should be rejected wherever it raises its ugly head, and civic nationalism, which is a good and progressive force that can be found all over the world spreading democracy and increasing the rights of ordinary people whatever their ethnic background. It is civic nationalism which is wound up in the Bill—a nationalism that gives the people who live in Scotland, no matter who they are, the same democratic rights as can be expected by people living in any other democratic society.

I strongly oppose the Conservative amendments because, if they have a unifying theme, it is to punish the Scots—to have a go at the Scottish Members of Parliament who remain here after a devolved Parliament is established in Scotland. In one way or another, the amendments punish Scottish Members. Their constituencies have to be bigger than the constituencies of other Members of Parliament—the figure produced is 120 per cent. The Opposition do not want parity between Scottish, English and Welsh constituencies; they want Scottish constituencies to be bigger than those elsewhere in the United Kingdom; and they want the Scots to be treated differently from people living anywhere in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman is making a case for parity between all parts of the United Kingdom, but that is what we have now in the United Kingdom Parliament. It is Labour which seeks to break that parity by establishing a separate Parliament in one part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. McAllion: We do not have parity; nor am I arguing for parity. But neither are the Opposition arguing for parity. They want to discriminate against Scotland. They want Scottish constituencies to be bigger than any other constituencies in this Parliament. I regard that as punitive against Scottish Members of this Parliament in that it treats them differently from any other Member of the United Kingdom Parliament. That is not a constructive attitude to be taken by the official Opposition at a time when they do not have a single Member representing a Scottish constituency.

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point, but several amendments have been tabled and they would have different effects. Is not one of the central issues that although the Government have accepted that there will have to be a change in the number of Scottish Members of Parliament, they will not accept that that change should be made at the same time as the Scottish Parliament at Holyrood starts? Does the hon. Gentleman think that that is justified and that the over-representation thereafter should continue?

Mr. McAllion: I do not think that the change is justified at all. I remember that, for a long time when we were in opposition, we argued against any change in the constituencies and said that it was completely irrelevant to change the size of Scottish constituencies, because Scottish Members would still have a role to play in this Parliament.

In any case, changing the size of Scottish constituencies does not affect what the Conservatives identify as the West Lothian question. What does it matter whether there are 73, 58 or 49 Scottish Members of Parliament? They will still be doing the same thing to which the Opposition object—voting on English and Welsh matters. Changing their number is neither here nor there.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Gentleman just said that Scottish Members of Parliament after the formation of the Scottish Parliament will be doing the same thing, but that is not true. They will not have nearly as many duties to perform on behalf on their constituencies as Members of Parliament currently have or as Members of Parliament who are not Scottish Members will continue to have after the Scottish Parliament has started, because so many matters will have been devolved to the Edinburgh Parliament.

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Lady completely misunderstands. Whichever Members get sent down from Scotland to represent Scottish constituencies in this Parliament will do exactly the same sort of work as other Members of Parliament. They will be here every night, voting in the Lobbies on every single issue and it is their right to do so, because this is a United Kingdom Parliament.

If the English people choose to have their domestic legislation dealt with in the United Kingdom Parliament, there is a price to pay for that choice. The price is this: whichever Members of that United Kingdom Parliament are here have a right to vote on that legislation. If the English Members do not like that, they have an alternative: they can go down the Scottish road, go back to their constituencies and around the country and argue for English devolution within a federal set-up. None of the Opposition Members have ever made any attempt whatsoever to do that. They have simply come here and whined and pined about how their rights as individual Back Benchers will be different from those of Scottish Members of Parliament. They should go back and talk to their constituents, because I do not detect anywhere in England the upsurge of feeling against Scotland that they talk about.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Lady is on her own—we all know that she is a bit benighted, but she is the only one who continually froths at the mouth about Scottish devolution. Even her own constituents are not that concerned about it, but I shall give way so as to allow her to froth once more.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank the hon. Gentleman for stopping frothing at the mouth for a moment. I rise only to point out that I have made the case in the House on a private Member's Bill for an English Parliament to mirror the powers, privileges and exemptions that the Scottish Parliament will have.

Mr. McAllion: I know that the hon. Lady has made the case in the House but how much campaigning has she done out on the stump around England? [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who used to represent Glasgow, Cathcart, made some comment from a sedentary position that I could not hear. He paid the price for not listening to the campaign for Scottish devolution. He was kicked by his Scottish constituents. His was the first Tory head to roll because the Tories would not listen to what the Scottish people were saying. If they had paid attention when he lost his seat they might still have a presence in Scotland.

10.30 pm

The continual refusal to listen to what the Scottish people want explains why the Conservatives have collapsed in my country. I remember, or rather I have read in history books, that 60 or 70 years ago, Scottish Members moved legislation for a Scottish Parliament in this House. They were laughed at. No one paid any attention to them but that did not stop them. They campaigned, kept up the fight, spoke to others and kept the idea alive. At the end of the trail, we are debating what they fought for all those years ago. It is the absence of that sort of fight in England which means that the Tories have no right to tell us that we cannot have our Parliament now.

Mr. Salmond: Is not the hon. Gentleman underestimating the intellectual ferment that we were assured the Conservative party was in?

Mr. McAllion: I never underestimate the Conservatives; I thought that they might win some seats at the general election. I was proved wrong then and I am sure that I would be proved wrong now if I said that there was intellectual ferment among Conservative Members. They are all just sitting there like dummies. [Interruption.] Well, they are. I can only say what I can see, though I am not wearing my glasses.

Mr. Gerald Howarth rose—

Mr. McAllion: The top dummy is up.

Mr. Howarth: I will see the hon. Gentleman outside afterwards, after that profoundly offensive remark. If he had not been such a dummy himself, sitting in the Tea Room or wherever it was—

The Chairman: Order. I think that a bad example has been set. I do not think that such words add to the dignity of Parliament.

Mr. Howarth: I am sure that they do not.

If the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) had been here throughout our earlier proceedings, he would have seen that many of my hon. Friends participated in the debates and that the expression that he used was therefore wholly inappropriate.

Mr. McAllion: I was not here earlier because I was attending a meeting in Committee Room 10. I was not sitting in the Tea Room but was carrying out my duties as a constituency Member of Parliament, looking after foreign affairs and trying to stop the war in the Gulf. There are other issues that affect Scottish Members that would require them to come here to debate after we have our own Parliament in Scotland.

Dr. Fox: I hate to bring the hon. Gentleman back to real world, however temporarily, but when he says that he thinks that the demand for Scottish constitutional change was overlooked for too long in England, he is making exactly the same mistake in thinking that he can impose a view of constitutional change on the English without their having anything to say about it. It is a grave mistake to think that the English, who constitute 90 per cent. of the UK population, will not have a view. He is in danger, through his comments, of putting the Union at risk.

Mr. McAllion: It is an oxymoron to talk about bringing me back to the real world in a debate in this place. Nothing could be further from the real word than our debates. Labour Members are not imposing anything on the English people. It is for the English people to articulate their demand for English home rule. Conservative Members can sit here all night saying what they think, but they must remember that, at the general election, they were defeated in England, just as they were in Scotland. They do not represent the voice of the English people. What they call for is not what the English people are calling for. When the English people legitimately call for their own Parliament and home rule, the Labour party and Government will support it; they would be mad no. to.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman or, failing that, perhaps the Minister later comment on the issue first raised in the House on 1 February 1977 by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), then the hon. Member for West Lothian, about whether following devolution, Members of this House would have the right to raise questions that are within the jurisdiction of a Scottish Parliament? If the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) cannot answer that, he is imposing significant restrictions on the rights of English Members.

Mr. McAllion: Any hon. Member would be entirely free to write to their equivalent Member of the Scottish Parliament and ask them to raise such issues in the Scottish Parliament. I am not trying to stop them doing that.

Devolution is a response to the democratic demands of the Scottish people. They have asked for their own home rule parliament. This Parliament, in its wisdom, has decided to honour the Labour party's manifesto commitment following the election of the Labour Government. There is nothing untoward in that. Conservative Members keep pointing out anomalies because a Scottish Parliament will exist in what used to be a unitary United Kingdom. Of course there are anomalies—but what about the anomalies before? When did we hear Conservative Members complaining about the way in which the poll tax and local government reorganisation were imposed on Scotland when nobody in Scotland wanted it? In the general election in 1992, 75 per cent. of the Scottish people voted against a Tory Government, but had one imposed on them. What about the sensibilities of Conservative Members then? There was not a whisper from them about any anomaly or inconsistency or anything being intolerable to the Scottish people.

I return to the point that I made at the beginning of my speech. The amendments' unifying theme is very much in line with what the Tories did for the past 18 years in Scotland. It is against the Scottish people and against their interests. Their constituencies would have to be bigger, and when their MSPs were sent down here they would be stopped from taking part or voting in certain debates. That is not as bad as the poll tax and local government reorganisation, but it is in the same vein. The Conservative Opposition have yet to learn the lesson of the general election defeat. It is time that they started listening to people in the constituencies in which they are trying to be elected, instead of telling them what they should be thinking.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that a vast amount of money is being paid to the Scottish people as a result of the United Kingdom Parliament's decisions? Whether or not that is justified it blows a hole in his argument. Furthermore, the amount of money that is being paid as a result of the Bill—the effect of giving jurisdiction to the Scottish Parliament with regard to education and all the range of reserved matters—indicates the huge gulf that the Government are creating between the Scottish people and those in the rest of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman's argument is completely flawed because, on one hand, money is largely being provided by taxpayers south of the border, and on the other, jurisdiction is being given to the Scottish parliament. Is not that the very reason why the West Lothian question is so important and why Scottish Members should not be allowed to vote twice?

Mr. McAllion: That is simply not true. The hon. Gentleman is simply wrong when he says that the English are subsidising Scottish public expenditure. Earlier debates on the Bill have patently shown that to be false. He does not include in the calculations all the non-identifiable expenditure largely spent in the south-east of England, or North sea oil revenue, which has been used by the people in the south to subsidise mass unemployment for 20 years. There are all kinds of arguments. The West Lothian question is a problem only because it is a problem for the Conservative party. That is the nub of the argument.

Somebody mentioned that there was likely to be a speech tomorrow night by the Leader of the Opposition in which he will advocate that an English Grand Committee should be set up to deal—[HON. MEMBERS: "How do you know?"] How do I know? The spin doctors are writing in the press. How do I know what my own party is saying? I have to read it in the papers. It is the only way I know what is happening in this world.

The Leader of the Opposition's speech brings into question the remarks made by Mr. Malcolm Rifkind, who used to be a very senior figure in the previous Government.

Hon. Members: Sir Malcolm.

Mr. Davidson: He did not beat his wife.

Mr. McAllion: The last thing that I want to do is to involve Sean Connery.

Malcolm Rifkind argued that were this Parliament to overrule the decisions of an English Grand Committee, it would lead to a constitutional crisis. I remember Malcolm Rifkind, Mr. Forsyth and others in the previous Parliament arguing that the answer to the Scottish problem was to set up a Scottish Grand Committee, which would be overruled when it suited the House of Commons. They did not see any constitutional crisis when they were in government. They only see constitutional crises when they are not in government. When will the Conservative party stop being an English nationalist party? There is no constituency even in England for such a party. The English people rumbled the Tories a long time ago. When will they begin a productive relationship with the peoples of this United Kingdom?

There is one amendment that I do not completely rule out—the one dealing with changing the boundaries for a Scottish Parliament. In the constitutional convention, there was a clear commitment on the part of all its members that there would be a separate boundary review for the 129 Members of the Scottish Parliament. I will never accept that, just because the number of Scottish Members at Westminster is reduced, the number at the Scottish Parliament must automatically be reduced, too. We in the convention committed ourselves to honouring the 129 Members of the Scottish Parliament by allowing them a separate boundary review. I hope that the Government will remain true to that commitment.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has reached an important point in his speech—[Laughter.] It is about the only important point in it. What he suggests is not, in fact, in the Bill. However many Scottish MPs are removed by the boundary review from this House, there will, under the Bill, be a commensurate reduction in directly elected seats and regional seats in the Scottish Parliament. That is what the Bill says: will the hon. Gentleman support the Bill?

Mr. McAllion: The clauses dealing with that were not debated tonight owing to the timetable, but it is a serious issue which will have to be debated. What the right hon. Gentleman describes does not tally with the commitment that the Labour party gave in the constitutional convention. We rightly make great play of honouring the commitments that we gave in that convention. Here is one commitment that we should honour; I shall continue to support it.

The Opposition are for ever saying that the English people are Unionists. Being Unionist is not the same as being anti-Scottish. That is a distinction which they fail to make. The Opposition seem to think it impossible to be a good Unionist without being prepared to put the boot into Scotland and Scottish interests. They cannot conceive of a kind of Unionism that operates with Scotland and England being partners in a reformed relationship, a very different one from the sort of Unionism that they used to represent many years ago. Their type of Unionism died at the 1997 general election.

If there is to be a Unionist future, it will be very different from anything the Opposition recognise. The sooner they understand that, the better.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Although we should all be grateful to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) for preventing war in the Gulf, as he apparently did in a Committee Room this evening, he may have made some mistakes when assessing the current situation. For instance, he made a vicious personal attack on me, saying that I had lost my seat in Scotland because I had failed to listen to people's views on devolution.

There are probably many reasons why I was thrown out of my seat, but, in 1979, there was a vigorous Conservative party in Scotland which was absolutely opposed to devolution. We fought the battle hard and wiped out the SNP from the House of Commons. The SNP's 11 Members of Parliament were knocked for six. Unfortunately, because the nationalist vote collapsed on that occasion, and because I depended on an adequate SNP vote, I was thrown out at the same time.

I had warned the Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, who had told me to eradicate the SNP, that that would mean eradicating me, too. It appears that she, having considered the bargain, was willing to take the risk.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman has cheered me up a great deal. I now realise that there was a silver lining to the 1979 general election result. He speaks of the SNP being eradicated at that election. True, we did not do very well; we had only two seats left. But eradication means having no seats, as the Conservatives in Scotland have now.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is right. Losing nine of 11 seats is a substantial reduction, shall we say? The lesson presumably was that supporting the nonsense of devolution does not necessarily knock the SNP for six.

I was also astonished by what the hon. Member for Dundee, East said about the size of constituencies. He said that we should not change the arrangements and have larger Scottish constituencies. I tried to understand the logic of that assertion. He seemed to be saying that my constituents who live in multi-storey flats are not as important as his constituents who might live in bungalows with big gardens. Trying to calculate an hon. Member's significance according to size of constituency or size of property would lead to constitutional madness.

10.45 pm

The hon. Gentleman said, finally, that if the English do not like the Bill, they can have their devolved Parliament too. Can there be a sillier answer? I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) has tabled an extremely sensible private Member's Bill that has made many people think about the issue, but why should we land ourselves with a separate assembly with lots of extra Members of Parliament all of whom want secretaries and researchers and to go on trips to the United States and Canada to study devolution there? Why should we undertake the huge responsibility of paying for all that?

One of these days, the hon. Gentleman will have to tell the people of Scotland what he has done to them, and the cost that they must pay for it.

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Gentleman is missing an important part of the scenario for England, which is the massive reduction of seats in this place. That would be warmly welcomed by people across the United Kingdom. The House of Lords could be turned into the House of 200, and that could be the federal Parliament, so we could do away with this House entirely.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am trying to present a logical argument. I do not understand what the hon. Gentleman is getting at. I am told that the House of Lords has 1,500 members and is the cheapest assembly in the world. It may not be the most logical one, but it works, which the Scottish Parliament will not do for the United Kingdom.

I have noticed in the debates on Scottish devolution that every minute there is less enthusiasm for the idea. When we started, there was a huge amount of enthusiasm for a devolved Parliament, but now we see it fading away. Those who think about the matter seriously—there are some hon. Members on all Benches who think about it seriously—have suddenly realised the significance of clause 33.

The first time a Secretary of State tells the Scottish Parliament, "I'm sorry, that law is dead," that will be the beginning, as Scottish National party Members are well aware, of a deep division. When the Scottish Parliament says, "We believe that this is okay constitutionally," and the English Parliament says, "No, the legislation is dead," there will be a terrible problem. Having lived in Scotland for most of my life, I know what that will mean.

We have just been talking about taxes and the problems that will arise. Hon. Members on the Government Front Bench are well aware, as the Conservatives learnt to their cost, that the problem of SNP-ism—the problem of the desire for independence—is not solved by offering a halfway house. It does not work and it will not work.

Mr. Salmond: Is the hon. Gentleman's conclusion, then, that this Parliament cannot overrule a Scottish Parliament without division? Presumably this Parliament could not abolish a Scottish Parliament without division, so what is his conclusion?

Sir Teddy Taylor: My conclusion is that the structure of the devolved Parliament is such that, as the hon. Gentleman is well aware, it will lead to bitter division between Westminster and Edinburgh and will lead to the kind of fracas that will destroy our nation. The evidence is clear. The hon. Gentleman knows that, when devolution gets going, his party will have a great future. It may be good for Scotland; it may not. People should wake up to what will happen.

Mr. Hayes: Is not my hon. Friend drawing attention to what has been described as the balkanisation of Britain? It was described as such by John Strachey, who was the Member of Parliament for Dundee, West, I think. Perhaps that suggests that the west of Dundee has a greater propensity for intellectualism than the east.

Sir Teddy Taylor: John Strachey was in charge of food rationing and ran an admirable system whereby he saved public expenditure by making the food coupons so small that people who did not have glasses could not read them. That certainly saved expenditure, which was important.

If we are to proceed with the Bill, we must sort out the problem in a sensible way. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and I have put forward a suggestion. If hon. Members do not like our idea, what do they suggest? In the old days—I am one of the oldest Members here—people used to face up to problems. A great chap called Gladstone was a wonderful Prime Minister and a Liberal Democrat. He introduced a Bill about Ireland in 1893. He wrote clearly and precisely in the Bill that the answer to his devolution proposal was to have no Irish Members in this Parliament. That caused a great deal of distress and concern in Ireland, but at least he faced up to the issue and said, "This is my idea."

Another great chap was Harold Wilson from the Labour party—in fact, he is one of my favourite Prime Ministers. He was not terribly popular with some, but I thought that he was a gem. He faced up to the situation. Unlike many in the Labour party, Harold Wilson was a gentleman. He said that the devolution problem could be solved if people "considered their position." Basically, he told the Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland that, if they were to get devolution—which he thought was a good idea at the time—they must consider their position when issues are raised in this place that related not to Northern Ireland, but to England, Scotland or Wales.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

Harold Wilson suggested tackling the problem through honour. He wanted all Northern Ireland Members to say, "This is not our business, so we will go home and study other matters or serve on a Committee and see if we can improve the situation in Northern Ireland." If everyone had been as honourable as Harold Wilson, there would have been no problem. Sadly, things do not work out like that. We simply cannot solve constitutional problems by appealing to people's honour—particularly in a narrow situation such as this.

So what can we do? My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills and I have made a suggestion in proposed new clause 6.

Mr. Dalyell: As the hon. Gentleman can imagine, I had several meetings in the middle 1970s with Harold Wilson about the devolution question. The difficulty—as he would eloquently put it—was that the Irish never failed to ask for certain favours in return, especially when it came to the nationalisation of steel and problems with the late Woodrow Wyatt and the late Desmond Donnelly. There is a price to pay for playing that game.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. He points out the logic of the situation: if we rely on people being gentlemanly, we sometimes find that the so-called gentlemen will exact their price. There was no steel in Northern Ireland, so the Irish Members of Parliament said, "If we are to act like gentlemen, we want something for it; if the Government have a narrow majority, we want something in return." That is the trouble with running things on the basis of all being gentlemen together. There will always be rascals: someone will say, "I'll be a gentleman if you pay my price"—which might be a trip to South America, a place on the Front Bench or dinner with one of the party Whips. There are many prices, and we cannot pay them all. That would prove very expensive indeed.

So what shall we do if we are not going to try to solve our problems by having dinner with the Chief Whip? The answer is simply that we must do something. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills and I have made a simple suggestion. New clause 6 says that, from the beginning of the new Scottish Parliament:

"no member of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Scotland"— whether it has multi-storey flats, bungalows or anything else—

"shall be entitled to vote in that House on any matter . . . relating solely to another part . . . of the United Kingdom."

That is a sensible suggestion.

Sir Robert Smith: While I appreciate that the principle behind the proposed new clause is sensible, does the hon. Gentleman realise that, for the first year, the Scottish Parliament will meet as a shadow Parliament with no responsibility for Scottish affairs, so the consequence of his new clause would be to allow English Members to have a say in Scottish affairs for one year while denying members of the Scottish Parliament any say in English affairs? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman might think about withdrawing his proposed new clause, which is flawed, while recognising that the Government may accept the principle behind it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is a very sensible and helpful suggestion. If, like the Liberal Democrats, the Government can respond positively, I shall be happy to withdraw the new clause. If the Government say that my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills and I have not got it exactly right, but that they accept the principle behind new clause 6 and promise to introduce an even more sensible measure that takes account of the problem, I shall happily withdraw it.

Mr. Davidson: Would the hon. Gentleman intend to apply the same principle to the Natonal Assembly for Wales, to London because of the London authority and to any northern assembly that might come about, or are we faced simply with an anti-Scottish measure?

Sir Teddy Taylor: In no sense is the amendment anti-Scottish. I am trying to protect the United Kingdom. I am trying to safeguard the people of Scotland and the people of England because I love them both equally. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no question of my being anti-Scottish.

I say to the hon. Gentleman honestly and seriously that if he thinks that we can have a similar answer for the regions, he is living in cloud cuckoo land. I know that he is a busy person who takes an interest in many things—perhaps helping the hon. Member for Dundee, East to stop war in the Gulf—but he should think about the English regions. No one wants them, apart from people in the north-east of England, who seem to think that a regional system will help them to receive the same Euro-subsidies as they get in Scotland.

Mr. Davidson: The hon. Gentleman says that no one, apart from people in the north of England, wants regional assemblies. Has he taken London into account? I am not clear whether his answer is a yes or a no. Would he extend the principle to other areas that might have a form of devolved structure?

Sir Teddy Taylor: If people do not want regional government, cannot afford it and see no benefit in it, given the limited amount of certainty that is left we shall not find the answer by following that course. No one is suggesting that regional authorities should have the same powers as the Scottish Parliament. Those who follow these matters carefully will understand that these proposals are being shoved on us because of pressure from the European Union, which wants regions established throughout Europe and the abolition of democratic national Parliaments.

We must face the problem. If my suggestion is unacceptable, what should we do instead? We cannot look forward to the future with an Assembly that will do huge damage to the present Government and to Scotland, but if we are to have such an Assembly, let us not turn it into a constitutional nightmare. Unfortunately, we shall face such a nightmare if something is not done along the lines that I have suggested.

I appeal to the House of Commons to realise that something must be done. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills and I have openly, fairly and clearly made a suggestion. If we are wrong, what suggestion should take its place? If nothing is done the foreseeable nightmare will become even worse.

Mr. Dalyell: I shall reply in some detail and seriousness to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). He said at the beginning of his speech that we are confronted with a problem that faced a man called Gladstone. That certainly was the case. Morley's biography of Gladstone describes in detail the problem that Morley called the problem of the ins and outs. Joseph Chamberlain followed, with similar results. The proposed answer was unworkable for a simple reason—there is such a thing as the Treasury.

It is all very well having dispensations and people acting honourably and saying, "All right, we won't vote on certain matters." If there is a Government with a large majority, that may be possible, but if there is a Government with anything like the majorities of the 1970s and the mid-1960s, that response is impossible because it becomes impossible to run any sort of economic policy.

So it was in Ireland. The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East knows his history. What about Carson? Carson said that it would be impossible in terms of Dublin government—this was in 1912—because the ins and outs would not work. One listens seriously to the hon. Gentleman, but if his proposal had been a possibility and if it had been workable, those clever men John Smith and Bruce Millan, and those equally clever men Sir John Garlick and Sir Michael Quinlan, would surely have alighted on it in the mid-1970s, but they turned it down as unworkable.

I shall not insult the hon. Gentleman by saying that it is an old chestnut—[Interruption.] It is not often that a Whip comes to sit beside me. I have to say that I am wearing the wrong glasses. I cannot read what the Whip was indicating.

I am in the position of the night watchman. The truth is that the enterprise on which we are embarked remains one of peculiar and, perhaps, unique difficulty. It is hard to find any significant example of an established semi-federal state—one in which a substantial proportion of the population are governed—

It being Eleven o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. Clelland.]

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

11.1 pm

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): I should declare a general interest: I act as consultant for my former employer, Novartis, a multinational company. However, I do not know its view on the multilateral agreement on investment, if it has one. It is perhaps also relevant to mention that I am a member of the World Development Movement, which has taken a critical view of the MAI.

I requested this Adjournment debate in view of the rather striking discrepancies between the official view of the MAI, as expressed by the negotiating Governments, and the fears expressed by the World Development Movement and other non-governmental organisations. I have the draft agreement, which is available in the Library for any hon. Member who would like a copy, and it contains both positive and negative potential. I should like to identify the areas of concern and ask the Minister either to dispel them or, where she agrees that there is a potential problem, to tell us whether the Government will fight for improvements.

The basic principle of the multilateral agreement—that there should be a common basis for attracting investment—is not necessarily controversial. The present patchwork of conditions and special arrangements around the world is profoundly unhelpful to companies with foreign investments, for companies that invest around the world, and, therefore, is particularly unsatisfactory for Britain, with its numerous major international investors.

Conversely, most of us on the left feel that multinational companies increasingly escape from all forms of control. If the agreement were to balance rights and responsibilities, it could be profoundly helpful. In fact, it could be more helpful than many national policies, to which we devote much more attention. I note that the Conservative Benches are entirely empty.

The usual objection to constraints on multinational behaviour is that companies may take their business elsewhere. With a potentially global agreement, and with a balance of rights and responsibilities, we could be less constrained, as we would have to worry about losing business only to little green men from Mars. Furthermore, the requirement that domestic companies should not be given unfair preference, although previously controversial, has now become the norm in most sectors in the developed world.

However, there are a number of matters of concern that, if true, would be major obstacles to acceptance in Britain and in most other countries. First, is it true that local authorities and national Governments will be prohibited not only from discrimination against foreign firms, but from certain types of ethical restriction, even if that ethical restriction is also applied to domestic firms? Could they refuse to give a contract to a firm believed to have used slave labour elsewhere, or to have treated unacceptably the work force, the environment or animals?

The disputed paragraph 4 in the draft treaty would explicitly allow such a restriction, at least for local behaviour: that is to say, behaviour within Britain. Will the Government fight for the retention of the wording of that passage, as it is clear that a number of delegations still oppose it?

Secondly, is it true that if developing countries later sign up, they will not be allowed to claim exemptions? If it would be by negotiation, will the Government commit themselves to ensuring that developing countries get a fair deal in those negotiations and are not forced to expose their fledgling industries to instant, massive competition? It is not 20 or 30 years since we in Britain felt the need to protect our industries by special legislation, and we should not expect less from developing countries.

Thirdly, given that multinationals receive considerable benefits from such a level playing field, would it not be reasonable to impose certain responsibilities? In particular, will the Government insist on the retention of the strict formulation of the section "Not Lowering Standards", including a ban on countries waiving labour and environmental laws to attract investment? Will there be any obligation to respect agreed international standards from other treaties, such as environmental treaties, and not just local treaties? If the Philippines wanted to attract investment to Manila, would it be able to say, "If you invest with us, you don't have to worry about that law. We'll waive it for you"? If the section that would rule out such behaviour retains its teeth, it will go a fair way towards making the treaty more balanced between rights and responsibilities.

Fourthly, France has said that it will not sign if the United States is given an exemption for the Helms-Burton law with its illegal boycott of Cuba. Given Britain's strong opposition to Helms-Burton, will we support the French stance? I see reports that President Clinton is seeking ways to soften the boycott. If we take him at his word, this agreement could give him useful ammunition. The boycott seems to be in clear contravention of the draft article on secondary investment boycotts, and if the multilateral agreement on investment will help us get rid of it, it would be an important point in its favour.

Fifthly, under that article would it still be possible to boycott countries that the United Nations agreed were violating international standards? That approach was effective against apartheid, and is currently being applied to Iraq. If South Africa still had apartheid, would it be illegal under the MAI for a local authority or government to campaign against the importing of South African wine?

The draft article on secondary investment boycotts prevents authorities in Britain from taking any account of how companies behave outside Britain, as long as the behaviour is locally legal and is not in conflict with international law. If that is so, the position needs to be modified to allow objections to companies that are violating not just international law, but United Nations resolutions. Otherwise, we should be in the absurd position of being suddenly forbidden to enforce the sanctions on Iraq in so far as they affected movements of capital. I cannot imagine that that would be the intention of most of the likely signatories.

Sixthly, is it true that trading pollution quotas for environmentally friendly technology, as envisaged at Kyoto, would be an illegal anti-competitive subsidy?

Seventhly, I understand that the United States is resisting the draft clause allowing increasing European Union integration, while insisting that US state Governments be allowed to maintain discriminatory practices indefinitely without any commitment to ever rolling them back. What is the Government's position on that?

Finally, it has been suggested that a partial agreement may be signed in April covering only some of the issues. Will the Government insist that that should not implement the free-trade aspects, while postponing the labour and environmental safeguards to a nebulous future?

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely, and agree with much of what he is saying.

The environmental study by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, commissioned at the behest of the British Government, was not discussed at the January OECD meeting. The Secretary of State for International Development has commissioned a study of the impact on developing countries, but we are told that it will not be presented until 23 March. Given those facts, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is some logic in the Government's withholding signature in April, and delaying it until we have secured an agreement that satisfies us that all the impacts on the developing world and the environment can be properly addressed?

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful for that interesting intervention, but I think it is more a question for my hon. Friend the Minister, so I shall not attempt to deal with it.

I am aware that other hon. Members want to speak briefly before the Minister's reply, so I shall conclude my speech. If my hon. Friend can cast light on the issues that I have raised, she will have done a real service to a great many concerned individuals and groups and reinforced our commitment as a Government to an ethical foreign policy. This agreement has real potential. I hope that we shall make the most of it, and will not allow ourselves to be trapped into making an agreement that does not give the benefits for which we all hope.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. It is normal in Adjournment debates for Members who wish to speak to have obtained the permission of both the hon. Member who has secured the debate and the Minister. Do I take it that that applies in this case?

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): Yes.

11.12 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I shall be brief.

The House is indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) for securing the debate, and for putting his case.

When the Minister replies, I should be grateful if she would acknowledge some serious concerns about the MAI. First, the agreement promotes the unfettered power of multinational corporations—many of which are larger than national Governments, can move capital around the world at whim and yet can deny the movement of labour around the world at whim. That should be contrasted with the attempts of the International Labour Organisation to impose minimum standards around the world, with the welcome steps taken at Rio a few years ago in setting a worldwide environmental agenda, and with what was achieved at the Kyoto conference on climate change.

The MAI will increase world trade and the amount of transport of goods world wide, and I believe it will be very damaging to economies in the poorest developing countries in the world.

It appears to many people—not just those lobbying on behalf of aid agencies and others—that all the aces are being stacked in favour of the OECD members that are busy negotiating all kinds of get-out clauses and protections for themselves, while the world's poorest countries have no alternative but to sign the agreement, knowing that they will have no control over what multinational capital does in their countries about land ownership, import substitution or anything else that those countries may wish to impose in order to protect themselves and encourage development of the living standards of their people.

We are debating serious matters. The Minister should say that Britain will not sign the agreement until we are sure that it is environmentally sustainable and will not destroy the ability of poor countries to develop themselves rather than hand their economic development to international capital.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) on securing the debate, for which many hon. Members are present. Perhaps the Minister will say whether we can have more time to apply the full parliamentary scrutiny that the subject of the debate requires. We would all appreciate that. Perhaps through our Select Committee procedure we could find an opportunity to investigate the matter in even greater detail. Hon. Members in all parts of the House are anxious to ensure that agreements are environmentally sustainable, and I emphasise that in this important debate.

11.15 pm

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I apologise to the House and to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) for my late arrival. I missed his opening comments and my excuse is the vagaries of the House in Committee.

I thank my hon. Friend for raising the topic of the multilateral agreement on investment. He has done the House a great service, and the debate gives me an opportunity to bring hon. Members up to date on the agreement since our previous debate on the matter on 23 July last year. In that debate, I outlined the background and, I hope, corrected some of the misunderstandings about the MAI, which is currently being negotiated within the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

In the Government's view, the flow of investment across national borders is an integral and usually a welcome part of global economic reality. Britain has a particularly large stake in that in both directions, and it is difficult to imagine what the British economy would be like without the contributions of European, American and Asian companies. My hon. Friend spoke about that. We are second only to the United States in outward direct investment to developed and developing countries throughout the globe.

The United Kingdom has a strong interest in creating a framework in which foreign investment can prosper and make its full contribution to the global economy.

[Mrs. Barbara Roche]

Above all, we must bear it in mind that the MAI is about non-discrimination. The idea is that foreign investors should be treated no less well than domestic investors or each other. Another key feature that is planned for it is a binding dispute settlement system that will cover state-to-state and investor-to-state disputes. The Government support those basic principles, although there are some important issues in the agreement on which we are not yet fully satisfied. I shall return to those.

If an agreement can be reached that increases the confidence and security of foreign investors, and if the detailed terms are right and our specific concerns are properly addressed, we shall want to sign it. However, I make no bones about the fact that there is some way to go. It might be useful to explain the state of the negotiations, to clarify some confused recent press coverage. In late May last year, which was the original deadline for completing the negotiations, OECD Ministers unanimously decided to extend the time limit to the next OECD ministerial meeting on 27 and 28 April this year. However, at a high-level meeting last week to prepare for the April event, the United States stated that it would not be ready to reach an agreement by April. All OECD countries accepted that they should intensify their efforts to resolve outstanding issues, with a view to making as much progress as possible by April, and that, in the light of that progress, it was for OECD Ministers at the April meeting to decide what to do next.

At this stage, the most important outstanding issues for the UK are the treatment of environmental and other regulatory issues, labour standards and the listing of "exceptions", by which countries may reserve the right not to accept MAI obligations in full in particular sectors or in relation to categories of governmental activity. On environmental and labour matters, there has been a distinct change of policy by the UK. This Government have been taking the lead in ensuring that the MAI will not undermine regulation in those sectors, as some people claimed it might. It is essential that we avoid that, and I am confident that we shall, as all participants in the negotiations recognise the need to do so.

In addition, we have pressed hard for unambiguous reaffirmation in the MAI of commitments to sustainable development and core labour standards; for close association with the MAI of OECD guidelines for multinational enterprises, which are collective recommendations by OECD Governments to multinationals on good corporate behaviour; and for a strong and binding provision on not waiving environmental or labour standards to attract particular investments. That is one of the important questions that my hon. Friend has put to me. The majority now share our strong line on those points, although some remain to be persuaded.

It was this UK Government who proposed a review of the MAI and environmental policy. The first part, an overview of the literature on foreign direct investment and the environment, is on the internet. The second part, on the relationship between the MAI and multilateral environmental agreements, is under discussion and should be available shortly.

In short, the Government are absolutely determined to ensure that there is no risk that the MAI will undermine environmental protection and labour standards.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Roche: May I finish this point?

We have said it many times before and I say it again: if there were such a risk, we would not sign the agreement.

Dr. Jones: The Minister has answered my question. I was going to seek the assurances that she has just given.

Mrs. Roche: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The Government believe that, far from being a threat to environmental and other standards, the MAI provides a useful opportunity to encourage all participants to raise their standards, but we do not believe that it would be either right or practicable to make the MAI an instrument by which to impose particular labour or environmental standards on other countries. There would be a danger of deterring potential members from joining, without achieving any improvement in standards. The Government are working hard in the appropriate forums to raise international labour and environmental standards.

I hope that I can allay other anxieties that have been expressed. The idea that an investor should be allowed to challenge the state has been received with horror in some quarters. It has been suggested that that is a threat even to democracy, but private interests can and do mount legal challenges to state decisions in the UK and in other democracies, and binding international arbitration for investor-to-state disputes has existed for many years in the UK's numerous bilateral investment treaties. What is new in the MAI is binding international arbitration for investor-to-state disputes, over a wider range of issues than in existing bilateral treaties.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe mentioned local government. The agreement will apply to all levels of government, including local government, but it will not obstruct local government or interfere with programmes that are aimed at increasing employment opportunities for local people. We would not expect nationality of ownership to be a factor in local government decisions, but we have consulted local authorities. They have not identified any problems or any need for exceptions. If any do come to light, we shall, of course, consider them.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I understand that the USA has sought exemption for its states and local government. If so, surely that should ring warning bells for us to protect our national and local government.

Mrs. Roche: As part of the negotiations, countries will try to get exemptions. I am stating the position, as we understand it, from the UK's viewpoint and giving an assurance that we have consulted local government. If it raises objections, we shall certainly consider them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe asked about developing countries. The agreement will not be forced on reluctant developing countries. Many have attended seminars in Latin America, Asia and Africa to learn more about the MAI. For many of the more advanced developing countries, the MAI is an attractive opportunity. Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Hong Kong, China and Slovakia are already observers at the negotiations and are keen to join at the earliest possible stage. Others are queueing up for the same treatment. The reason is, of course, that inward investment is a key element in their development plans. Naturally, we recognise that many of the least developed countries may have difficulty taking on the full range of obligations immediately. Negotiations are progressing on how to tackle that. It is important to do that.

Whatever the solution, the British Government will be determined to ensure that the agreement does not damage the interests of the poorest countries. If possible, it should offer opportunities to the developing world as a whole. As has already been mentioned, the Department for International Development has commissioned a review of any implications that the MAI may have for poorer developing countries. That will be made public upon completion.

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mrs. Roche: I should like to make progress. I would usually give way, but I am anxious—

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Roche: Yes, but very briefly.

Mr. Corbyn: When will the report be ready?

Mrs. Roche: It will certainly be ready before April and will be available for consideration.

One persistent complaint in the press and in documents from the non-governmental organisations is that the MAI negotiations have been secret. That was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley). That is simply not the case, either in the UK or in the OECD. The start of the negotiations was announced, as were other milestones. Representatives of labour and business have been kept in close touch, as have trade unions and local government.

More recently, in response to legitimate NGO interest, many groups have had discussions with officials and with my noble Friend Lord Clinton-Davis. There have been various public events. In the OECD, there have been briefings after meetings of the negotiating group, consultations with non-member countries and consultations with NGOs. The current draft text is available on the internet. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke–on–Trent, North raised a point about parliamentary scrutiny. All the appropriate parliamentary scrutiny processes will be adhered to.

The next major stage in the process will be the ministerial meeting in April, at which OECD Ministers collectively can review progress and the prospects for achieving a satisfactory agreement.

Ms Walley: Have the opportunities for detailed parliamentary scrutiny by Select Committees passed by? How can we have influence before a decision is made?

Mrs. Roche: The opportunity has not gone by. All the European scrutiny processes of Select Committees and Standing Committees will have to be undertaken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe raised a number of other points. The United Kingdom strongly supports the European Union-wide position against Helms-Burton. He asked about sanctions. Any United Nations sanctions would prevail over MAI obligations. He also raised an important question about trading pollution quotas. That would not be prohibited.

We do not think that there is a possibility of even a partial agreement in April, but, even if there were, we would not postpone our aims on environmental and labour standards.

This has been a welcome opportunity to hear hon. Members' views. It is important that we consult widely during our presidency of the European Union and beyond. We shall ensure that the consultation process is as wide as possible.

I hope that I have explained the Government's position in the short time available. Our stance is balanced. The MAI is potentially a useful agreement, but we must get it right. We shall keep the House informed.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes to Twelve midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Telemedicine

1. Mrs. Butler: What proposals he has to promote the benefits of telemedicine in the NHS. [29313]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): Telemedicine means harnessing the latest in information technology so as to benefit patients. X-rays and scans can be examined by specialists hundreds of miles away from the patient. Hospitals can send test results to general practitioners and GPs can send patient information to specialists. All this is to provide even higher quality treatment for patients. That is why we are developing telemedicine.

Madam Speaker: Is the Secretary of State taking Question 15 with Question 1?

Mr. Dobson: I understood, Madam Speaker, that Question 15 had been withdrawn.

Madam Speaker: No. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is in his place. We can take the two questions together.

Mr. Dobson: In that case, with the permission of the House, I should like to take Question 15 with Question 1.

Madam Speaker: My pleasure.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to promote the benefits of telemedicine in the NHS.

Mrs. Butler: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, for a truly modern and dependable health service, we should make better use of information technology? For instance, would it not be a good idea for general practitioners to have such technology at their fingertips so that patients could then and there be booked into hospital out-patient appointments? Will my right hon. Friend consider such a scheme?

Mr. Dobson: That is certainly something that we aim for. We think that a great deal of people's frustration with the health service is having to go to their general practitioners and then having to wait for an out-patient's appointment to be made. By using information technology, it should in future be possible for people to have an appointment made there and then at the GP's premises. If people then go to an out-patient department, an in-patient appointment could be made in the same way.

Mr. Pike: I can assure my right hon. Friend that I had no intention of withdrawing Question 15.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said. Will not information technology be crucial in the 21st century in giving us a modern and efficient national health service, to which the Government are committed, and that it will play an integral part in developing that process as we go forward?

Mr. Dobson: That is indeed the case. Information technology in the health service is unsatisfactory at present and needs substantially to be improved. I can say from experience within my constituency at the national hospital for neurology and neurosurgery that, if a patient has something wrong with his brain, the authorities flash the scan over to Paris where a professor, who is the world's expert, can examine the scan at the same time as the staff at Queen square, WC1. That is immensely to the benefit of patients, and we want that sort of idea to spread.

Mr. Ian Taylor: Excited as I am by information technology, I am sure that the Secretary of State will recognise that the key feature is not the technology but what it can do. Will the right hon. Gentleman continue to ensure that technology is used to the fullest extent to devolve the health service to small general practitioner practices in rural areas and, ultimately, even [illegible]e home, so that people may get a fairly instant reaction to injuries that they have sustained? The beauty of the internet, combined with the NHS network, is that we can obtain access to expert information rapidly. That can transform the rather bureaucratic and centre-driven aspects of the national health service.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman has made a good series of points, which I take on board. We are to introduce NHS direct, and we are running pilot schemes from 1 April. We intend to have a scheme covering the entire country. People will be able to ring in to talk about their condition and receive advice from a nurse-organised help line. We believe that that will be effective and popular.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The right hon. Gentleman will know that the year 2000 problems that his Department is tackling will take up virtually the whole of his IT budget. He has set out in the White Paper details of NHS direct and the other schemes about which he has just told the House, which are all desirable and which the Opposition strongly support. However, will he look carefully at the resources available for information technology within the NHS and talk urgently to the Treasury about additional funds, which will be necessary to do all the things that he wants to do and the whole House wants him to do?

Mr. Dobson: We hope that, over a period of time, the national health service will get all the resources that it needs to do its job properly, including resources for information technology. The present state of information technology in the NHS is deplorable and it will take a long time and a lot of money to put right.

Dental Services (Shropshire)

2. Mr. Paterson: If he will make a statement on dental services in Shropshire. [29314]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): Shropshire is an area where we have inherited local difficulties of access to national health service dentistry. Shropshire health authority has submitted eight proposals under the investing in dentistry scheme. One has already been approved at a cost of £45,000.

Mr. Paterson: NHS dentistry is not available to any new patients in Oswestry and, although the new schemes are welcome, they are many miles away. What action will the Minister take this afternoon for the 10,000 to 20,000 people who are estimated by the local heath authority to be on lists for NHS dentistry treatment?

Mr. Milburn: The one thing that I did not bring with me today was my cheque book. I assure the hon. Gentleman that all the proposals received from his area are being considered seriously. In some ways, he wins the award for bare-faced cheek, as it was his Government who ran down NHS dentistry in the first place, not just in Shropshire but throughout the country. This Government will build it up again.

Tobacco Advertising

3. Ms Stuart: If he will make a statement on progress towards implementing the EC directive on tobacco advertising. [29315]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): A common position was agreed on 4 December at the Health Council and was formally adopted on 12 February at the Research Council. The text will now be considered by the European Parliament and the Government will continue to work hard to achieve final adoption of that important and long-awaited legislation.

Ms Stuart: Is it not the case that that historic agreement would not have been achieved without the British vote? Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Birmingham health authority on its public health policy of a smoke-free city, particularly its half a million annual expenditure programme targeting both young and adult smokers? Will she also congratulate Birmingham on achieving a 50 per cent. increase in the number of calls to the national quit smoking line this year alone?

Ms Jowell: I am happy to congratulate Birmingham on its efforts to reduce smoking. Birmingham sets a clear example and the Government will build on the experience of such cities in taking action across a range of areas to combat smoking. We shall publish our plans in a White Paper later this year. Birmingham is a smoke-free city; it is an extremely good model for combating the harm done by smoking in public places. However, it is clear that a ban on tobacco advertising must be central to all our efforts to protect children from the pernicious effects of tobacco manufacturers' efforts to recruit them to smoking and to get them to take up an addictive habit that will only do them harm.

Mrs. Lait: Is not the high cost of tobacco one of the most effective deterrents to smoking? What discussions has the Minister had with her fellow Ministers in the Health Council about raising the excise duty on tobacco in other European countries so that bootleggers and smugglers can no longer undercut our high taxation policy by selling cheap tobacco to youngsters?

Ms Jowell: I agree with the hon. Lady that maintaining the high cost of tobacco is an important part of combating consumption, particularly among children. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is aware of that and has raised the matter with other European Finance Ministers. He has also taken a lead in setting up tough action to combat fraud and smuggling.

Mr. Stevenson: While my hon. Friend's statement about a ban on tobacco advertising in Europe is welcome, is it not a serious contradiction, given that the European Union spends some 1 billion European currency units on subsidising tobacco that cannot be sold elsewhere because it is of such a low quality? Will my hon. Friend make every effort in the European Council to end that serious situation? On the one hand, we are trying to reduce smoking but, on the other, taxpayers' money is subsidising tobacco production.

Ms Jowell: Yes, that is a contradiction. I shall raise the matter with other European Health Ministers, just as my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has expressed the Government's concern in the Agriculture Council.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: Is the Minister aware of the considerable disparity between the revenue raised by the Chancellor through tobacco sales and the low priority given to resources for health promotion? The two figures do not bear comparison. As well as driving forward the agenda to secure an EEC directive, does she recognise the need to promote health among young people? They should not start smoking, but, if they have, they should be encouraged to stop.

Ms Jowell: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor shares with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and Ministers across Government a determination to reduce both the rate at which children take up smoking and tobacco consumption. Smoking costs the national health service £1.4 billion every year. We are determined to reduce that figure by cutting consumption. I remind the House of the previous Government's legacy to the children of this country: in 1992, one in four 15-year-old girls smoked; in 1997, the figure was one in three.

Young Women

4. Mr. Sheerman: What steps he is taking to promote healthy styles of living among young women. [29316]

Ms Jowell: The Government's Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation" sets out a strategy for promoting healthy life styles among the whole population, including young women. We are working with the Health Education Authority and the media on initiatives to address issues that are relevant to young women, including smoking rates, alcohol consumption, sexual health and teenage pregnancy.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend will know that, although I welcome what she has said, after 10 months under a Labour Government, many Labour Members are a little impatient for a formidable national advertising campaign to tackle the health of young women. Will she commission the best advertising agencies in this country, which are some of the best in the world, and spend real money on an advertising campaign aimed at young women? There is an epidemic of smoking among young women, and they will later get cancer, so the message should be driven home. We have banned advertising—I fully support that—but advertising money is being shifted into product placement in films and on television. Do we not need an active campaign, sooner rather than later?

Ms Jowell: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall take action on advertising to make young women aware of the risks of smoking. I shall shortly be meeting editors of teenage magazines to raise that and other issues with them.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The hon. Lady will be aware that one in five women suffer from a mental illness, and that such illnesses cause one in four days off sick among women. I welcome the inclusion of mental health as a key area of the relaunched health strategy, and the proposal of a target similar to that in the previous health strategy. Does she agree, however, that the omission of any mention of mental health in the White Paper "The New NHS" is deplorable? Does she plan to review the Mental Health Act 1983, which would be a great help to young women and others?

Ms Jowell: I assure the right hon. Lady that we work as one Government and as one team of Health Ministers, and that mental health is indeed referred to in the White Paper. The White Paper and the Green Paper together represent the Government's strategy to improve health, to tackle inequality—that was a glaring gap in the last Government's action in relation to health—and to rebuild a modern and dependable national health service.

Partnership (NHS)

5. Ms McCafferty: What new statutory duties he intends to introduce in the NHS relating to partnership. [29317]

Mr. Dobson: The previous Government's policy set doctor competing against doctor and hospital competing against hospital. We believe that that was wasteful and bad for patients, and so do most of the 1 million people who work in the health service. It is better for patients when all parts of the health service work together instead of working against one another. That is why we intend to make partnership the statutory duty of every part of the national health service.

Ms McCafferty: In a modern and dependable health service, should not everyone work together and learn from each other? Is he aware that, in one hospital, nurses were warned against disclosing information relating to improvements in treatment, because it might jeopardise the hospital's competitive edge? Does that not sum up the gulf between the Government's new agenda for health and the tired old dogma of the Tories?

Mr. Dobson: I can confirm what my hon. Friend has said. When I had the privilege of presenting awards to nurses for nursing innovation, a number of the teams which won the awards told me that their local managements had instructed them not to disclose innovations because that might undermine the competitive edge of their hospital, as against the one down the road. When I informed the former president of the Royal College of Surgeons, he said that people performing cardiac surgery had been given the same message by some stupid managements.

Mr. Simon Hughes: What partnership deal will the Secretary of State offer the additional 54,700 people who joined the waiting lists in the last quarter, and the 1.25 million who are now on waiting lists for NHS treatment? Given that the Government started with a patients charter that still is not honoured—not everyone is receiving treatment within 18 months—and given that the early pledge to reduce waiting lists by 100,000 has turned into an early policy to increase them by 100,000, is not the only way forward to impose a statutory duty on the Secretary of State to reduce waiting lists? That might allow him to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get the money to bring down waiting lists—not just to reduce them by 100,000, which is almost nothing, but to make a radical reduction in the number of people out there who are waiting for treatment in the NHS.

Mr. Dobson: As I have made clear in the House many times since we took office, I told people working in the national health service that their first priority for this winter was to work together to use the extra money that we were finding to cope with the winter pressures. If that had consequences for waiting lists, I should take responsibility for giving the guidance. I do take that responsibility; equally, I am sure that we shall discharge our promise to reduce hospital waiting lists, before the next general election, to a level lower than those that we inherited.

When it comes to money, this year and next year we are spending far more than the Liberals said was needed at the last general election.

Ms Hewitt: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the excellent bid for health action zone status submitted by the city of Leicester? Will he take this opportunity to congratulate the partnership that has been established by Leicestershire health authority, Leicester city council, community groups and, more recently, private business—not only on the quality of their bid, but on the progress that they have already made towards improving primary health care in very disadvantaged communities?

Mr. Dobson: As my hon. Friend will know, we have received a good many bids for action zone status, and we shall be able to organise only about 10 or a dozen pilot schemes, so I cannot give any promises at the Dispatch Box. I believe that the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), is meeting Leicestershire Members later today to discuss various matters. I certainly congratulate people working in the health service in Leicester, both in the hospital sector and in the primary community and mental health services, on the massive contribution that they have been making and on the way in which they have been working together. That should be an example to everyone.

Mr. Nicholls: Does the Secretary of State not realise that the existing successful partnerships on which the White Paper sought to build—fundholding practices—are successful precisely because they are voluntary? Is that not why the British Medical Association poll of general practitioners showed that less than one third believed that the changes that are outlined in the White Paper would improve the delivery of primary care, while more than half said that they would not be willing to take part in a local primary care group? Unless the right hon. Gentleman believes that shotgun marriages are the way to wedded bliss, what possible sense is there in dragooning MPs into partnerships that they have not been prepared to form voluntarily?

Mr. Dobson: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is talking about GPs rather than MPs. Frankly, I am not sure that the lot opposite would qualify even as dragoons, but we have made our position clear. We have consulted the various professions and our proposals broadly command their support. Before we implement the changes, we are consulting further on the detail, but it is entirely indicative that the Tory Front-Bench team are harking back to yesteryear. The divisions that they deliberately introduced between fundholding GPs, other GPs and hospital doctors are the way of the past; we propose a way for the future.

Mr. Blizzard: Are not community health councils important partners in the NHS? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that they will continue to have a key role in the health service, as mapped out in the White Paper? Is not the great strength of CHCs their ability to relate to the communities that they serve; they do not have to serve vast geographical areas? Will he confirm that that will continue? Does he expect primary care commissioning groups to work closely with CHCs?

Mr. Dobson: I expect everybody to work closely with community health councils. On size, it varies from place to place. For example, Leeds, which will have the biggest health trust in the country when it is amalgamated, is covered by just one CHC. For some strange reason, the Leeds-wide community health council did not want the two trusts to merge so that it had a Leeds-wide trust. I am not quite sure whether I follow its logic, but we value CHCs' work. As some sign of that, I believe that my visit to their annual conference last year was the first for more than a decade by a Secretary of State for Health.

Public Accountability (NHS)

7. Mr. Hinchliffe: What steps he is taking to improve public accountability in the NHS. [29321]

Mr. Dobson: As part of our efforts to improve accountability in the NHS, I have required all health boards to meet in public, I have opened up the appointments process, I am placing a duty to co-operate on all parts of the NHS and I require every health authority to prepare a health-improvement programme for its area, in consultation with all interested local organisations.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will my right hon. Friend take steps to end the practice whereby local health authorities blatantly mislead the public during consultation on closures or changes in the use of health facilities? Will he consider as an example what has happened in Wakefield? A few years ago, Manygates maternity hospital, where I and my children were born, was closed and the health authority gave a clear commitment to build purpose-built maternity provision at Pinderfields general hospital. Not only has that promise never been fulfilled, but there is now a proposal to remove maternity facilities completely from Wakefield. As a Yorkshireman, does he agree that it is inconceivable that people will no longer have the chance to be born in the capital of the West Riding of Yorkshire—my constituency of Wakefield?

Mr. Dobson: I am not sure that I should refer to anything being inconceivable in relation to maternity services, even in Yorkshire. Certainly, one problem facing the national health service when it is trying to re-establish its reputation with local people is that there have been examples of clear promises being made—that if people went along with one closure there would be an opening to compensate, or something of that sort—which were not delivered.

We are determined to ensure, first, that the process of consultation is not merely a period of time but a genuine consultation and, secondly, that, if local promises are made, local promises are kept. The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), and I had to make very sure in some funding allocations that we had a hand in that certain promises were kept. If the funds had been allocated according to the propositions that came to us, the NHS would have been going back on promises, but we stopped that.

Mr. Maples: One measure of accountability is the publication of waiting lists. Why does the Secretary of State think those are rising?

Mr. Dobson: At the danger of sounding like the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), which I should hate to do—she has now left the Chamber having asked her question—in the last quarter for which figures were produced, the people working in the health service dealt with more emergency cases than ever before in the history of the NHS. They also dealt with more waiting list cases than in any previous third quarter of the financial year. The only trouble is that the number of people joining the list grew faster than the number being treated. We shall have to see to that, not by reducing the number joining it but by treating more.

Mr. Maples: Is not the true reason why waiting lists are rising that real increases in spending under this Government of 1.2 per cent this year and 1.5 per cent. for next are running at half the level of the past 18 years? Until the right hon. Gentleman can increase funding levels to what they were for the past 18 years, waiting lists will continue to rise. Far from redeeming his promise to reduce waiting lists by 100,000, he will watch them continue to rise at that rate for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Dobson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that, when the Thatcher Government came to power, about 750,000 people were on the waiting lists. The figure did not go over a million until that Government stupidly introduced the internal market, which contributed to lengthening waiting lists. The money we are spending this year includes £300 million more than the previous Conservative Government had budgeted for this year. That £300 million has been spent to ensure that emergency and urgent cases are properly dealt with. Next year, we intend to spend £1.9 billion, which is £1.2 billion more than the previous Government put in their Budget. If he is not satisfied with spending levels, he should talk to the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who was responsible for deciding those things.

Health and Social Services

8. Mr. Drew: What proposals he has to improve working arrangements between health and social services before the report of the royal commission. [29322]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): A range of measures have been put in place, including the introduction of health action zones, joint health authority and local authority investment plans and a requirement for better joint arrangements for multi-disciplinary assessments. Partnership and collaboration were also key themes in "The New NHS" White Paper and the "Our Healthier Nation" Green Paper.

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. The Secretary of State has talked on a number of occasions of the Berlin walls between social services departments and health bodies. We have a particular problem in Gloucestershire because of a rise in the amount of bed blocking. Will my hon. Friend consider having pilot projects in advance of the royal commission to find out whether we can get a better working arrangements between social services departments and health bodies and to scrutinise how the money is being expended?

Mr. Boateng: We are certainly sympathetic to pilot projects and will develop in several ways our initiative to improve working relationships between health authorities and local authorities. We started that work this winter and my hon. Friend's constituency—which has received £200,000 of extra money—is an example of how that work is being cemented. We know that health authorities and local authorities work better together. They want to work together better; we are giving them the means to do so.

Mr. Gill: Does the Minister accept that the problem of bed blocking was entirely predictable and, therefore, that the most recent round of local authority funding should have reflected the problem? Will he specifically examine the current problems in Shropshire?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman really is hoist by his own petard: Conservative Members are responsible for Shropshire's current budget. We are open to representations from any Shropshire Member—indeed, I will soon meet a Shropshire Member and a chief executive. We want—as we have done in our response to winter pressures—to underpin the relationship between local authorities and health authorities. That is a matter not only of resources but of cementing the will to work together and of providing—as we will do—the legal framework to enable them better to do so.

Mr. Dawson: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that, of 38 questions on today's Order Paper, this is the only one that even obliquely refers to the work of the social work profession? Does he agree that, despite the Health Committee's recent excellent scrutiny of the subject of children in care, the crucial work of social services requires more scrutiny? Will he consult other Ministers to determine whether there are other ways in which that work can be done?

Mr. Boateng: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but questions are a matter for the House and for hon. Members. I am heartened by the work of the all-party Committees, which have shown that hon. Members are very interested in social care and are determined—as Ministers are—not only to give it a higher profile but, importantly, to create the circumstances in which health care and social care work ever more closely together.

Medical Staff Recruitment

9. Mr. Chidgey: What plans he has to recruit more medical staff for the NHS. [29323]

Mr. Milburn: We are recruiting more medical staff. We have also introduced a range of initiatives to improve not only retention but recruitment. We are currently considering the medical work force standing advisory committee's recommendation to increase the annual intake to United Kingdom medical schools by 20 per cent.

Mr. Chidgey: Is the Minister aware that there is a shortage of 120 hospital doctors in the South and West health authority, which directly affects my constituents in Eastleigh? Is he aware that a recent parliamentary answer revealed a shortage of 1,600 hospital doctors, 8,000 nurses and 1,000 general practitioners across the NHS? Does he agree that that must have a direct impact on this winter's record cancellation of operations and on the fact that waiting lists for hospital places are climbing out of control? Is it not about time that the Government took the matter seriously and took some firm action to provide an NHS that is properly funded and properly resourced?

Mr. Milburn: That is precisely what we are doing: we are putting in extra money this year. Next year, we will put in an extra £50 million to aid education and training of future doctors. However, it is not only a question money. The best recruiting sergeant for attracting more doctors into the NHS will be to restore doctors' sense that, rather than being sidelined, they are at the heart of the NHS. Our White Paper proposals will do precisely that, not only in primary care—where family doctors and community nurses will be in the driving seat in shaping the future of local health services—but in local health services, where we will explicitly bring hospital consultants in from the cold so that they will have an opportunity to help shape the local health service as they have been unable to do under the internal market.

Sir Peter Emery: In view of the general shortage of dentists, particularly in the south-west—about which, as the Minister will know, I have been in consultation with his Department—will he consider setting a capital allowance for dentists who wish to start a new dental clinic in areas where it is acknowledged that a clinic is required and allow that capital to be repaid over a 10-year period from the fees earned? The difficulty with starting a new clinic is often the capital cost. An allowance would surely be a way of easing the problem and would be preferable to introducing mobile dental clinics—which we have in my constituency and which must be nonsense in this modern age.

Mr. Milburn: Perhaps I can reassure the right hon. Gentleman that, in part, that is precisely what investing in dentistry does; it makes available to dentists and health authorities that want to work in collaboration grants for improvements to premises and, in some cases, for construction. The deal we offer dentists is that they can come back into the NHS and get a grant for doing so, provided they give a three or five-year commitment to continue in NHS dentistry. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that, of the 200 applications we have received under investing in dentistry, 73 have come from the South and West health authority area, and they will be considered seriously.

Private Finance Initiative

10. Mr. Laxton: What progress has been made in the PFI hospital building programme since 1 May. [29324]

Mr. Dobson: Before the general election, the tired old Tory Government spent more than £30 million on legal and other fees for the private finance initiative programme but did not make a start on one hospital. Since May last year, I have authorised progress on 17 new hospitals. Building work has already started at Dartford and Gravesham; Carlisle; Norfolk and Norwich; and the two hospitals in South Buckinghamshire.

Mr. Laxton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the centrepiece of this Government's legislation is to start, through the private finance initiative, to build the hospitals that the previous Conservative Government only promised? Does he further agree that whereas, if I can use this phrase, the previous Government were all mouth and no trousers, he is mouth and trousers?

Mr. Dobson: I am not sure whether that is a compliment or an insult, but I shall assume that it is a compliment as it comes from our side of the House.

Besides the hospitals that I have just mentioned, where building work has already started, we expect work to start fairly soon in North Durham and Calderdale; within a foreseeable period at Hereford, Wellhouse, Greenwich, Worcester, South Manchester, South Tees, Bishop Auckland, Swindon and Marlborough and Bromley; and, following the outcome of the Turnberg review in London, at University College hospital in my constituency, at St. George's, the Royal London, King's and Oldchurch. That is not bad going considering we have not yet been in office for a year.

Sir Sydney Chapman: As the previous Government gave the go-ahead for the development of phase 1b at Barnet general hospital and the new Government have decided not to reopen the accident and emergency department at Edgware, and understanding that the new Government wanted time to review all the hospital building programmes, will the Secretary of State tell the House when construction work will start on phase 1b at Barnet general hospital?

Mr. Dobson: I cannot, but I will write to the hon. Gentleman with that information.

NHS Trusts

11. Mr. Rammell: What changes he intends to make to the current role of NHS trusts in shaping local health care. [29325]

Mr. Milburn: National health service trusts will be brought in from the cold and given back their place in the shaping of local health services. In place of competition, NHS trusts will work with the rest of the local health service to plan and deliver the best possible services.

Mr. Rammell: My hon. Friend will be aware that, under the old Tory NHS, trusts often slashed their costs on an unsustainable short-term basis to drive the so-called competition—other hospitals—out of business. Will he confirm that, under Labour's new NHS, that approach will not be acceptable and that co-operation rather than competition will be the way forward? Co-operation was one of the founding principles of the NHS, and that is what the Labour Government are bringing back to the NHS.

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We start from a simple premise: one cannot treat hospitals as if they were supermarkets. The old internal market that the Tories unleashed on the NHS set not only doctor against doctor but hospital against hospital. All that is being swept away; in its place there will be partnership and co-operation, which will truly benefit patients.

Mr. Flight: The new primary care commissioning groups will have a major role in shaping local health care in the future. The only area over which community health councils have no powers is general practice. Will the Minister consider imposing some obligation on primary care commissioning units to consult CHCs in the management of the provision of care?

Mr. Milburn: That is an extremely important question. We want the new primary care groups and trusts to be representative of, and properly to engage with, their local communities. That is why we determined that the boards of the groups and the trusts should include representatives from the public they serve—that will be a helpful step forward. The hon. Gentleman is right; no part of the national health service can be exempt from public scrutiny or from the need to drive up standards and quality.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Will my hon. Friend consider the actions of hospital trusts? The Government are doing excellent work in opening up the partnerships, but will he examine the management costs that trusts are still incurring on administration and premises, as there has been no decrease, particularly in areas such as Bradford?

Mr. Milburn: The Government have instituted two important policy developments. The first is to cut the money spent on bureaucracy and to ensure that front-line patient services receive the savings from cutting red tape. As my hon. Friend will realise, the White Paper proposes that we shall save £1 billion as a result of moving away from the discredited and expensive internal market and reintroducing to the NHS a partnership approach. Secondly, we shall consider favourably any trust mergers that are proposed, provided that they are in the interests of patients and that they release at least £500,000 from bureaucracy to front-line patient care. That is what patients deserve and staff want.

Aricept

12. Mr. Swayne: If he will make a statement regarding the regional availability of Aricept in the NHS. [29326]

Mr. Milburn: Information about the prescribing of Aricept in the national health service is available only for prescriptions dispensed in the community in England; in many health authorities, these will have been issued in hospitals. Available data show that prescriptions have been dispensed in 99 of the 100 health authorities in England. However, I understand that many health authorities are reluctant to commit resources to the drug because of the perceived lack of evidence about its clinical and cost-effectiveness.

Mr. Swayne: Will the Minister say what a patient should do when the general practitioner advises him—or, more likely, one of his relatives—that the condition would benefit from the prescription of Aricept but that, under the local regime, that is not possible? Should the patient move house?

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman raises an extremely important issue, with which I think the whole House will sympathise. Alzheimer's disease is among the most distressing of medical conditions, not only for the sufferers, but perhaps particularly for the carers and close family. However, there is no instant, miracle cure and there is certainly no wonder drug either on the market or about to come on the market. Published data show that Aricept has a limited beneficial effect on the symptoms of the disease. It is important that hon. Members, from whatever party, do not raise unrealistic expectations about the ability of this or any other drug to deal with this severe, debilitating and ultimately fatal condition.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) raises a wider question—the availability of treatments apparently by postcode rather than by cost-effectiveness. The Liberal Democrats and the Minister disagree about funding, but will he at least accept that the people who make decisions on funding should take some democratic responsibility? Decisions to ration treatment because of cost are taken locally, but there is no local mechanism to vote people out if they are not prescribing certain drugs or treatments.

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman is right—there is a disagreement between my party and his on the funding of the national health service: his party wanted to put in less money. On rationing by postcode, it is important that we put the issue into perspective. For most patients in most places for most of the time, most services and treatments are available on the national health service. We should say that loudly and clearly, and we should celebrate it, because it is a success story for the NHS. However, we want to build on that and, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, our proposals in the White Paper for a national institute of clinical excellence and for national service frameworks are intent upon bearing down on unacceptable and unjustifiable variations in performance and availability of service. We want a genuinely national health service to be available to people.

Patient Care

13. Ms Jenny Jones: What steps he plans to take to improve the monitoring of outcomes and the quality of patient care after the abolition of the NHS internal market. [29327]

Mr. Milburn: "The New NHS" White Paper set out our new approach to assessing and monitoring performance, focusing on the quality, effectiveness and outcomes of care. It incorporates a range of indicators that encompass health outcomes of NHS care and effective health care delivery. We are currently consulting on the detail of this approach.

Ms Jones: Can my hon. Friend assure the House that, in the initiatives that he has announced, quality of care will now take precedence and we will get away from the old days when number crunching and making the tables look right was more important than quality? Can he also assure the House that quality of care will also take precedence in the NHS complaints procedure?

Mr. Milburn: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the latter assurance. Under this Government, standards are as important in health as they are in education. There have recently been recurring problems with standards and quality in the NHS, particularly the difficulties with hip joints and the dreadful problems affecting screening services in Kent and Canterbury Hospitals NHS trust. If we are genuine about wanting a one-class, first-class service, we should no longer be willing to tolerate what is, frankly, second best.

Mr. Boswell: While the Minister is considering outcomes, will he acknowledge that unless people can get off the waiting lists and into treatment there is no question of outcomes? Given the sensitivity of the issue, will he give the House an assurance that there is no question whatever of manipulating the figures by allowing patients off the waiting list either because they have died or because it is unrealistic for them to be treated? In particular, will he consider introducing a robust measurement of overall unmet patient need in order to satisfy us that the NHS is genuinely tackling the problems?

Mr. Milburn: I have to say to the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of respect on this and other issues, that if patients have died I do not see why they should remain on NHS waiting lists. As for manipulating the figures, I remind him that it was his party, not mine, that was most adept at manipulating figures—certainly the unemployment figures.

Mr. Flynn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the crisis affecting hip replacements was entirely predictable and inevitable and resulted from the market free-for-all that was extremely profitable for the 60 companies that produced new hip prostheses when two very reliable ones—the Stanmore and the Charnley—were already on the market? Will one of the Government's major reforms be to change the health service so that the emphasis is not on making money or on the quantity of the service, but on the quality of the service?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that in future the emphasis will be on quality, quality and quality. It is quality that counts, quality that patients experience, and when quality goes wrong it is the patients who suffer.

Primary Care

16. Mr. Stinchcombe: What action he is taking to promote the development of primary care. [29330]

Mr. Dobson: The White Paper "The New NHS" sets out our approach to modernising the national health service and providing integrated primary and community health care services. It will be done through the establishment of primary care groups and ultimately primary care trusts. The establishment of the primary care groups will build on other policies that we have already implemented, such as the National Health Service (Primary Care) Act 1997, personal medical services pilots, the salaried doctors scheme and other local pilots. We shall introduce schemes only when they have been tried and tested.

Mr. Stinchcombe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his policies are warmly welcomed by the doctors and nurses in my constituency, but that they also seek reassurances? In particular, they want a package of incentives to reward them adequately for the extra work that they will be asked to undertake.

Mr. Dobson: There will be such incentives. Knowing the professionalism of the doctors, nurses and other staff involved, the greatest incentive will be that the policies will lead to a better health service, for which they have all been hoping and working for years.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The Secretary of State will have heard the concerns that have been expressed about social care. Is he happy with the links between health professionals and social care workers in dealing with the scourge of child abuse? Are there enough social workers to deal with the problem?

Mr. Dobson: The Utting committee reported to me before Christmas with proposals to deal with the abuse of children living away from home. The record is disgraceful. We intend to change the arrangements to ensure that the situation improves. It is staggering that, although the number of young people in care—as it is fondly called—represents only a small proportion of the population, 22 per cent. of the prison population was previously in care. That does not say a lot for the care.

Mr. Lansley: When the Secretary of State comes to designate primary care commissioning pilots, will he ensure variety—not just geographical variety, but a variety of approaches to primary care commissioning? Will he also ensure that larger fundholding practices that feel capable of being primary care commissioning groups are offered opportunities to bid for pilot schemes? When will the Secretary of State seek a debate in the House on the NHS White Paper?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point. The idea of the pilot schemes is to test different approaches. There is no point in having 30 identical pilot schemes. We want a variety of approaches, some of which include the enthusiastic involvement of fundholding doctors. We shall see what works and what does not. I shall say now so that no one can accuse me of not saying it in advance that some of the pilot schemes will almost certainly prove not to be successful. That is why we are having pilot schemes—to find out what works and what does not.

Community Hospitals

17. Mr. Prior: What proposals he has for community hospitals. [29331]

Mr. Boateng: As we said in our White Paper, we see an important role for community hospitals providing intermediate care close to where people live. The new arrangements that we are introducing will make it easier for hospital and primary care to work together to achieve that aim.

Mr. Prior: Is the Minister aware that hundreds of thousands of people, particularly in rural areas, regard their local community hospital as the most important part of the national health service? Will he give as much support and encouragement as he can to local health authorities that are doing their best to maintain as many such hospitals as possible?

Mr. Boateng: We recognise the vital role that many community hospitals play as a local resource. We want the best balance between them, acute hospitals and other community facilities to ensure the delivery of emergency, elective and rehabilitative care. Those three objectives, and a range of ways of delivering them, are at the heart of the new NHS.

Mr. Edwards: Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the announcement that building of the new community hospital for Chepstow will finally begin later this year? It will be the first hospital built in Wales under the private finance initiative.

Mr. Boateng: I am delighted to do so. That is another gain for new Labour.

Mr. Fabricant: Will not the quality of care depend on the number of people who can be employed in hospitals? Given that only a limited amount of money is available—albeit the Government claim that there will be an extra £1 billion—what representations has the Minister made to the Low Pay Commission on the minimum amount of money an hour that staff in hospitals should be paid?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman is notoriously Whiggish on this and other points. Let us be very clear. We put our faith in NHS staff. NHS staff will be paid a proper wage. NHS staff deserve the very best. This new Labour Government will give it to them.

Iraq

18. Mr. Dalyell: What recent representations he has made to the World Health Organisation in relation to Iraq. [29332]

Mr. Dobson: We have made no representations recently to the World Health Organisation about Iraq. We welcome and support the humanitarian work that the World Health Organisation is carrying out in Iraq. It is worth noting that, since 1991, the United Kingdom has contributed more than £94 million in humanitarian and medical aid through bilateral and multilateral sources to Iraq, especially northern Iraq, where Saddam Hussein deployed chemical weapons against his own people.

Mr. Dalyell: Is not now the time to help the children of Iraq, particularly in relation to waterborne diseases?

Mr. Dobson: The British Government have taken the lead in trying to double the amount of oil that the Iraqis can sell to raise money to provide medicine and medical treatment for their people. It is worth remembering that, although the first United Nations resolution went through in 1995, it was December 1996 before the present Government of Iraq were even willing to go ahead with that resolution, which was intended to make food, medical equipment and pharmaceuticals available to the people of Iraq. If anyone is to blame for those materials and that food not getting through, it is the Government of Iraq, not the Government of Britain or the World Health Organisation.

Iraq

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Madam Speaker, I will make a statement on the recent crisis over weapons inspections in Iraq, and the agreement signed by the United Nations Secretary-General and the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq in Baghdad yesterday. Since the text of the agreement is now in the public domain, I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

It is worth recalling again the origins of the crisis. One of the main conditions of the Gulf war ceasefire in 1991 was that Iraq's weapons of mass destruction should be destroyed or rendered harmless by inspectors working for the United Nations. That was embodied in Security Council resolution 687. Since then, the UN weapons inspectors have done a tremendous job in finding and destroying those weapons. The full details have been given to the House before, but they include horrific amounts of chemical and biological weapons. The inspectors achieved that despite systematic obstruction, deceit and concealment by Saddam Hussein, which caused repeated confrontation between the UN Security Council and Iraq.

There was a crisis in November about the composition of UNSCOM teams, which was resolved by Saddam Hussein agreeing to allow the inspectors back in, following a diplomatic agreement brokered by the Russians. Crucially, however, that was not written down or followed by a fresh Security Council resolution. He almost immediately went back on the agreement, plunging us into the most recent crisis about access to presidential compounds, some of them large and containing hundreds of buildings, and presidential palaces. This has not been an artificial argument about some theoretical threat, but a reflection of real alarm on the part of UN inspectors about the use of those sites to conceal both evidence and actual weapons. The Security Council cannot accept that any areas remain off limits.

Saddam began by saying that there could be no access to the sites. Then, under intense pressure, not least from the start of the build-up of forces in the Gulf, he eventually agreed that they could be visited once. That was clearly unacceptable, but he refused to move further. Meanwhile, we and the Americans, together with our other allies, continued to make it clear that, if he did not back down, we saw no alternative in the end to the use of force. We made preparations to ensure that we were ready to use force, if absolutely necessary.

Under that renewed pressure, Saddam Hussein began to show readiness to move further. On the basis of a text drafted by Britain, the five permanent members of the Security Council agreed last week that the UN Secretary-General should go to Baghdad to make it clear to Saddam Hussein that he had to comply fully and unconditionally with the relevant Security Council resolutions, and to negotiate a written agreement on those lines. It was clear to all that if Saddam was not prepared to agree, force might have to be used, albeit with the greatest reluctance.

I am delighted that Kofi Annan, for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, has succeeded in his mission and has brought back a signed agreement, the details of which have now become public. He will report to the Security Council this afternoon on his discussions with the Iraqi Government.

The key provisions of the agreement are as follows: Iraq reconfirms its acceptance of the relevant Security Council resolutions, including 687, and its readiness to co-operate fully with UNSCOM and the International Atomic Energy Agency; Iraq undertakes to accord immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to UNSCOM and the IAEA; a special group will be established to inspect eight clearly defined presidential sites. It will be composed of UNSCOM and IAEA experts, together with diplomats appointed by the Secretary-General, and headed by a commissioner, also appointed by the Secretary-General. The group will operate under the established procedures of UNSCOM and the IAEA, but with some extra specific procedures related to the nature of the sites.

We await clarification of the details of the special group, but three things are essential. First, the commissioner in charge of the group must be properly qualified for the task. Secondly, the details of the inspection regime must preserve in full the professional and technical nature of the inspections and the inspectors. Thirdly, there can be no question of negotiating with Saddam Hussein over the integrity of the weapons inspection process. I am confident from our contacts with the Secretary-General that he understands those points.

I welcome the agreement, and pay tribute to Secretary-General Kofi Annan's achievement in securing it. It has been an important demonstration of the value of the United Nations and its absolutely vital role in the world. We should never forget that, if we do not stop Saddam Hussein acting in breach of his agreement on weapons of mass destruction, the losers will be not just those threatened by him, but the authority and standing of the UN itself.

The agreement refers to the desire of the Iraqi Government for the lifting of sanctions. No timetable is set for this. The sanctions have always been there for a reason: to ensure full compliance of Iraq with the relevant Security Council resolutions. Once that is achieved, the issue of lifting sanctions can be properly addressed.

Let me also deal with one false assertion often made by the Iraqi regime. It has never been our intention to undermine Iraq's territorial integrity, or its security, or the dignity of the Iraqi people. The issue has always been to ensure that there are no weapons of mass destruction left in Saddam Hussein's arsenal. The agreement repeats that and makes it clear.

However, while the agreement signed in Baghdad is welcome, it is not in itself enough. A piece of paper signed by the Iraqi regime plainly cannot be enough. The Saddam Hussein we face today is the same Saddam Hussein we faced yesterday. He has not changed. He remains an evil, brutal dictator. The only thing that has changed is that he has changed his mind in the face of effective diplomacy and firm willingness to use force. Nothing else would or could have brought about this success. Nothing else will ensure that it is followed up by satisfactory implementation on the ground and the total elimination of his capacity to obtain or produce weapons of mass destruction.

We will not tolerate any repetition of the Iraqi behaviour that has led to this agreement. We are not going to play more elaborate diplomatic games that allow Saddam Hussein to thwart the inspections regime that has now been agreed.

That is why there are now two essential requirements in the coming days. First, we need to embody the agreement in a new Security Council resolution. This must make it clear that any further prevarication or obstruction by Saddam Hussein of the smooth operation of the inspections, in accordance with previous Security Council resolutions and the latest agreement, will not be accepted by any member of the Security Council and will inescapably be followed by the most severe consequences for the Iraqi regime.

Secondly, the implementation of the agreement must be tested soon. That will require inspections by UNSCOM without any Iraqi obstruction, whenever and wherever it wishes to inspect. There will be no immediate change in the readiness of British or US armed forces in the Gulf until that is clear.

Throughout the dispute, our aim has been a peaceful, diplomatic settlement. There was no desire on either side of the Atlantic to use force, but it was also clear to us throughout that Saddam Hussein only understands and respects force. Those who have criticised us and the Americans for our willingness to use force in the last resort have to explain how such an attitude could have recovered Kuwait in 1990, or could ensure Saddam's compliance now. I do not believe that they can convincingly do so. As Kofi Annan said in Baghdad:

"You can achieve much by diplomacy, but you can achieve a lot more when diplomacy is backed by firmness and force".

I would put it this way: with Saddam, diplomacy plus force equals success.

Our task now is to do everything we can to ensure that the agreement reached by Kofi Annan is smoothly, effectively and rapidly implemented. We played a key diplomatic role in the negotiations leading up to his mission and we will continue to play the same role in the follow-up. I have already discussed this with Presidents Clinton, Yeltsin and Chirac in the past 24 hours, and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is in close touch with his counterparts. We are all agreed on the need for a rapid and clear Security Council resolution to ensure that we cannot find ourselves in the same position again in the future. That will be the main focus of our immediate efforts.

I have made it clear that when Saddam Hussein has complied fully with the Security Council resolutions, the UN inspectors have completed the disarmament stage of their work and the threat from his weapons of mass destruction has gone, we can consider the lifting of sanctions. Indeed, if Saddam had not blocked the implementation of UNSCOM's work so systematically, that could have happened long ago. The long-suffering Iraqi people deserve our sympathy and our help—our quarrel was never, and is not, with them.

We led the way in New York last week in the adoption of a new Security Council resolution that more than doubles Iraq's ability to sell oil for food—even though, I may say, food and medicine have never been subject to sanctions of any kind. I hope that, this time, Saddam will allow the scheme to be utilised properly for the benefit of all his people. Meanwhile, we will maintain and, if possible, increase the direct bilateral help we give to the Iraqi people, through appropriate non-governmental organisations.

Saddam Hussein has spent seven years playing for time, but has been thwarted by the resolve of the international community. It is now clearer than ever that his games have to stop once and for all. If they do not, the consequences should be clear to all. Throughout, our objectives have been plain: to do everything in our power to destroy Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction; to hold out the prospect of relief for the Iraqi people; and to uphold the will of the United Nations. That is what we have done, and it is what we will continue to do.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): We are grateful to the Prime Minister for his statement, and I thank him for keeping me informed about these matters in recent weeks.

We on the Conservative Benches have always made clear our undivided support for the position of the Government and of the United States, and we do so again today. We agree that diplomacy backed by firmness is the right way to deal with Saddam Hussein. I join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to Kofi Annan for the skill with which he has carried out his mission. Clearly, the threat of the use of force was key to getting the agreement of Saddam Hussein to comply with the resolution of the Security Council. On behalf of the Opposition, I also pay tribute to our armed forces, who have, yet again, responded with great professionalism and, once again, been ready to risk their lives.

On the details of the agreement, may I ask the Prime Minister what is meant by the UNSCOM undertaking

"to respect the legitimate concerns of Iraq relating to national security, sovereignty and dignity"?

How much risk is there that those words could be used by Saddam Hussein as a pretext for further delay and obstruction? Can the Prime Minister confirm that the new procedures for inspection will not be subject to any veto by Saddam Hussein? Can he also say a little more about the consequences of any failure on the part of Saddam Hussein to comply with the terms of the new agreement?

Can the Prime Minister confirm that the reference in paragraph 1 of the memorandum of understanding to includes resolution 678, which authorises the use of force? How confident is he that a further resolution will be secured authorising the use of force if the agreement is not kept? The Prime Minister referred in his statement to the "most severe consequences". May we presume that that means the use of force?

"all relevant resolutions of the Security Council"

On a wider point, does the Prime Minister agree that there is now a great opportunity for the United Kingdom to show fresh leadership and initiative in the middle east, both by ensuring that there is a stronger coalition against Saddam Hussein in the event of any repetition of the crisis and by taking forward the stalled peace process between Israel and the Palestinians?

Finally, this crisis in the middle east, which required a military response—and continues to require a military presence—occurred after the decision that the United Kingdom and the United States would stay on in Bosnia and during a difficult time in Northern Ireland.

[Mr. William Hague]

Therefore, does the Prime Minister agree that the strategic defence review, which is now approaching completion, could not reasonably conclude that there is scope for reducing the defence budget?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his support and that of his colleagues throughout the recent period. I join him in thanking our armed forces for maintaining a state of alert and readiness in the middle east.

In respect of Iraq and the reference to its dignity and security, it was precisely for that reason that I emphasised yet again that there is no quarrel with the Iraqi people or with the territorial integrity of Iraq. The quarrel is with Saddam Hussein's regime and its failure to abide by the Security Council resolutions.

Saddam Hussein certainly has no veto over the inspections. The consequences are, and will be, clear. That is precisely why we seek an additional Security Council resolution. We do not want to return to long-drawn-out negotiations that Saddam Hussein could use to thwart the intentions of the international community. The use of force is there—and there is force to be used should Saddam Hussein not comply with the agreement that he has entered into.

I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman's comment that the United Kingdom can play a very significant role. We provided the right leadership in the crisis in respect of the Iraqi weapons inspection regime. I agree also that Britain must try to move on and play what part we can—both in itself and as President of the European Union—in the middle east peace process. Many Arab nations have been concerned and frustrated about the lack of progress in that area. They look to us for leadership, and we certainly intend to provide it. Indeed, the European Union issued a statement yesterday on that point which was put together by the Foreign Secretary.

Finally, in relation to the strategic defence review, I hesitate to enter into a discussion about the position of defence expenditure. However—I shall try to put it gently—I can promise absolutely that we shall not repeat the mistakes of the previous Conservative Government and cut the defence force budget by 30 per cent. I think that that was the cut in the past few years.

I agree entirely that the main areas to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—Northern Ireland, Bosnia and our ability to play a constructive role in the Gulf—are important. Britain must continue to carry out its role in those areas. I have always thought and said that this country's defence forces are vital to our foreign policy and Britain's standing in the world. That is precisely why the strategic defence review will ensure that our armed forces have a secure and certain future.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The world owes a literally incalculable debt to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for finding a way back from war at the last perilous moment. That will greatly strengthen his position and that of the United Nations in the future. For that, we shall learn to be very grateful.

Whatever reservations one might have about the way in which the international community has handled this matter in the past four years, the Government's handling of it in the past few months has been clear-sighted, determined and consistent. That has done great credit to the country and to the standing of the Prime Minister, and I congratulate him.

I have three points to make briefly to the Prime Minister. The first is on sanctions. Of course it is right that military pressure must be maintained, and that we must measure delivery against results, not words. Surely that means that the lifting of sanctions cannot, as some in the United States believe, be attached to the person of Saddam Hussein, but is attached to his behaviour. If, in the long term, UNSCOM gives a clean bill of health to Iraq, there is no reason why sanctions should not be lifted completely.

Secondly, how will the Prime Minister use the strengthened relationship that he has with President Clinton's Administration to encourage the United States to put more pressure on the Government of Mr. Netanyahu also to observe UN resolutions, for long-term peace in the middle east is based on that?

Lastly, the Atlantic relationship, which has been the key relationship underpinning effective diplomacy, based on the ability ultimately to use force if necessary, will nevertheless have caused concerns among our European partners, as I expect the Prime Minister knows. What will he do to reassure our European partners that this Government, unlike their predecessors, see the Atlantic relationship as complementary to our central relationship with Europe, rather than a substitute for it?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his words and for the support that he and his party have given us throughout the past few weeks. I shall deal with each of his points in turn.

First, it is important that we realise that the sanctions are attached to compliance with the UN Security Council resolutions. We have made that clear throughout.

Secondly, in respect of pressure on the present Government in Israel, yes, I agree, as I said earlier, that it is important for us to play our part in ensuring that there is progress in the middle east. We must do so in a way that does not cut across the United States, but is complementary to the efforts that the United States is making. I met all the Arab ambassadors yesterday and discussed with them what help we can give to try to push forward the middle east peace process.

Thirdly, I know that the right hon. Gentleman was not criticising the Atlantic relationship. I am proud of the fact that Britain has a good and strong relationship with the United States of America. Thank heavens, the Americans are there and are willing to stand up and be counted when difficult situations arise in the world.

I believe that it is important that the American Administration and the American people are not isolationist, but are willing to face up to and take on responsibilities. I further believe that the strength of our relationship with the United States is no impediment to Europe acting in a more concerted way or to Britain's relations with Europe. "Strong with the United States, strong in Europe"—that should be Britain's motto. It is good for Britain, good for Europe and good for the United States of America.

Contrary to some of the reports that I read in the papers, we kept closely in contact with our European Union partners throughout recent weeks. I spoke with virtually all the Heads of State in the European Union over the past few days. It is extremely important to recognise—[Interruption.]—if the Eurosceptics on the Conservative Benches will forgive me—that Europe gave us very good support. The standing of the entire international community, not just of those countries willing to send forces to the Gulf, has been reinvigorated by the past few weeks.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if the appeasers in the House and in the soft-centre press had had their way, and if the threat of force and the maintenance of sanctions had not been there, Kofi Annan's agreement would not have been possible? Will he confirm that, until not only resolution 687 but all relevant United Nations resolutions are complied with, sanctions will remain? Will he confirm also that this is it—that if this agreement is broken by Saddam Hussein, force will inevitably follow?

The Prime Minister: That is certainly right on the first point. As for the latter point, that is exactly the purpose of securing the new Security Council resolution. It is important that all the resolutions of the United Nations are properly complied with.

On my right hon. Friend's first point, it cannot seriously be denied that, unless we had been prepared to back up by force the diplomatic efforts that were made, we would never have secured the agreement that Kofi Annan obtained in Baghdad. Britain was not simply involved in building up forces in the Gulf, although we did play our part in that, and I am glad we did. It was the right thing to do. We have been intensely involved in the diplomatic effort as well.

It was Britain which put together the Security Council guidance for Kofi Annan's mission to Baghdad. It was Britain which put together the resolution on doubling the oil for food resolution. It is Britain which is now taking the lead in putting the new Security Council resolution together. Not merely generally, but particularly in our case, force and diplomacy have gone together.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): In welcoming the obvious improvement in the situation over the past week, and recognising the vital importance of ensuring that the agreement is adhered to, may I ask whether the Prime Minister accepts that there will be wide support for ensuring that resolution 687 is complied with? Does he further agree that, against that background, the inspection teams must carry on their work and complete it, as the resolution requires, thus enabling sanctions to be lifted and a normal situation restored?

Has the Prime Minister seen the worrying stories that the work of the inspection teams may be being undermined by the locations of the places that they intend to visit being disclosed by members of the inspection teams to the Iraqi Administration, thus enabling that Administration to carry on their deceit? Will the Prime Minister agree that it must be in the interests of everybody, including the people of Iraq, that the inspection work is successfully carried out, and that any such attempts to break the security of the inspection teams are prevented?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his support over the past few days. He is absolutely right to say that the inspection teams must carry on and complete their work. I do not know of any instances, though I have read the reports, of the work of the inspection teams being given to the Iraqi regime. Of course, I would deplore any such breach of the security of the inspection teams. It is vital, as a result of the history of the weapons inspections, that we ensure that the security of the inspection teams is watertight. It is only by gaining access to sites as quickly as possible that we can prevent concealment.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Prime Minister aware that the main immediate beneficiaries of what has happened are many tens of thousands of innocent civilians in Iraq, who might have been killed by British and American forces? They have been spared a death which could not in any way have been attributed to their behaviour.

The main contribution has been made by Kofi Annan, the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Not only has he worked for peace, but he has to some extent rescued the United Nations from the attempt by the United States to dominate it; there never was and never will be a majority of the Security Council in favour of the use of force. Does my right hon. Friend accept that many people, including me, were very disappointed that a Labour Government would have been prepared to go in and use force against the majority view of the Security Council and of world opinion?

The Prime Minister: Of course, my right hon. Friend is entirely entitled to his point of view. He enjoys a freedom here that, of course, he would not enjoy in Iraq. I honestly believe that Kofi Annan would not accept the version of events that my right hon. Friend has given. If my right hon. Friend were to talk to him, as I have done, he would find that Kofi Annan accepted that it was essential that there was firm resolve and a willingness to use force in order to get his diplomatic efforts to succeed.

I can tell my right hon. Friend that one of the hardest things to do, because of the nature of the Iraqi regime, was to persuade Saddam Hussein that we were serious about using force. It is my view, for what it is worth, that it was only when Saddam Hussein became aware that we were serious about using force that he began to make any form of concessions.

Should Saddam Hussein breach the agreement that he has now reached, I think that international opinion would be firmly with us in saying that we have to make sure that he adheres to the agreements that he has made.

The possibility of innocent people suffering in Iraq weighed very heavily on us, but responsibility for that lies with the regime itself. It is not merely preventing proper humanitarian aid from getting to its people; it actually moves people to sites which it thinks may be hit, to try to deter attacks from abroad—to use them, in other words, as human shields. I think that it would be better to direct that fire at the Iraqi regime.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): Exactly what procedures will be followed to determine whether Saddam Hussein is breaking the agreement, particularly when the inspection teams are accompanied by diplomats from a number of countries? Will it be the responsibility of the commissioner, when appointed, to report back formally to the United Nations that the agreement has been broken? If it is envisaged that the use of force will follow quickly upon a breach—it may be necessary to do so—it is extremely important that there should not then be international debate about whether the agreement has been broken.

The Prime Minister: I agree. That is a perfectly fair point to make. It is important to realise that the commissioner will report back, through the Secretary-General, to the Security Council. In respect of the sites other than the eight presidential sites, the regime is precisely the same. The regime that already exists has been reaffirmed in its entirety. In respect of the eight presidential sites, the changes have been laid down by the Secretary-General himself, and Saddam Hussein is not negotiating on the terms of those inspections.

We have not found in the past a problem deciding whether the agreements that Saddam Hussein has made on weapons inspections have been broken. There was never a disagreement that he was in breach of the weapons inspection regimes. The disagreement has been whether the response should be one of force. However, I believe that, in the procedures that are laid down, we shall be able to see clearly whether a breach has occurred; if it has, the consequences that I mentioned will follow.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Given that the critics were as wrong in the past few weeks as they were seven years ago about the liberation of Kuwait, would not an apology be appropriate from those people, be they in the House or outside, who accused Britain and America of warmongering? As my right hon. Friend said, the only reason we had success in the diplomatic field—we are very pleased about that—was the threat of force.

I note what my right hon. Friend said about medical supplies and the responsibility belonging to Saddam Hussein—sanctions must continue for the reasons that the Prime Minister stated—but is there any way in which urgent medical supplies could go to hospitals in Iraq so long as UN officials and international agencies are convinced that they will be used for children and innocent civilians, and not for the criminal elite who have used medical supplies for themselves?

The Prime Minister: We are looking at how we can ensure that the urgent medical supplies get through better to the Iraqi people and to Iraqi hospitals. Under the oil for food and medicine regime, far more food and humanitarian aid could have gone through to the Iraqi people. We are looking at ways to bypass the Iraqi regime and ensure that more is done in that regard.

Of course I agree with my hon. Friend's first point. It is also important to realise—I have certainly felt it very deeply indeed throughout this matter—that no one but a fool or a villain would want to send our forces into battle. The reason we have been prepared to contemplate it, and are prepared to contemplate it if the agreed regime is breached, is precisely because we believe that, if we do not do so, the threat to world security, peace and stability will be all the greater. The alternative is to do nothing, which is probably the riskiest option of all.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Obviously, the Prime Minister deserves congratulations on the way in which the nation has been able to stand by and ensure that a solution came about. Would he mind pointing out to those who make a great play about the damage that bombing might have done to the civilian population of Iraq that that damage and death would be nothing compared with the destruction that could be brought about by Saddam Hussein if he used those weapons for his purpose on the surrounding nations? That would be much greater than any other damage.

Secondly, will the Prime Minister follow what my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) suggested and assure the House that, if there is a breach, the Secretary-General will not have to go back to Baghdad to negotiate before we can act? We must not get into such a position, because Saddam delays whenever he can.

The Prime Minister: That is right, and that is precisely why we need a new Security Council resolution. We also need to test the agreement, which is why any optimism that I have is tinged with caution. We will not be through this crisis until we get the Security Council resolution that we need and test the agreement that Saddam Hussein has entered into. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that leaving Saddam with weapons of mass destruction is not a peaceful option; it is extremely dangerous, which is why we took the action we did.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Were the past four British ambassadors to Iraq, who wrote to The Independent on 16 February along with Sir Donald Maitland and the arms negotiator, David Summerhayes, wrong to say:

"If, after two months, the inspection has proceeded without interference, a further easing of sanctions will be authorised"?

Are the Government talking to the Government of Iran, whose country lost 1 million dead in the war with Iraq—casualties of first world war proportions—but do not want military action? The Prime Minister met Arab ambassadors yesterday. Did any one of them recommend military action?

The Prime Minister: No, the letter is not right to specify a time limit for easing sanctions, although it is true to say that sanctions are tied to compliance with UN resolutions. For the purposes of the Iraqi people and to restore normality, we want sanctions to be lifted, but that cannot happen until the resolutions are complied with, which is why the sanctions were imposed in the first place.

We have had contact with the Iranian Government; it was sensible for us to do that. My hon. Friend referred to Arab opinion and my meeting with the ambassadors yesterday. It would be a serious mistake to think that Arab opinion is on the side of Saddam Hussein. It is not. There may have been disagreements over the use of force, but Arab countries are deeply worried, with good reason, about any capability that Saddam Hussein may have to develop weapons of mass destruction.

The ambassadors put questions to me. Although most Arab nations have publicly opposed the use of force, they have also insisted on compliance with UN resolutions. Privately, they are a lot more concerned about Saddam Hussein and a lot more grateful for people standing up to him and the threat that he poses. There is concern—I understand it—because the Arab nations want progress on their other great issue, the middle east peace process. That point was made strongly.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): What lessons has the Prime Minister learnt from the Iraq crisis about the prospect of a genuine European foreign policy being created?

The Prime Minister: As I said earlier, most European countries agreed entirely with us; indeed, many that I spoke to made it clear that if diplomacy failed they would support the use of force. It is in our interest—this may be a point of difference between the two political parties—to have a coherent European foreign policy as well as a strong relationship with the United States.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): When the Prime Minister met the Arab ambassadors yesterday, did he raise the issue of systematic human rights violations in most of the countries neighbouring Iraq? Has he raised with Turkey its constant violation of human rights in eastern Turkey, and the persistent invasions of Iraq by Turkish armed forces over the past two years?

The Prime Minister: We have constantly raised our concerns about the violation of human rights with Turkey and other Arab states over this past period of time, but, obviously, the ambassadors and I discussed principally the middle east peace process and the immediate threat posed by the Iraqi regime.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Along with my Northern Ireland colleagues, I welcome the Prime Minister's statement, congratulate him on the stand that he has taken in supporting the Americans throughout this difficult period and welcome his clear expression of good will on the part of the United Kingdom towards the people of Iraq.

Now that that major problem has diminished somewhat, may I ask the Prime Minister to direct his attention towards Northern Ireland, and to the need to ensure that never again can weapons get into our prisons and prisoners be murdered; nor can we experience the huge bombings—

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot allow that question; it does not relate to the statement. Of course, I will give the Prime Minister an opportunity to respond if he wishes, but he should not do so, because the question does not relate to the statement. Questions must always relate to the statement.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): The resolute approach has clearly worked. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), and the whole Foreign Office team are to be congratulated on what they have done.

I recognise that the idea of a Basra enclave has now been suspended, temporarily in my view. What can we do—what can the British Government do—to strengthen the position, internationally, of the Iraqi National Congress, and to promote it as the legitimate representative of the Iraqi people? Only through the INC will we secure an ultimate solution.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. It is certainly through the Iraqi people that salvation for them from Saddam Hussein will come, and, obviously, we constantly look at ways in which we can strengthen the Iraqi opposition. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, is and has been in constant touch with the opposition.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): The Prime Minister said that diplomacy plus force equals success; but we are not there yet. That success depends on Saddam Hussein, and on his keeping his word—and he has not done that too often. One of the ways in which he has frustrated UNSCOM is by refusing to allow Iraqi Government controllers to escort the UNSCOM force. If he continues to refuse to do that, does that mean that bombings will follow?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, members of the inspection team must themselves judge the degree to which Saddam Hussein is frustrating any particular part of the inspections process. I do not think it would be right for me to decide that for them. The whole purpose is that they decide whether the integrity of the weapons inspection process is upheld.

However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we are not there yet. It is important to stress that. Saddam Hussein must be made to keep his word, which is precisely why we are saying both that we need the Security Council resolution and that then we must test it. That is why I say that—although we are obviously delighted at what Kofi Annan has achieved, and are optimistic about it—the caution is there, precisely because of the point that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): When the Prime Minister sends messages of congratulation across the Atlantic, will he praise in particular the fact that President Clinton has resisted the hawkish Republicans in the Congress—and some in his own Administration—and gone for the negotiation outcome? Does the Prime Minister agree that the success of the efforts of Kofi Annan and our own Government will assist the credibility of the United Nations, and, we hope, lead to the United States Congress restoring the money that it still owes to the successful building up of the UN's future?

The Prime Minister: What Kofi Annan has achieved greatly boosts the authority and standing of the UN. I agree with my hon. Friend that it has been important throughout to ensure that we act reasonably. It would have been reasonable to use force if negotiation had not been successful. It is equally reasonable, if the negotiated settlement is there, to take it. That is the balance which civilised people would expect us to make.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Notwithstanding the agreement, if America, for whatever reason, decided to use force, would Britain back her?

The Prime Minister: I am pleased to say that our position and that of the United States on this have been united throughout, and I am sure that that will continue to be true.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway): In congratulating the Prime Minister, may I ask simply this? It is the common aim, shared by all hon. Members, to inflict the minimum damage on the people of Iraq, but to do everything in our power to bring about their leader's downfall. How can that product possibly be assisted by continuing to impoverish those people by the imposition of sanctions, thereby providing Saddam Hussein with the alibi he requires to explain to his people that the misery they suffer lies at our door and not at his?

Will my right hon. Friend contemplate the lessons of history, from Germany in the 1920s, to Vietnam, to Cuba and to South Africa, that totalitarian regimes are never brought down through the agency of their people by the imposition of external sanctions?

The Prime Minister: I have to say to my hon. and learned Friend that I remember, when we sat on the Opposition side of the House of Commons throughout the 1980s, fighting the case for sanctions against South Africa, and most people thought that that had a significant impact.

We are not impoverishing the Iraqi people at all. Ample money under the oil for food and medicines programme could be used for the Iraqi people. It would be a mistake to believe that Saddam Hussein was maintained in power by the love and affection of the Iraqi people. He is maintained in power by a ruthless dictatorship, which comprises, in particular, a special Republican Guard of 26,000 people, who are not immune to using murder, torture and whatever barbaric behaviour comes to hand to keep him in power. The reason why sanctions are there is to ensure compliance with UN resolutions, and sanctions have to remain until there is compliance.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The right hon. Gentleman feels a sense of satisfaction that he has the approbation of yesterday's European Union Foreign Ministers meeting at Brussels, which unanimously approved the agreement that the UN Secretary-General concluded, thanks to the resolution of Her Majesty's Government, the British armed forces and, above all, the Americans. Will he, then, tell the House whether those same European friends are willing to take punitive military action, with us and the United States, if Saddam Hussein abrogates the agreement?

The Prime Minister: I really think that it would be pretty pointless to turn this occasion into a great attack on the European Union, but the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that it is not actually true to say that no other European country supported the action we took. From memory, I think that I am right in saying that Germany, Netherlands and Portugal all offered specific support. Other countries made it clear that they would back the use of force if diplomatic means failed, and the statement that came out of the European Union Ministers meeting showed a degree of consensus throughout Europe for the stand that was taken. We should welcome that.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): Is the Prime Minister aware that, under Saddam Hussein's dictatorship, Iraq's average gross domestic product has dropped to less than one eighth of its previous level? That has had devastating consequences for the people of Iraq. What do we intend to do to assist the development of democracy, peace and economic and social progress in Iraq?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, we will do what we can to assist opposition groups in Iraq and to look at ways in which we can undermine Saddam Hussein in any shape or form. Most people would be delighted if he were to fall. If we had had to take military action and, as a consequence, he had fallen, we would have been delighted at that, too. The problem with saying that we should have set some sort of military objective to remove Saddam Hussein—I know that my hon. Friend was not suggesting that—was that there was not the authority to do so; nor would it have been possible without a massive commitment of ground as well as air forces. We will do what we can to assist opposition forces in Iraq and to undermine Saddam Hussein in any way we can.

As for the income of the Iraqi people and their suffering, the answer is obvious and clear. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was telling me, for all but two years of Saddam's regime, Iraq has been at war or under sanctions. Potentially, Iraq is a rich and prosperous country and it is a tragedy that, as a result of the Saddam Hussein dictatorship, the Iraqi people are not in a position to enjoy that.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Can the Prime Minister confirm that the agreement unambiguously and unequivocally binds Saddam to existing United Nations resolutions, in particular 678 and 687, as well as giving access to the eight presidential sites? If that is the case, why is it necessary to instigate another Security Council resolution, given the sad fact that most draft resolutions are changed substantially before they become resolutions? Even if that does not happen, what would happen if one of the permanent members of the Security Council disagreed?

The Prime Minister: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first point is yes, it certainly reaffirms the existing resolutions. In answer to the second, it is important to have another Security Council resolution because it is important to have the will of international community clearly expressed and for all permanent members of the Security Council together to say that the serious consequences outlined will clearly follow if Saddam Hussein breaks the agreement that he has entered into. In our view, it is of benefit to us both in our dealings with Saddam Hussein and in terms of support from the international community that such a resolution is put through.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): May I add my congratulations to the Prime Minister and Ministers on their firm resolve in this matter? It is as plain as a pikestaff to me that there would have been no diplomatic solution had that firm resolve and cool nerve not been maintained.

I guess that my right hon. Friend will be having further discussions with the United States—there will sensibly be some debriefing and a review of recent events. Will it be reiterated in any such review that a further Security Council resolution would have been essential had Kofi Annan not succeeded in achieving a diplomatic settlement? Some people might well argue that the existing resolutions gave a mandate, but those of us who believe that firm resolve had to be shown thought that a further resolution was necessary. That is worth reviewing.

I hope that those consequences will not occur again. Those of us who are trying to promote world order and who believe in it and in the enforcement and status of the United Nations, think that it would have been a big mistake to use force without that further mandate.

The Prime Minister: There is, and has been, a debate about that, although it is possible to argue that no further mandate was necessary. Fortunately, we will get a new and proper Security Council resolution. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. I very much hope that we have a solution now, but we need to tie down those final points before that is absolutely certain.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Thank you. I am bringing the exchanges to a close now. Thank you, Prime Minister.

Voluntary Personal Security Cards

4.23 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for a system of voluntary personal security cards; and for connected purposes.

There is a view that ten-minute Bills are a waste of time. Unsurprisingly, I do not believe that to be the case. An Act of Parliament stands in my name to protect horses, ponies and donkeys from cruel tethering. A statue of Raoul Wallenberg stands outside the main synagogue in London as a result of a ten-minute Bill. Although there appear to be one or two objections to my efforts to reform the quarantine laws, I am confident that after Cruft's we will see no more objections to that Bill, which will be another measure on the statute book.

On 12 May 1993, I introduced a Bill that was similar to the Bill that I am seeking leave to introduce today. I am also vain enough to say that, because of that Bill, two years later, the then Home Secretary introduced a rather modest rearrangement of driving licences and a further opportunity for people to use identification cards for free movement within the European Union.

On 1 May 1997, a new Government were elected. I am sure that Conservative Members are carefully noting that—although they are not giving us any credit—that Government seem to be adopting some of the measures that the previous Government had well in hand. Only two weeks ago, I noticed an article in which they talked up the very issue of voluntary identity cards. Therefore, I very much hope that, on coming Fridays, Ministers will have no objection to the Bill making progress.

On 22 August 1996, the previous Government announced that, in principle, they agreed with a voluntary identity card scheme. That announcement coincided with a report from the Home Affairs Select Committee, which agreed with proposals to introduce voluntary identification cards.

Although none of the arguments for introducing identification cards is original—the House has heard them all before—I am still somewhat frustrated by the fact that we have not legislated on the matter. There are two specific issues: the advantages of and arguments against identity cards, and whether cards would be voluntary or compulsory.

Given the weight of gentlemen's wallets and ladies' purses, I should have thought that it was entirely logical to use a smartcard as an identity card. The words, "I'll have to see some ID," are familiar to anyone whose cheque book or cheque card has been stolen and who is trying to get money out of a bank account. They are familiar also to students and pensioners applying for a rail card. Everyone accepts that there are times when, in return for a service or benefit, we may have to provide proof that we are who we say we are. Examples include showing a driver's licence; guaranteeing a cheque; proving one's age, or right to be in this country or to claim benefits; proving one's identity to gain access to medical records; and dealing with tax affairs. The list is endless. A voluntary identity card would be of enormous value to most sensible people.

A voluntary identification card would be particularly effective in combating, for example, under-age drinking in licensed premises or under-age purchase of alcohol and tobacco from retail outlets. We should never forget that, sadly, the peak offending age is 15. I am reliably informed that four out of five teenagers support introducing identity cards. I suspect that that support comes largely from their frustration at waiting in queues to enter discotheques.

Introducing identity cards would also end the problem of bogus official callers, and help in tackling social security fraud and similar crimes.

The law-abiding people of our country have absolutely nothing to fear from a voluntary identity card scheme. Moreover, the police would be greatly helped in performing their duties, whether in dealing with terrorism or dealing with immigration or motoring offences. I know that the police would support such a scheme.

I know that some people—including some hon. Members—believe that it would be an absolute waste of time to have a voluntary card, but I do not agree. Some people oppose the cards on the grounds of civil liberties, and I know that the police are reluctant to have a special power to require an individual to produce a card on demand, but I believe that, given the convenience of a card, voluntary ownership would soon become widespread. Indeed, it would eventually become a nuisance not to have a card.

We certainly have the technology to produce such a smartcard at relatively little expense. The Select Committee on Home Affairs was convinced that the technology was available to develop the cards, and to give the necessary protection in terms of confidentiality, with the capacity to contain the information required to make the card effective.

Many other countries have such cards. Of the 15 European states, 12 have some sort of identity card scheme. Seven countries have compulsory card schemes. Austria, Finland, France, the Netherlands and Sweden have voluntary schemes which have been hugely successful. Britain, along with the Irish Republic and Denmark, is the only European Union country not to have an identity card system. Outside the European Union, voluntary card systems operate in Iceland and Switzerland.

It is bizarre that, when one is born, one has to have a birth certificate and, when one dies, one has to have a death certificate, but the bit in between—one's life—is somehow clouded in a haze. I hope that the House will agree—I know that the country does—that an identity card system such as that which I have briefly outlined would register the fact that we have lived. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Amess, Mr. David Atkinson, Mr. Ian Bruce, Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, Mr. Nigel Evans, Mr. Michael Fabricant, Mr. Nick Hawkins, Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. Richard Spring, Miss Ann Widdecombe and Mrs. Ann Winterton.

VOLUNTARY PERSONAL SECURITY CARDS

Mr. David Amess accordingly presented a Bill to provide for a system of voluntary personal security cards; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 6 March, and to be printed [Bill 126].

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Considered in Committee.

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]

Clause 1

NUMBER OF MEPS, ELECTORAL REGIONS AND ELECTORAL SYSTEM

4.32 pm

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North–West Cambridgeshire): I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 1, line 8, after 'Kingdom', insert 'and Gibraltar'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 7, in page 1, line 9, at end insert—

'1A. For the purposes of this Act, the United Kingdom includes Gibraltar.'.

No. 47, in page 1, line 9, at end insert—

'1A. Wherever the words United Kingdom appear in this Act they shall be deemed to include Gibraltar.'.

No. 57, in schedule 1, page 5, line 44, at end insert—

'(e) the register of electors in Gibraltar.'.

No. 45, in page 6, line 25, after 'London', insert 'and Gibraltar'.

No. 8, in page 6, line 26, after 'London' insert 'and Gibraltar'.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Gibraltar has been a subject of debate, interest and importance to this country for at least 300 years. British possession took place in 1704 and was ratified by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713. Ever since, Spain has wanted it back.

I am aware that it is not in order to give a history of British-Spanish relations as they relate to Gibraltar, and I shall not do so for two reasons: first, I do not want to incur your ire, Mr. Lord; and, secondly, I do not want to create the impression that I am seeking to spin out the debate, as that is not our intention. We shall address the issues, but not filibuster, even though we have serious differences with the principles at the heart of the Bill.

Over the centuries, Spain has tried in a number of ways and with varying degrees of aggression to reclaim Gibraltar. That has constituted a problem for successive British Governments, who have attached importance not only to friendly relations with Spain but to Gibraltar's position.

In 1967, Mrs. Judith Hart, speaking for the then British Government, made it clear that there would be no change in control of Gibraltar without the freely expressed wishes of its inhabitants. That is reinforced by article 73 of the United Nations charter, which states that no decolonisation of any territory will take place unless the inhabitants of that territory agree: the inhabitants' wishes are paramount.

All hon. Members, from whatever party, will recognise that Spain has embarked on a long game to try to reclaim Gibraltar. There have been border incidents and Spain has exerted a variety of pressures, including on airline services.

It is worth reminding ourselves at the start of this debate that Gibraltar joined the European Community in 1973 with the United Kingdom—incidentally, that was 13 years before Spain joined. However, no one specifically looks after Gibraltar's interests in the European Union; British Ministers, of course, have a general oversight, but no specific responsibility.

The question we must ask is why the 30,000 inhabitants of Gibraltar are the only people in a Union of 400 million who are not allowed to vote in European elections. If there were an enclave in this country of British citizens who did not have the right to vote for a representative in the House of Commons, there would be much agitation among Labour Members to right what would be seen as a palpable wrong.

I am the first to recognise—as did the Labour Government in the late 1970s—that there were difficulties in accommodating Gibraltar in the system for direct elections that we chose in 1979. That system was based on parliamentary constituencies; the European constituencies were formed by bringing together a number of parliamentary constituencies.

The then Conservative Opposition did not take great exception to the exclusion of Gibraltar, as we recognised the difficulties, and, during the 18 years when Labour was in opposition, Labour Members did not go on about the matter. What is exciting is that the Government have decided—we believe wrongly, although we recognise that the Bill received its Second Reading with the express will of the House—to rip up the system that stood us in good stead for 20 years and introduce a new system which, because it is not based on parliamentary constituencies, gives us the opportunity, for the first time, to right the wrong.

The Government's position was set out by the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Baroness Symons, who said in another place:

"The noble Lord, Lord Bethell, and the noble Baroness, Lady Hooper, raised questions about voting rights in Gibraltar in the European Parliament elections. Gibraltar's lack of representation in the European Parliament results from Annex II of the 1976 EC Act on direct elections. The affect of Annex II on the 1976 Act is to restrict the application of the Act to the UK itself, to the exclusion of other UK territories such as Gibraltar, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, to which the EC treaty apply in part. Amending Annex II would require the unanimous agreement of all EU member states. However, the Government are aware of the strength of feeling in Gibraltar on that issue."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 26 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 1058.]

If the Home Secretary is minded to accept our amendment this evening, I have no doubt that on Report he will want to move further amendments to include the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. I give him an undertaking now that, if he does that, the Opposition will support him.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): With the greatest respect to the shadow Home Secretary, the issue is much narrower. The provision should relate exclusively to Gibraltar for one reason: Gibraltar is in the European Union, and the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man are not. I would ask the Committee to concentrate exclusively on Gibraltar as it is a stand-alone case. The other two jurisdictions are not in the European Union and are not seeking that facility.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I entirely agree. The rest of my case concerns the uniqueness of Gibraltar. I was quoting a Foreign Office Minister in another place. It was she, not I, who widened the issue to include the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man.

I was saying that, if the Government chose to accept our amendment and then, in sympathy with what the noble Baroness said, decided to table amendments to incorporate the other two jurisdictions, we would be willing to support them. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy. However, I know that the Government will not do that, because they are strangely reticent about anything relating to the Channel Islands, given the embarrassment that they have already suffered.

Let me focus the Committee's attention on Gibraltar. Gibraltar is an integral part of the European Union; if anyone doubts that, I refer him or her to article 227(4) of the treaty of Rome. As I have said, although Gibraltar is an integral part of the European Union, it is the only member state that does not have a vote.

I wondered whether that was true of other dependent territories and whether perhaps there was some quirk in the treaty of Rome denying dependent territories a vote, and I am indebted to the House of Commons Library for providing me with the information. I turned first to France. I found that French dependent territories fell into two categories. I cannot explain to the Committee why, so I hope that nobody will ask me that question.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): The two categories in France are known as the DOM and the TOM.

4.45 pm

Sir Brian Mawhinney: We are deeply grateful to the Home Secretary for that penetrating insight. I guess that that is his bid to be associated with the DOM, not having been invited to the celebrations this morning.

France divides its overseas dependent territories into two groups. The first is the French overseas department. Guadeloupe elects its own MEP. It is not absorbed into another region of France and expected to vote for the MEP representing that region. The second group is known as the French overseas collectivité, including Mayotte and St. Pierre and Miquelon. Those territories, too, elect a separate MEP. Not only do French dependent territories have a vote, but they elect their own MEPs.

I turned to Spain and discovered that Spanish dependent territories in north Africa, such as Ceuta and Melilla, also elect their own MEP. We are left wondering, therefore, why only Britain's dependent territories appear not to have a vote for representation in the European Parliament.

France and Spain have extra MEPs representing their dependent territories which are not absorbed into continental France or Spain. Those are extra seats. Our amendment does not go that far. We are proposing not that Gibraltar should be treated as a separate region, but simply that it should be bound to the United Kingdom system.

[Sir Brian Mawhinney]

Let me make it clear that the official Opposition are happy to support the amendment in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), my right hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay). We agree that the London region is the appropriate place to include Gibraltar. Had those right hon. and hon. Members not tabled their amendment, we would have tabled one to that effect.

The consideration of the Bill in Committee provides the House with a new opportunity to remedy a long-standing democratic deficit. The issue is becoming increasingly pressing. In Gibraltar, the feeling of injustice is heightened as Gibraltar becomes more than a trading area and seeks a more independent voice in the international community.

The Government have also heightened the pressure by their agreement to the Amsterdam treaty. The Amsterdam treaty greatly enhanced the co-decision-making role of the European Parliament. It is no great secret that we would not have taken that route, but the Government did. They acceded to the granting of new powers to the European Parliament. In other words, the Amsterdam treaty gave the European Parliament a more extensive role in the process of legislation that Gibraltar is required to put into its law and, subsequently, to implement. However, it does not allow Gibraltar any say in the formulation of that legislation. It echoes the sentiments of "no taxation without representation". It is almost saying, "No legislation without representation."

The time has come to enfranchise Gibraltar. We have a new system. We do not like it and we think that the Government will regret it. When it dawns on the British people exactly what the Government are doing in this legislation, the Government's popularity will take a beating, and I view that with equanimity. I can force myself to sleep at night with that prospect.

I am not sure that there is not a devious, Machiavellian plot by the Home Secretary, who has honourably, repeatedly and—I hope that I do not embarrass him—with increasing enthusiasm made it clear that he does not believe in proportional representation. I wonder why his fingers are across the Bill. I had a smidgen of a thought that perhaps the public reaction some time next year will be such that he will be able to safeguard the House from the ravages of Lord Jenkins and his machinations on behalf of the secret Lib-Lab pact, the nature of which is becoming increasingly apparent.

The Government are destroying all the links with the old constituencies and putting new regions in place. There is an opportunity to allow Gibraltarians—as part of the London region—to help elect members who would have a direct democratic responsibility for the Rock and the people who live on it. The Government cannot argue that they cannot handle the numbers. In my part of the country we are promised a region with 4 million voters. What sense of ownership they will have of their MEPs, or the MEPs will have of the eastern region, defies my ability to understand. Of the 30,000 who are resident on the Rock, my understanding is that perhaps only 18,000 would be eligible to vote. Those 18,000 have been denied the franchise. There can be no argument that the numbers will be destabilising. A 1985 European Parliament research paper suggested that Gibraltar could be added to the electoral roll in a United Kingdom constituency.

The old system was difficult. The proposed new—but deeply flawed—system provides us with an opportunity. The Government will tell us that Spain will not like it. That will cut no ice with the Conservatives and, I suspect, precious little ice with Labour Members. If the Government are prepared to deny voting rights to 18,000 Gibraltarians because Spain will not like it, the Minister should get up, look the world in the eye and say so. We shall all draw our own conclusions.

Baroness Symons said that giving voting rights to Gibraltar would be possible only with unanimous agreement in the Council of Ministers. Of course we believe that a good relationship with Spain is important. However, the Conservatives believe that the relationship between Gibraltar and this country is also important. Gibraltar is part of the United Kingdom. Spanish dependent territories have a vote and representation in an additional seat. We are not asking for that.

We know that the Government are already tentative in their relations with Spain. I happened on a report of the Justice and Home Affairs Council of 4 and 5 December last year. It says:

"The Spanish delegation blocked three decisions which were ripe for agreement, over the status of Gibraltar. One decision concerned a proposed joint action for the creation of a European legal contact network. Spain, which does not recognise the independence or the autonomy of Gibraltar, did not want the British Government to appoint a magistrate or prosecutor to Gibraltar. To mollify the Spaniards, the Presidency asked all the Member States to notify their contact points—judiciary authorities and magistrates specialising in the fight against large-scale crime—to the Secretary General of the Council, so that this joint action could be implemented immediately once adopted at a future session. The UK delegation announced that it did not plan to create a contact point on Gibraltar."

The Government have already proved pretty weak on relations with Spain over Gibraltar when push comes to shove.

For the sake of the nation, eschewing partisan advantage, we do not want the Government, who are already becoming known as soft on crime, to be thought of as soft on democracy as well. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), said in an answer on 9 December that the Foreign Office was keeping the issue under review. Now is the time to end the review. Now is the time to put up or shut up.

The new Labour Government tell us that they are creating a new Britain, a new Europe, a new world and a new millennium, that they are making new friends in Europe, have new influence in Europe and have the presidency to boot. Let us have a small test of all that newness—all that new influence, all that new power, all that new persuasive charm, all that new democracy, all that "let the people decide" attitude, all that determination to put the people first, foremost and always. What about the people of Gibraltar?

This may cause some hurt among Labour Members, but some of us have been sceptical about some of the Government's claims. Today provides them with a chance to prove us wrong. I want the Minister to rise to the challenge on behalf of the people of Gibraltar and the democratic accountability about which she and her right hon. and hon. Friends talk so much. Let us have a little openness on Gibraltar.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene, because it stops a flood of tears springing to my eyes about the situation in Gibraltar. Did the outgoing Conservative Government intend to include Gibraltar in this Bill on the European elections?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I have two things to say to the hon. Gentleman, whom, as he knows, I hold in the highest possible regard. First, had he been able to organise his timetable to join us a little earlier than he did, he would have already heard me deal with that point at considerable length and to the general approval of the Chamber. Secondly, had we won the election last year, we would not have dreamed of bringing in such a rotten Bill.

Of course the Foreign Office will be against our amendment; it will not like anything that upsets the relationship between the United Kingdom and Spain. But this is a Home Office Bill. The Home Secretary is already in danger—I put it as gently as I can—of creating the impression that his freedom of movement is only as great as that permitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be damaging if the Home Secretary's freedom of movement were seen to be constrained by the Foreign Secretary as well as by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I ask the Minister to give serious consideration not to doing something for the Opposition but to doing something of huge importance for the people of Gibraltar. I commend the amendment to the Committee.

5 pm

Mr. Mackinlay: I support the amendments. I formally apologise to the shadow Home Secretary for interrupting and misunderstanding him. We were at one on the point that he was making. The amendments relate exclusively to Gibraltar. They relate to a self-standing case. It needs to be borne in mind that no other territory is relevant to the issue. The word "territories" is in all European legislation and treaties, and it is an accident. The treaties should specifically refer to Gibraltar since there is simply no other "territory" falling into that category.

I wish, though, that the shadow Home Secretary did not pick a fight on every occasion. It makes it more difficult for people like me, who are in enough deep water as it is, to agree with him almost entirely. He sometimes over-eggs the partisan case, as he has on this self-standing matter of fundamental right. The people of Gibraltar are in the European Union. They are British, and by virtue of the Maastricht treaty, they have European Union citizenship. Whatever our views on that, it is enshrined in British law and must have some value.

I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench extend me the courtesy of listening to my remarks. I shall certainly want to interrupt them when they start trotting out flawed arguments which the Foreign Office is peddling to them. If my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), the Assistant Whip, asks me to move on, I will do so as quickly as I can, although I want to complete the important arguments. Such arguments are very serious to 17,000 potential electors who are denied rights.

The Labour party has a long tradition of ensuring enfranchisement. I find it difficult to reconcile that powerful tradition with the apparent refusal to recognise that the people of Gibraltar have a right to vote in European elections—and I do mean a right. I hope that there might be some more mature reflection on the matter.

The shadow Home Secretary advanced the idea that the British Government would not extend the franchise because they were somehow frightened of the reaction of Spain, and so on. My fear is that that view is endemic at official level in the Foreign Office. Over the years, the Foreign Office has badly failed the people of Gibraltar. That is reflected in its flawed briefs to Ministers.

Reference has been made to arguments advanced in another place by Baroness Symons that, somehow, there is an impediment to altering the law without unanimity among EU member states. That is simply wrong in law. It is nonsense, but it is indicative of the kind of stuff that is peddled at an official level in the Foreign Office. Even if I am wrong, it is up to the British Government to challenge such a premise. I am quite confident—I say this with as much humility as I can muster—that I happen to be right, and that the Foreign Office is wrong. I invite the Minister to consider that, if the point is conceded, the right of this place to determine categories of citizenship is conceded.

It is within the competence of any EU nation state to legislate on who its citizens are and on the various categories of citizenship. I shall not go into the question of the citizenship of the people of Gibraltar and the nature of their passports, suffice it to say that it is in our competence, within the EU, to include them in a category of citizenship. We could do so under this Bill or some other measure.

The shadow Home Secretary referred to the fact that, throughout the world—on islands in not only the Atlantic ocean but the Indian and Pacific oceans—EU citizens vote in European elections. He referred to the territories of France, Spain and the Netherlands. There is a wider issue in that people in such territories may also vote in national assembly elections. That matter should be addressed, too, but I will not go down that road today. Such countries have sensibly incorporated the people of their territories in their supranational territory. In the treaty of Utrecht, which I know the Minister looks at frequently, she will find that it is within our competence to do the same for the people of Gibraltar. The Spanish could not challenge it in the courts, because such a competence is four square within the terms of the treaty.

The shadow Home Secretary referred to people around the globe who will vote in European elections by virtue of citizenship of other European nations, but United Kingdom citizens in every corner of the world will also be voting due to legislation which, rightly or wrongly, was passed under the Conservative Government, who extended the franchise to people who have lived in other countries for up to 20 years. From central America to south America, and in every corner of the globe, folk will be able to vote and will vote in European elections.

I return to the moral argument, to which I ask the Minister to address herself. If we had gone to war this week, Gibraltar would have gone to war.

[Mr. Mackinlay]

When EU common foreign security policy decisions are made, Gibraltar is bound by them. The Prime Minister is Gibraltar's Prime Minister. Of course, Gibraltar has a Chief Minister, but the Prime Minister represents Gibraltar on world councils. The Foreign Secretary is also the Foreign Secretary of Gibraltar. I hasten to add that, in relation to a number of detailed aspects of the constitutional relationship between Gibraltar and the UK, the Home Secretary is the Home Secretary of Gibraltar.

The fortunes of the people of Gibraltar are ultimately determined in this House, but they are denied a vote here. Decisions are being taken in Brussels and the European Parliament which affect them, yet they have no right to have a say. That is demonstrably wrong and completely flouts the Labour party's tradition of extending the franchise.

The very least that I would expect of the Government is to incorporate in the Bill the ability to include Gibraltar, and then to test that ability in the courts, if challenged. As I said, if I am wrong, and we lose the case in both the United Kingdom courts—which is inconceivable—and the European courts, so be it. But that will not be so. The Government are not going to test that, because they will shun the amendments.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am sorry if I made it more difficult for the hon. Gentleman on a partisan basis. I was not trying to do that. He has just made an important and realistic point—that, if the Bill were amended to include Gibraltar, it is conceivable that, between it receiving Royal Assent and the 1999 elections, the Government might not get the agreement of Spain. That might take a little longer. In which case, were the Government to indicate a willingness in principle to incorporate something along the lines of the amendments, I would be very happy to withdraw our amendment, as I am sure he would withdraw his, to give the Government the opportunity on Report to table a more enabling amendment.

Mr. Mackinlay: I agree. I hope that Ministers are listening to the suggestion that there should be further reflection on the matter at least to enable the UK Government to extend the franchise. That is fair and sensible. If they do not accept that, the onus is on them to advance the reasons why they are unable to. I use the word "unable" deliberately, because, if they cannot advance such reasons, we must conclude that they are unwilling and we are entitled to ask why. I think that the smoking gun goes back to the Foreign Office, which has significantly failed the people of Gibraltar for a decade or more. I ask the Home Secretary to consider re-examining the matter.

There is abysmal ignorance about the matter. I intervened on the Shadow Home Secretary because I get so irritated by people thinking that the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man are part of this. I know that such flawed thinking often emanates from Foreign Office officials. The issue must be addressed. It is not going to go away. We will have this debate time and again when dealing with Bills on representation of the people for the House of Commons. No doubt there will be further legislation relating to elections to the European Parliament. As sure as night turns into day, some Government—I hope that it will be a Labour Government—will concede the point. After that, people will wonder what all the fuss was about. Some things are inevitable, and this place makes itself look silly by not listening to arguments that have been won. We stand rigid and try to use the whipping system to let a silly situation prevail.

I hope that the Minister will reconsider the matter. If I show anger, it is because of the prevailing attitudes to which I referred. An hon. Member, who, unlike me, holds office, referred to Gibraltar in my hearing as being "abroad". When I challenged him, he again said that it was "abroad". That underlines the nonsense that we hear about Gibraltar. I will not embarrass the hon. Member concerned but he was of some note. It is time that a line was drawn. I hope that we will start to stand by these people who have done us proud and are morally entitled to be represented in democratic institutions.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): This is an important debate. Extending the franchise to people who should have a way of representing themselves democratically is very important. I listened carefully to the points made by the right hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: North-West Cambridgeshire

Mr. Heath: I apologise; I was misinformed. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) had five or six minutes of good points and it was good to hear them extended to 28 minutes. He is right to say that it is an old question. Arguably, it goes back to the treaty of Utrecht, which was in some ways an imperfect document, but it was of its time. Nevertheless, it creates anomalies that have yet to be rectified.

One of today's newspapers carries the obituary of a distinguished former Member of the House, Sir David Crouch. One of his earliest activities was arguing for the democratic rights of the people of Gibraltar against the Government of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). The matter has exercised hon. Members for many years.

It is an anomaly that Gibraltar is treated, uniquely, as a European Union territory that does not have access to the democratic structures of the European Union. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire is right to draw a distinction between Gibraltar and the French départements and territoires d'outre-mer and the Spanish enclaves on the north African coast. He was perhaps disingenuous in not making clear how that anomaly came about. Those territories had democratic representation in their domestic Parliaments at the time of accession to the European Union, whereas Gibraltar has not had that right of representation, nor has it been accepted by this Government or previous ones that it should have that right. It is perhaps something that we should address. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and I have been considering that carefully in the Foreign Affairs Select Committee when examining the affairs of our dependent territories, which are now the British overseas territories.

5.15 pm

There is also the argument, which I believe no longer holds true, that Gibraltar is not fully part of the European Union territories, in that some parts of the acquis communautaire do not apply to the territory of Gibraltar. Indeed, there was an argument that the Government of Gibraltar had not implemented the parts of the acquis communautaire that did apply to it. Mr. Caruana and the present Government of Gibraltar have made considerable strides in bringing Gibraltar into line with its obligations. It is therefore clearly right and opportune that we consider citizenship and the extension of the franchise to Gibraltar.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Thurrock, because I believe that there are difficulties in law. Annexe 2 of the 1976 EC Act on Direct Elections is an impediment. It clearly forms part of the treaty; we have a treaty obligation. I would not be happy if we passed into domestic law something that was clearly not in line with our treaty obligations.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I did not quite understand the hon. Gentleman's last point. My understanding, which was reinforced by the quotation from Baroness Symons that I read out earlier, is that such action is not outwith the law, and that the difficulty was the need for unanimity. Knowing Spain's attitude to Gibraltar, that would be a difficult task. Is he saying that there is a genuine legal impediment, as opposed to what I might call a handling problem?

Mr. Mackinlay: Test it.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Thurrock says that we should test it. It may need to be tested. I understand that the current advice of the Foreign Office—

Mr. Mackinlay: It is wrong.

Mr. Heath: It may well be wrong, but it is borne out by my reading of the annexe and the treaty. The treaty would have to be amended, and it is that, rather than the treaty's interpretation, which would require unanimity among member states. That advice is not cast solid. A letter from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the Foreign Affairs Committee on behalf of Baroness Symons offers to ask legal experts to look again at ways of getting around that apparent difficulty. That is right, but we cannot simply wish it away and say that there is no impediment.

I agree with the hon. Member for Thurrock that there is no clear impediment to representation of the people of Gibraltar here. That is a matter for the will of the British Parliament. The case of the European Parliament is clearly written into a treaty, and we have to find ways either of interpreting it differently from how it has been interpreted so far or of amending it, which would require unanimity.

My last point is a small difference with the right hon. Member North-West Cambridgeshire, who seeks to put Gibraltar into the London region. Those of us from the south-west of England have always felt that, if Gibraltar is to be anywhere, it should be in the south-west. It lies in the western approaches. Like the Scilly Isles, it is a natural extension of the south-west peninsula: keep going and one eventually arrives at Gibraltar. That view has been promoted by my friend the Member of the European Parliament for Cornwall and Plymouth, who sees Gibraltar as naturally part of his territory. We shall not fall out over whether Gibraltar, if it ever accedes, should be part of the south-west region or part of the London region, but it is necessary that I should make the case on behalf of my own region.

In short, if the Committee divides, I and my right hon. and hon. Friends will support the amendment. That is not because we believe that it is perfect—we do not; there is still much legal and diplomatic work to be carried out before its aims can be achieved—but to indicate our preference that the people of Gibraltar should have the democratic representation that every other citizen of the European Union has by right. If we can demonstrate that desire to the Government today, perhaps they will do as the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire suggested, look at the matter again and return with workable proposals to make that democratic representation a reality.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I support the three amendments in my name, and those tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) and others.

In September of last year, I was privileged to visit Gibraltar with a delegation from the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. Chief among the many points we noted during our visit was the people of Gibraltar's enthusiasm to remain British and to retain their British nationality. Not the least part of their claim is that they have played an important part in this nation's history and, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) said, they continue to play an important part. The ships sent to the Gulf during the recent confrontation with Iraq were refuelled and, in some cases, restored and reprovisioned in Gibraltar.

The people of Gibraltar feel strongly that they accept many burdens as a result of their membership of the European Union, but do not necessarily get all the benefits. The subject under discussion this evening is one of the benefits that they are not getting.

I should clear up one misunderstanding—the common belief that the people living in Gibraltar are actually expatriate Spaniards. That is not true: the people living in Gibraltar are generally of Italian extraction, many of whom can trace their ancestry back to Genoa. They are, by any reckoning, European peoples, and they feel aggrieved about the current situation. The whole of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation recognised their concerns and understood them. I hope that tonight there will be cross-party support in the Lobby for the amendments. It is an issue on which the whole House can unite without fear of establishing any precedent, because Gibraltar is in a unique position.

One of the few redeeming features of the Bill—which, in other aspects, my colleagues and I will oppose—is that it gives the House an opportunity to address a wrong, or to correct what might have been an oversight 25 years ago. As my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire has pointed out, the Bill represents a new beginning, with new constituencies, new methods of election, a change in the candidate selection procedure, and opportunity to include Gibraltar. I hope that the House will bear with me as I read an extract from a letter from the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, which was sent to me in November last year. It states:

"30,000 British Gibraltarians, and other EU Nationals resident in Gibraltar, are the only EU Nationals who have no right to vote at Euro-Elections. This is in stark contrast to citizens of Spanish territories in North Africa, and some French territories even further away, who do vote. The people of Gibraltar have long felt aggrieved by this serious democratic deficit. The position is now even more anomalous following extension of the co-decision procedure, which gives the European Parliament a far more extensive role in the process of legislation which Gibraltar is subsequently required to transpose into our own laws and to implement."

The Gibraltarians are the only European nationals who do not have the vote in European parliamentary elections, but there are other factors to be considered. Gibraltar is geographically part of Europe—that is indisputable; it is ethnically European, as I have already demonstrated; administratively, it has been linked either to this country, or, further back in history, to another European country; and currently, it is treaty-bound in membership of the European Union. Gibraltar's constitutional position within the European Union is defined by article 227(4) of the treaty of Rome—Amsterdam article 299.4, page 227, Cm 3780—which states:

"The provisions of this Treaty shall apply to the European territories for whose external relations a Member State is responsible."

The amendments do not propose that Gibraltar should be a new constituency. Many hon. Members recognise that if that were the proposal, it would be necessary to amend the 1976 EC Act on Direct Elections. The amendments simply propose that Gibraltarians should be added to the electoral rolls in the new London electoral region. Any other region could have been chosen, but it seems to me that, for practical and commonsense reasons, it would be more sensible for Gibraltar to be connected with the City of London. Most people travelling from Gibraltar to this country arrive in London, and most people travelling to Gibraltar start their journeys in London. There is therefore a good argument in favour of linking Gibraltar with London, although I acknowledge what the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said in that respect.

Following on from other remarks made by the hon. Gentleman, may I draw his attention to the opinion of Michael Llamas, who is an advocate resident in Paris? Mr. Llamas presented an opinion to the European Court in connection with the case of a Gibraltarian who went to the court on the precise issue of whether or not she was being denied her democratic rights by not being allowed to vote in European elections. It was the opinion of Mr. Llamas that:

"The United Kingdom can unilaterally extend the right of franchise to the European Parliament to Gibraltar if such an extension can be put into effect without the need to amend Annex II."

That confirms the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire. Mr. Llamas continues:

"the United Kingdom can unilaterally extend the right of franchise to the European Parliament to Gibraltar because:

(a) the Act on Direct Elections is applicable to Gibraltar by virtue of the operation of Article 227(4) EC Treaty;

(b) for EC purposes, Gibraltar is considered to be an integral part of the Member State, the United Kingdom."

In addition, Mr. Llamas argues that the right of franchise to the European Parliament for Gibraltar can be given effect in two further ways: either

"by the integration of the Gibraltarian vote in the vote of European Parliamentary constituency in the United Kingdom"— which is what is proposed in the amendments; or

"by the grant of a European Parliamentary seat to the territory of Gibraltar."

He continues:

"in the former case, the United Kingdom can . . . act unilaterally whereas in the latter case it cannot do so."

I hope that that answers the question posed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome.

Mr. Llamas also states:

"it is possible for the Gibraltarian vote to be integrated into the vote of a European Parliamentary constituency in the United Kingdom. This solution would maintain the exclusion of the territory of Gibraltar from the Act on Direct Elections, as interpreted by the United Kingdom, but would allow the citizens of the European Union who reside in Gibraltar to exercise the rights protected under Article 3 of Protocol No. 1. Since this vote would be expressed in the context of a European Parliamentary constituency in the United Kingdom there is no need to amend Annex II. The problem would be solved internally and unilaterally by the United Kingdom."

I hope that the Minister will take that point on board and respond to it when she sums up the debate.

The Government profess their determination to create greater democracy—in fact, the whole United Kingdom constitution is being turned upside down on the pretext of securing greater democracy. This Bill is part of that process. Even in Committee this evening, the Government seem determined to resist giving 30,000 British subjects the right to vote. Those people are British nationals. The 1972 Act of Accession defined the term "nationals" in the context of Gibraltar as follows:

"Persons who are citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies by birth or by registration or naturalisation in Gibraltar, or whose father was so born."

There is no doubt that those people are British nationals and that Gibraltar is a special case. There is no doubt, either, that Gibraltar is in a unique situation. The Minister need have absolutely no fear about creating any sort of precedent by agreeing to the amendments tonight. I hope that the Government will respond generously this evening. More to the point, I hope that the Government will take advantage of a unique opportunity to grant the people of Gibraltar their full democratic rights.

5.30 pm

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I support the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), who have tabled amendment No. 7, for various reasons. I remember my first visit to Gibraltar, when the Chief Minister and Members of the Council were socialists. We are dealing with the full spectrum of political opinion in Gibraltar when we discuss this matter.

A few years later, in London, Mr. Bossano told me, "Remember that the mandarins in Madrid and in London have more in common with one another than they have with their political masters." He said that with a twinkle in his eye because he was transposing Madrid and Dublin in my case. The people of Northern Ireland have an empathy with the people of Gibraltar. Several years ago, when some said that it would be difficult to fit 30,000 people into one United Kingdom constituency, I suggested that we might consider linking Gibraltar with North Antrim as a fair number of Gibraltarians were born around Ballymena—hence Ballymena house in Gibraltar.

I understand the views expressed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). Gibraltar holds the Mediterranean approaches and the hon. Gentleman might consider that it should also hold the western approaches. On the other hand, I support the argument for linking Gibraltar with London. People often travel from Gibraltar to London, communication with London is easy, and Gibraltar has a fine office in London that keeps us informed about events.

I support my colleagues who have said that we are not dealing simply with an overseas territory or arguing the case for territories outwith Europe: we are dealing with an injustice that was done to Gibraltarians allegedly because we defended the concept of the treaty of Utrecht. We did not argue the case of Gibraltar as an individual entity within Europe sufficiently strongly when the annex was added. Without changing that pattern, it is now time to give the people of Gibraltar their democratic rights within the European Union.

I support the amendments, and I trust that the Government will move speedily to accept them in the interests of natural justice and democracy. The people of Gibraltar are part of us; they have been with us in good times and in bad. When we gave Gibraltar greater independence, it acceded to all our requests to reform its own political and banking systems in order to achieve the best British standard. We should support the people of Gibraltar now and grant them their proper place within Europe.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I wish to put in an historical context the case for giving Gibraltar the rights that the amendments enshrine. It is significant that, in this short discussion, hon. Members representing four political parties have spoken in support of the amendments. That shows that this is one of the least divisive issues that Parliament has addressed in recent weeks. The Government would not lose face by accepting the amendments; there is widespread consensus in support of them, and I would welcome the Minister's acceptance of them when she winds up the debate.

It is important to consider the historical perspective, not least because the situation has changed a great deal since Britain's accession to the European Community—as it then was—in 1973. When Spain became a member some years later, there was a burst of optimism throughout Europe—particularly in this country and in Gibraltar—that, as Spain had been cemented as a member of the wider European democratic family, the centuries-old problem of conflict between Britain and Spain over Gibraltar might be resolved through reasonable debate and sensible negotiation between democracies that the European ideal is designed to promote. One of the great disappointments of the last couple of decades in the context of Gibraltar is that that has not occurred.

There has clearly been some relaxation of and significant improvements in the conditions that the Spanish Government apply to the people of Gibraltar, but I am sure that all hon. Members agree that the normalisation of relations between Gibraltar and Spain, which we hoped for when Spain acceded to the European Community, has not been realised. It is therefore appropriate for the British Government to say at this stage that we are prepared to stand up fully for the democratic rights of the people of Gibraltar. We have waited long enough for the problem to be resolved through negotiation. As that has not proved possible, the time is right for the British Government to make this significant gesture.

Since the accession of Britain—and therefore of Gibraltar—and Spain to the European Union, the concept of EU citizenship has been introduced. The European Union is presently running a Europe-wide advertising campaign pointing out that EU citizenship confers rights on the citizens of the Union. As it is explicitly a Union of democratic countries, every EU citizen can expect to have the basic right to vote and the basic right to representation, but all that is a charade if, in one small corner of the EU, those rights to do not apply.

The implications go wider. The problem of the democratic deficit clearly affects the European Union, and the European Parliament is meant to redress it. Nowhere is the democratic deficit more palpable than in Gibraltar, whose citizens have no democratic representation at all in European institutions. While we are addressing the democratic deficit, it is important that we start with the place for which this country has a direct responsibility and which is worst off in terms of democratic representation.

The suggestions in the amendments would be good not just for Gibraltar, but for the European Parliament. I am aware that some of my hon. Friends might greet with equanimity, to use the word of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), the fact that the European Parliament lacks a high public profile and is often regarded as a fifth wheel on the coach among European institutions.

That attitude is short-sighted. The institution exists and serves a purpose. It is gaining new powers as the years pass. It would be sensible for the Committee to give the European Parliament a useful and popular effect so that it can show itself to be capable of expanding democracy in European institutions.

As we have heard, Gibraltarians are not represented in a national Parliament, which would be this place. As they are citizens of the European Union and have not shown any great desire for representation in this place, the European Parliament would be the appropriate place for the democratic representation of such a British overseas territory.

I shall try to anticipate what the Minister will say in opposing these popular and sensible amendments. I imagine that the Government will say that the amendments would break the treaties and therefore be illegal. We have heard several learned comments on whether the Foreign Office legal advice is correct on that point. I always hesitate to enter a legal debate, but at the very least it is clear that there can be two coherent views as to the legality of the argument.

I am sure that, in their hearts, hon. Members on both sides of the Committee want to support the amendments, so let us test them. That is what we have a legal system and courts for. If the amendments are illegal, we can do something—we can start negotiating new treaties—but saying supinely that we have received legal advice suggesting that they are illegal so we shall do nothing would not reflect well on the Committee or on the Government.

I dare say that the Minister will be tempted to say that the amendments would be bad for relations between Britain and Spain. None of us wants to disturb relations with one of our friendly colleagues in the European Union, but I suggest to the Government that, when in doubt about prospective negotiations in Europe, they should always ask themselves what the French would do in the same circumstances. They are able to reconcile their national interest with a positive attitude towards relations with the rest of the European Union. It is inconceivable that a French Government, faced with an equivalent problem to the one before us, would not instantly give democratic rights to their own citizens.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): My hon. Friend suggests that the Government might take note of what the French would do in such circumstances. I am sure that, like me, he has read the interesting debate on Gibraltar in another place on 26 November last year. Does he agree that the Government should also take careful note of the views expressed in that debate by their former colleague in this House, now Lord Janner of Braunstone? Does my hon. Friend agree also that the Government would be wise always to take note of their former senior Back Benchers?

Mr. Mackinlay: And existing Back Benchers, please.

Mr. Green: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, as does the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay). Senior Back Benchers, both those who have gone to another place and those still in this place before elevation to another place, can make great sense on the issue.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): My hon. Friend made an interesting and important point about the French. Is it not the case that Martinique, Guadeloupe, Réunion and so on are already départements of France? They are seen to be part of France. From 1713, and later in the treaty of Paris, they were turned into colonies.

5.45 pm

Mr. Green: My hon. Friend is right. There is an exact equivalence, which is why the Committee should accept the amendments.

The Government have made a lot of noise about their presidency and what they will achieve in the six months. May I make the modest suggestion that an historic step forward, which would be popular in this country and extremely welcome in Gibraltar, would be the Government's using their presidency to accept the amendments and giving democratic rights to the people of Gibraltar.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): This has been an interesting debate, and I recognise the strength of feeling that has been evident in the speeches of many hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), who raised this issue on Second Reading, and my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), who has referred to the matter on various occasions.

I found the arguments of the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) less convincing. I was grateful that he began by saying that he was not filibustering. That was good to hear. He also said that he would not try to widen the debate to a general debate on Gibraltar, although it has been widened somewhat.

The right hon. Gentleman spectacularly dodged the question, addressed to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), why the previous Government had not sought to amend the legislation, or whether they would have included Gibraltar if they had introduced a Bill to change the voting system for the European Parliament as the right hon. Gentleman proposes. He was silent on the matter.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: May I help the hon. Lady by reminding her that I said that we recognised, as did her party, before the first direct elections and subsequently, that the form of direct elections that we had adopted—European constituencies based on parliamentary constituencies—made it difficult to accommodate the matter. That was the view of her party in opposition, which never sought to persuade us to take action on it. Having decided to change the system, the Government have now provided an opportunity to redress a wrong that should be put right.

Ms Quin: I find that even less convincing than when the right hon. Gentleman said it the first time round. The previous Government were in power for 18 years. At various points during that time, European constituency boundaries were changed. They never raised the matter.

The right hon. Gentleman thought that we would say that Spain would not like the proposed change, so we would not go ahead with it. I am not prepared to say that at all this evening, although I notice that the right hon. Gentleman's colleague in the other place said something similar on behalf of the Opposition there. He said:

"We—

meaning the Conservative Opposition—

"recognise the formidable practical difficulties in resolving this issue, in that any alteration to the status quo would require the agreement of all member states, including Spain."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 26 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 1052.]

I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman seems not to be on message with his colleagues in another place. The Opposition must try to arrive at a consistent line.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The Minister says that she will not say that Spain will not like it. What does she think Spain's reaction would be if the Government accepted the amendment?

Ms Quin: I said that I am not going to say that Spain would not like it as a reason for not accepting the amendments.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I accept that that is the argument that the Minister is advancing, but what is the answer to my question? What does she think Spain's attitude would be if the Government accepted the amendment?

Ms Quin: As that is not the argument that I am advancing, the hon. Gentleman's argument is hypothetical. It would seem that his question has been answered by his colleague in another place, Lord Moynihan.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Quin: I shall not keep on giving way to the right hon. Gentleman, but I shall do so on this occasion.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to the Minister. My noble Friend is not a Minister and I am not advancing any particular point of policy. I am merely asking the Minister a question, and a simple question. It may not be part of her argument but she is a Minister and it is a legitimate question for me to ask her. What is the Government's assessment of Spain's reaction if the Government accepted the amendment and tried to move things forward?

Ms Quin: As that is not central to my argument, it is not appropriate for me to make such an assessment. The issue that the right hon. Gentleman has raised is not a stumbling block when it comes to the proposed legislation before us.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) referred to the real difficulties. I am grateful to him for what he said even though I reach a rather different conclusion. At least the hon. Gentleman addressed the real legal issues that are at stake.

Various hon. Members have referred to the départements d'outre mer and the territoires d'outre mer. Fortunately for the territories involved, they were covered by the appropriate legislation at the beginning. There is a different historical setting and the territories are counted as part of metropolitan France. They are, for example, able to vote in domestic elections. Opposition Members may envy the status of those areas, but they are not relevant to Gibraltar, to the terms of the amendment or to the Bill.

Mr. Gill: In the Minister's opinion, is there any legal bar to the people of Gibraltar being included in the electoral roll of an English region at the next European elections?

Ms Quin: I am coming to that point. The legal arguments are central to the point of view that the Government are taking.

Gibraltarians are unable to vote in European parliamentary elections by virtue of the second annex of the 1976 Act on direct elections to the European Parliament. The annex restricts the application of the Act to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland only, to the exclusion of other UK territories such as Gibraltar, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, to which the EC treaties apply in part.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock rightly referred to differences between the arrangements that affect Gibraltar and the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, but those differences are not relevant to the Bill, which covers all those territories, including Gibraltar. That is the point.

Mr. Gill: The Minister is now addressing the nub of the question. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and I maintain that there is no bar to Gibraltarians' being put on the electoral roll of one of the new regions in the United Kingdom. Does the hon. Lady accept that much of the new European law that is applied in Gibraltar has to be put on the statute book in Gibraltar and that that is done because of Gibraltar's relationship to the United Kingdom? However, it is not stated in directives that they apply to the United Kingdom and Gibraltar. It is assumed that Gibraltar is part of the United Kingdom for such purposes. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. It is—

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a second speech in an intervention.

Ms Quin: Our understanding of the legal situation is that Gibraltar cannot be included in the way that is suggested. That view seems to be shared by the Opposition spokesman in another place. We are not making a judgment hastily; we closely examined the evidence. It seems that it is not possible to include Gibraltar in the way the hon. Gentleman describes.

Mr. Mackinlay: My hon. Friend has referred to the inclusion of Gibraltar along with the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. There is a substantive difference in law. The Isle of Man and the Channel Islands are not in the European Union. The treaties apply in part to those territories but they are not in the EU. People who live in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man do not have EU citizenship, whereas the people of Gibraltar do. Gibraltarians are in the EU, although in a special category.

I wish sometimes that the occupants of the Treasury Bench would focus on what is being addressed to them through the Chair, because I wish to ask a question. If, for the purposes of this intervention, we accept that my hon. Friend's legal opinion is right—although I think that it is wrong—will she nevertheless be persuaded by the moral argument that the people of Gibraltar are exclusively denied? The Government should therefore examine the proposition advanced by the shadow Home Secretary and reflect upon it again. They should bear it in mind that the fundamental treaties of the European Union state that everyone should be enfranchised. The UK could go on the offensive in the European courts by saying that we are fulfilling the principle of the treaties, only to find that there are democratic institutions that have not prevailed.

Ms Quin: As I have said, there are differences between the status of Gibraltar in the European Union and, for example, the status of the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. However, for the purposes of the EU parliamentary elections, it is clear that they have the same status. That is the legal position. If that position were to be changed, it would require a proposal from the European Parliament, and a unanimous decision in Council followed by ratification by all member states. I am sure that the formidable political obstacles that would be encountered by that course of action are more than evident to the Committee.

[Ms Quin]

The fact that Gibraltarians are unable to vote in elections to the European Parliament does not mean that Gibraltarian views are not expressed in the European Parliament. Having been a member of the European Parliament for 10 years, I know that that is the case. I know that Gibraltar's interests have often been articulated there. I think, for example, of the time when the EU had a scheme to help shipyards, which was called RENAVAL. The scheme involved money that was used in the United Kingdom and in the shipyard at Gibraltar to help deal with the rundown in the Ministry of Defence in that area.

Sir Brian Mawhinney rose—

Ms Quin: I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman for the last time.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: We are in Committee.

I am sure that the hon. Lady was conscientious in terms of Gibraltar when she was a Member of the European Parliament. I say that generously. However, by the token of her argument, would she be content if 18,000 voters in Gateshead, East and Washington, West did not have the opportunity to vote, but she could soothe them by saying, "Of course, I move among you, drink in your pubs and visit the schools in the area, so don't worry; the fact that you cannot vote for me is not that important because I know what you are thinking"? Surely that is not an argument that the hon. Lady would advance in her own constituency.

Ms Quin: I certainly would not make that argument, but Gateshead, East and Washington, West is covered by the legislation in a way that Gibraltar is not. I am simply saying that there are mechanisms for raising Gibraltar issues, which is done regularly by the UK Government. It is also done by various Members of the European Parliament. That is the only argument that I am making.

Mr. Mitchell: This is the argument of virtual representation, which was advanced about the rotten boroughs in the 18th century. It was said that Manchester was virtually represented because those people might speak for it. My hon. Friend the Minister is arguing—I am not a lawyer, so I cannot check on it—that there is no legal basis for including Gibraltar. I should have thought that where there is a will there is a way. As my hon. Friend accepts the need for representation, will she work to secure representation for the people of Gibraltar in the European Parliament, which they deserve in a democratic institution?

Ms Quin: I do not think that my hon. Friend was here when I began my speech.

Mr. Mitchell: I watched it on the television.

6 pm

Ms Quin: My hon. Friend must have been away from the television in order to get to the Chamber. He will therefore not have heard my legal arguments that deal with those points.

I hope that the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire recognises that the amendments alone will not and cannot confer on Gibraltar the right to vote in European Parliament elections. I hope that he will reflect on that and withdraw the amendment.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to you, Sir Alan, for allowing me to catch your eye, because I want to reflect on a few of the points that have been made in this debate.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) directed the Committee's attention to the legal problem that is at the heart of this debate. He did so off the back of a brave declaration of rectitude by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), whose legal view was that the Foreign Office was simply wrong. That view is unique neither to the hon. Gentleman nor to the Committee. What was interesting about the speech of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome was the part of the letter from Baroness Symons, which said, if my memory serves me right, that, if the Foreign Affairs Committee felt strongly about this issue, she was prepared to seek further advice.

Mr. David Heath: So that we can be absolutely clear, the exact words are that the Secretary of State and is still awaiting their advice.

"has asked legal experts to look at the points again"

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Had the Committee heard the Minister say that legal experts had been asked to look at the position again and that she would report back to the House on Report, her speech would have commanded a more convincing response from those who heard it. If she will now come to the Dispatch Box and confirm that legal experts have, as her hon. Friend says, been asked to look at this matter again and that she will undertake to ask them to report so that she can bring their expertise back to the House on Report, I should be happy to withdraw the amendment now and bring it back on Report. I am happy to give way to the hon. Lady if she wishes to do that. I see that the Home Secretary is telling her that she must not do so, so I assume that she will not.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. Friend share my disappointment that what the Government have really said is, "This is not possible and we are not prepared to try or to consider it"? Does not that undermine what the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Peter Caruana, said in his recent address to the fourth conference of the United Nations—that time cannot stand still for Gibraltar, and that we must make progress?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend accurately sums up what we have been told this afternoon, although he did not accurately sum up what the Foreign Affairs Committee has been told. We thus have a Minister at the other end of the Corridor saying something different from a Minister at this end of the Corridor. It is interesting that the Minister at the other end of the Corridor is from the Foreign Office, which is dead against this proposal anyway, while at this end of the Corridor the Minister who is taking a hard line is from the Home Office, which is supposed to defend the democratic process. I am confused.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome has done us a service by drawing that letter to our attention, and I hope that, after the Division, he will encourage the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee to press Baroness Symons to report back on that legal advice as quickly as possible, preferably before the Bill's Report stage, so that we can form a judgment on the possibility of making progress on this legal point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) made an important point and underlined what several hon. Members said about the importance of letting Gibraltar have the vote. He also raised in my mind the question what the rest of the world will think about Gibraltar, given that its 30,000 people are the only people in 400 million who do not have the vote. What is the rest of the world supposed to make of that part of the European Union? What conclusions will it draw? Are not its conclusions likely to be detrimental to Gibraltar? Is it not strange that our Government should help to generate circumstances in which Gibraltar is damaged in that public way?

The hon. Member for Thurrock made an important point when he reminded the Committee that British citizens all over the world can vote in those elections thanks to the legislation introduced by the previous Government—indeed, they can do so for 20 years after leaving these shores—but the people of Gibraltar cannot.

We all understood the point made by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), whose commitment to the democratic principle in circumstances that are much more difficult than most right hon. and hon. Members—fortunately—will ever have to face or understand, is a continuing sense of pride, and justifiably so, not only to the hon. Gentleman but to his right hon. and hon. Friends.

I now come to the Minister's disappointing speech. She flatly refused to tell us what assessment the Government had made of the possibility of moving this issue forward, were they minded to do so. I understand why she refused to answer my question. Had she been willing to answer it, she would have had to admit either that the Government had seriously considered accepting this or a similar amendment, but had balked at the fence or, even worse, that they had not even bothered to consider this option. In other words, she would have had to admit that they had not even bothered to see whether there was any chance of success. It all hung on a legal point.

The hon. Lady said that, because of that legal point, 18,000 people have to be deprived of the right to vote so as to help to determine the legislation that governs their lives. Conservative Members will remember her statement throughout this Parliament. Given the Government's centralising, controlling instincts, that was a quintessential new Labour emphasis. We shall not forget it.

I listened to the hon. Lady carefully. She said that, if the law were to be changed, every country would have to agree to and ratify a proposal. That is not a legal obstacle: I agree with her that it is a challenging political agenda. I hope that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome has noted that point.

If there is no legal obstacle, merely a difficult political hand to be played, the hon. Lady could have said, "It will be difficult to give them the right to vote, but our commitment to the democratic process is such that we are willing to try. However, we can't do so on the back of the Opposition amendment. At best, we can give an undertaking to use the presidency and all our efforts thereafter to try to change the position. When we succeed, we will introduce the necessary primary legislation." If she had said that, hon. Members from all parties would have said to her, "Thank you. We recognise that this is a difficult task that will take time to complete, but you have given us an undertaking and have assured us that your democratic instincts are strong."

In those circumstances, we would have withdrawn the amendment. However, urged on by the Home Secretary, the hon. Lady said exactly the opposite and left us with the clear impression that, when it comes to 18,000 voters in Gibraltar, the Government do not much care. That is a terrible indictment of the hon. Lady. I am glad that the Government Deputy Chief Whip has just joined us. By nodding his head, he has assented to my proposition that the Government have taken a heartless position.

The hon. Lady has hidden behind an abstruse and indefensible point of law to deprive 18,000 Gibraltarians of the right to vote. It is a flag up the masthead and Conservative Members will remember for a considerable time what she and the Home Office have done. She asked me to withdraw the amendment in the light of her wholly unconvincing argument. A number of hon. Members from various parties want to tell the people of Gibraltar, "We believe that you should have a vote." If the hon. Lady and her right hon. and hon. Friends go into the Lobby to tell the people of Gibraltar, "We don't think that you are important enough to have a vote," they must live with that on their consciences.

I shall press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Greg Pope and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 1, line 12, leave out 'nine' and insert 'eighteen'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 49, in page 1, line 13, after 'Scotland', insert

'shall be divided into two electoral regions—

No. 71, in page 1, line 17, leave out '71' and insert '70'.

No. 72, in page 1, line 18, leave out '8' and insert '9'.

No. 50, in page 1, leave out lines 21 to 23 and insert—

'(5) The Boundary Commissions for England and Scotland shall prepare reports dividing England into eighteen regions (of which three shall cover London), and Scotland into two regions.

(6) The Secretary of State shall—

(a) lay any report of a Boundary Commission under subsection (5) before Parliament;

(b) consider the report; and

(c) not earlier than four months after the last such report has been laid, make an Order dividing England into eighteen regions (of which three shall cover London), and Scotland into two regions.

(7) No order shall be made under subsection (6)(c) above unless a draft thereof has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

No. 68, in schedule 1, page 5, leave out lines 7 to 18.

No. 54, in page 5, line 20, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Boundary Commission for England'.

No. 55, in page 5, line 23, leave out 'he considers' and insert 'they consider'.

No. 56, in page 5, line 27, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Boundary Commission for England'.

No. 58, in page 5, leave out lines 45 to 47.

No. 69, in page 6, line 3, leave out from beginning to end of line 47 on page 7.

No. 74, in page 6, line 25, leave out '10' and insert '9'.

Mr. Greenway: Amendment No. 48 would replace the proposed nine electoral regions for England with 18. In Scotland, the proposed single electoral region would be replaced by two.

One of the Conservative party's principal objections to the Bill is the breaking of the constituency link between a Member of the European Parliament and his or her electors. While it is doubtful whether any system of proportional representation could fully overcome that concern, there is a case for saying that doubling the number of electoral regions would create a greater opportunity for MEPs to identify with the areas that they serve.

[Mr. Greenway]

Some may be tempted to suggest that many voters do not know the identity of their MEPs now, but surely the scheme set out in the Bill will make matters infinitely worse. As they stand, the electoral regions provide for as many as 11 MEPs to represent a region. That is bound to confuse people about who are their representatives in the European Parliament, thus reinforcing public scepticism about the value and relevance of the Parliament itself.

The proposed electoral regions have never been subject to public consultation. I shall refer to that in more detail later. The practical consequence is that no one in the House or outside can be confident that the regions set out in the Bill reflect the public's view of their true regional identity. Such a broad-brush approach means that communities have been forced into regions with which they have little cause to identify. Even the most cursory examination of the regional map demonstrates the futility of trying to weld together vast areas of England that have little in common, have wholly different problems or have markedly separate local or regional identities.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Before the hon. Gentleman becomes too excited about the superior qualities of the present system, let me tell him something. I had occasion to look up the office address of an MEP who represents Eyemouth, a fishing village on the Scottish coast just north of where I live. His office is in Ayr, on the west coast, which is part of the same constituency under the existing system.

Mr. Greenway: I am not entirely sure what that has to do with the size of electoral regions. It is up to every MEP to make arrangements to publicise where he can be contacted. I have no doubt that, at elections, electors can make their own judgment on their respective MEP's performance. If we have seven, eight or even 11 MEPs in one electoral region, that will make it even more difficult for electors to have any opportunity to hold to account the people who have been elected to represent them in Brussels and Strasbourg.

The regional map completely disregards the commercial, cultural and geographical links of significant parts of the country, which are economic entities in themselves. Central southern England is a case in point.

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman's argument is that we should redraw the regional map to some design of his own, and his further argument is that those regions are too big to allow MEPs to have a genuinely representative role, why does he not support the original formulation, where we had 63 electoral regions?

6.30 pm

Mr. Greenway: We entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, but, sadly, because of the weight of numbers against us—although the force of argument was on our side—we lost the vote. That matter was put to rest in this House at Second Reading, but we believe that the proposals that I am outlining—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will listen to the details—will provide a better solution than that in the Bill.

Many regional entities exist in all respects, but are not recognised as regions by the respective Government offices or by the Bill. Central southern England is effectively divided in half by the Bill. Local media coverage and transport links, rather than lines on a map, are the major factors which determine where people feel that they belong.

What do the residents of Northampton, which is linked with the west coast main line, have in common with the rural and east coast communities of Lincolnshire? The area that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) represents—if he will listen—is not in the east midlands region, but the coastal towns to the south are; for European elections, they are in the same constituency as the suburbs of Northampton and its commuter area.

How does it make sense to link the commuter belt of Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire with Norfolk? The proposed south-east electoral region is a ridiculous amalgam. In terms of regional issues, let alone local ones, what do people in Buckingham and Oxford share with those in the Kent channel ports? Arguably, Dover has more in common with Calais than with Milton Keynes.

In the south-west electoral region, does it make sense to link Gloucestershire, Wiltshire and Bristol with Devon and Cornwall? We note the lack of interest from the Liberal Democrat Benches on that matter. In central southern England, Bournemouth is in the south-west region, but neighbouring Southampton is in the south-east region, which seems nonsense, given the transport and economic links.

Why cannot people in the Birmingham conurbation, one of Europe's largest cities, have exclusive representation in the European Parliament, instead of being joined with the huge rural communities around the conurbation? People in the north-west know that Merseyside and Greater Manchester are wholly different communities. I shudder to think what north-west MEPs will do when the referee fails to award Liverpool a clear penalty at Old Trafford. Perhaps some early-day motions will be tabled about that.

Having buried Humberside, the east of the Pennines—the area that I represent—is still stuck with Yorkshire and the Humber. Yorkshire's strong regional identity is not reflected by a region that replicates even the traditional county boundary, as Middlesbrough and Redcar are in the north-east region and parts of north Lincolnshire are still in the same region as Yorkshire and the Humber. Many people living in the North York moors in the northern part of my constituency, with which I know you are familiar, Sir Alan, are more likely to regard Middlesbrough as their regional centre than Leeds.

Those inconsistencies have never been subjected to any independent assessment. That said, the proposed north-east electoral region, with just four MEPs, seems much more logical than some of the huge regional constituencies that are proposed elsewhere. That is the area which the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) represents. The question that the Committee must ask is why, if four is a satisfactory number for the north-east, an average of four—because that is what 18 electoral regions, rather than nine, would mean—is not satisfactory for the rest of the country.

With 80 per cent. of Britain living in urban areas, the urban vote will dominate the outcome of elections. That is why it makes sense for Scotland to be divided into two regions, although I say to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), who I am sure will catch your eye later, Sir Alan, that we do not agree with the suggestion that there should be an extra seat for Scotland at London's expense. What we do say is that the rural voice, about which Conservative Members are so concerned, will be diluted, diminished and downgraded as a consequence of the proposals.

Apart from the geographical distortions that the proposed regional list creates, the degeneration and erosion of the quality of local representation and the undermining of the value of local contacts should be of most concern to the Committee and will be of concern to the country as a whole.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): In the context of the quality of representation and of the consideration of these crucial amendments, does my hon. Friend not think it extremely unfortunate that, in the midst of his speech, only one Liberal Democrat Member is in the Committee?

Mr. Greenway: It is unfortunate, but not surprising—that is the only point I can make.

What will MEPs' power base be if there is no meaningful constituency link? Who will have heard of them, seen them or, for that matter, heard them speak? What contact will people have with them? Where will MEPs hold their surgeries or base their offices? How will voters get in touch with them? No thought appears to have been given to the serious practical and logistical difficulties of MEPs covering such huge areas.

The danger is that extended regional lists will open the door to partisan representation. The Labour voter will go to the Labour MEP and Conservative voters to their Tory representative. I shudder to think what policy successes Liberal Democrat Members will claim in the cause of advancing their political interests—you can bet your life they will claim them, Sir Alan.

How people voted is irrelevant when we, as constituency Members of Parliament, help and represent our communities. That is the fundamental principle of universal representation, which the Bill would undermine. The fact that we represent all the people in our communities enables us to form a wider picture of local experience. Partisan representation will undoubtedly destroy that.

The size of the electoral regions will also lead to inevitable competition between different areas within a region for European Union structural funds or other support or special interest from Brussels. I know that from my own experience. My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) was a Minister in the Department of the Environment when we were bidding for objective 5b funds for North Yorkshire. He will recall that the initial steer we got from the Commission was that the Pennine chain was in, but the North York moors, Scarborough and Whitby were out. If the whole of Yorkshire and the Humber had been represented by the same MEPs, answerable to the same electorate, I cannot imagine that we would have had the sort of lobbying that happened on that occasion to ensure that the North York moors were included in the objective 5b structural fund arrangements.

The size of the proposed electoral regions would mean that MEPs could easily find themselves compromised. In London, for example, it does not take much imagination to see the potential conflict in seeking support for EU funds when the whole of the Greater London area is regarded as one electoral region. A better solution would be for it to be divided into three constituent parts, so that voters would have a stronger identity with their representatives in Brussels and Strasbourg.

A good example of what might happen is that, if funds were available from Brussels for a new rail link or some transport infrastructure, some people might want those in the north-west of London and others in the south-east, to link with Kent. If MEPs are to represent the whole of London in the same way, it will not be a case of cosily working to achieve the objective. As politicians in the real world, we know that we have to lobby for the interests of our constituents. MEPs would be compromised by the scale of what is proposed.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman has not admitted at any stage that the main reason for multi-Member constituencies is proportionality. He has also failed to tell us how the rest of Europe manages, having had, in most cases since the start of the Parliament, MEPs with lists based on much larger systems than those proposed in the Bill.

Mr. Greenway: I dealt with the first point when I said that the proposed electoral region for the north-east, which covers the right hon. Member's constituency, has four representatives. If four is good enough for the north-east, surely four ought to be good enough for the rest of the country.

Frankly, I am not particularly interested in what the rest of Europe does. I am interested in ensuring proper representation in Brussels and Strasbourg for the people in this country. It may interest the right hon. Member to know that I have done some sums. Mathematics was not my best subject, although I got an O-level. However, I am prepared to put this hypothesis up to scrutiny. It is based on the formula in the Bill. We wait to hear whether the Government have changed their mind and want to rethink all that—that will come later in Committee.

By my calculations, if a third party gets a smidgen more than 20 per cent. of the votes cast in a four-Member electoral region, it must, as a natural consequence, get the third or fourth seat. I am happy to distribute the arithmetic. If a party is unable to get 20.001 per cent. of the votes cast by a million or so voters, it does not have much of a claim for saying that proportionality arrangements do not work to its advantage, and it does not deserve representation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): Is my hon. Friend telling the Committee that, for a very minor improvement in proportionality, we will end up with most of the country—in particular, most of England—having MEPs whom no one has voted for by name?

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

Will we end up with people who, if we copy the continental habit, could be swapped in and out by their parties without regard for what the electorate wants? Is that what other parties seriously want? My constituents do not want it. They would prefer to vote for people. They do not mind some mild proportionality, but they want their MEPs to have some link with the local area.

Mr. Greenway: All that my hon. Friend says is correct. In the amendments, we are seeking to bring some small improvement to what can only be described as a rotten system—one which the public will rightly regard with derision at the election next year.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole): The hon. Gentleman said—unless I am misquoting him—that, if a party could not get 20 per cent. of the vote, it was not worthy of representation. I am interested to know what percentage of the electorate he is willing to write off and say should not have representation.

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) resumes, it might be helpful to the Committee if I remind him that this group of amendments deals with electoral regions. Another group deals with voting systems.

Mr. Greenway: Obviously, I will heed your strictures, Sir Alan, but I was not attempting to discuss electoral systems.

The Chairman: I agree. I think that the hon. Gentleman was being goaded, but I hope that he will take my point.

Mr. Greenway: As we are in Committee and not in a normal debate of the whole House, I was simply having the courtesy to give way to all hon. Members who wished to intervene.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I believe that, as things stand, the Government's solution—this is the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) was making—will have an adverse impact on popular respect for the European Parliament.

Brussels is already regarded with a fair degree of suspicion and even hostility. The Parliament itself is seen by many as pointless, wasteful and remote. The extensive regional lists proposed in the Bill seem likely to accentuate that feeling and create further alienation at a time when the European Parliament wants to improve public acceptance and trust and has been given wider responsibilities. It could be argued that the immense scale of the electoral regions would undermine the democratic fabric of the Parliament.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My hon. Friend mentioned the democratic process. That means people. Am I right in believing that this hotch-potch of a Bill, which I strongly oppose, will mean that people will be voting for parties, not people? Under the regional electoral system, not people but a party will be involved. That will remove from the European Parliament any true democratic independence, which is essential for any successful democracy.

Mr. Greenway: As one would expect, my hon. Friend—for whom I have a high regard, as he represents the town where my mother was born—makes his own point, with which I agree, in an extremely robust and telling way. My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) was coaxing me to reply to my hon. Friend's intervention by saying, "For the first time." There is some truth in that, because, if the Bill is passed unamended, elections will be held on that unsustainable basis for the first and the last time.

Ministers are deluded if they believe that any sense of regional or local identity is properly reflected in their preferred regional structure. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what other institutions or organisations—outside Government, and in which contact with the general public is such a crucial element of what they do—operate at that level?

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman agrees that the proposals would do credit to the rule book of the Bulgarian communist party? We might be ending up as delegates in the great hall of the people. When will we get back to democracy? If I have to be the candidate of a closed list of one, I will be—but is it democratic?

Mr. Greenway: We really are having some childhood reminiscences, because the hon. Gentleman represents the place where I—not my mother—was born. For that reason, if for no other, I have been very charitable to him since his election to the House. I agree with his sentiments. The proposals will make it extremely difficult for anyone to take an independent-minded view of any issue. That applies as much to independent candidates, as he was, as to candidates who belong to a party but wish to hold a different view. I sense, Sir Alan, that, because of another intervention, I have been prompted to stray again.

We all know that Ministers, in proposing that regional structure, have an eye to their plan of imposing unnecessary and burdensome regional government in England. However, an imposed regional map—whether for regional government or for regional representation in the European Parliament—that does not command popular support, reflect local identity or in the creation of which people have had no say will not stand the test of time.

The Government could and should have handled the matter differently. They might have published a White Paper—

Mr. Cawsey: There was: our manifesto.

Mr. Greenway: I am coming to that.

In November, the Library—as always—produced an extremely informative paper suggesting that Lord Plant, with Michael Steed, had argued for a White Paper. My understanding is that Lord Plant's views have had a substantial impact on Labour's policy documents.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) indicated assent.

Mr. Greenway: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's confirmation.

In autumn 1997, Lord Steed argued for a White Paper on options for establishing boundaries. However, instead of a White Paper, we got the hotch-potch in the Bill.

The Government should have asked the boundary commission, in the normal way, to examine and consider all the issues and to make representations. The recommendations would then have been subject to proper local consultation in public meetings, and people would have been given a chance to have their say.

Our amendments would provide for that consultation and would allow the boundary commission to develop a solution that is both more sensitive to local wishes and more practical in the delivery of local and regional representation. To allow for a wider consultative process, our amendments would provide a four-month period after the boundary commission's reports had been laid and before implementation of the regional structure—which would itself be subject to affirmative resolution by each House. Amendments Nos. 68 and 69, which relate to schedule 1, are consequential to that proposal.

The future allocation of seats should be decided by the boundary commission rather than by the Secretary of State, as proposed in the Bill. Amendment Nos. 54 to 56 provide for that. The considered view has always been that it is simply not acceptable for the Secretary of State to hold such power over the redistribution of elected representatives.

When the House most recently amended European constituency boundaries, in 1993, the boundary commission's role was thought sufficiently important for the Labour Opposition to table a reasoned amendment, which was moved by the present Prime Minister who was then the shadow Home Secretary. The amendment stated:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the European Parliamentary Elections Bill . . . which does not provide for the Boundary Commission to establish new boundaries with the power to hold public inquiries and proper consultation".

One or two quotations in his speech go to the heart of the proposals in our amendments. He said:

"it will not be the Boundary Commission but a sub-committee appointed by the Home Secretary that will draw up the new boundaries; . . . there will not be the full process of public inquiry that is normally associated with boundary changes. . . it must be done on a proper basis. The reason for having the Boundary Commission draw up the boundaries is obvious—it is independent, it is respected and it has the expertise."—[Official Report, 30 June 1993; Vol. 227, c. 996.]

It is remarkable how things that seemed so important such a short while ago are flagrantly disregarded by the Government when it suits them. However, it is no longer remarkable to find the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary holding seemingly conflicting views on the same issue at the same time.

The Home Secretary's opposition to proportional representation is well known. Earlier in the debate, he had an exchange on the issue with my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire. As we saw only three weeks ago, at the most recent Home Office Question Time, the Home Secretary rather takes pride in his difference with the Prime Minister on the matter.

It is very refreshing that the Home Secretary makes it clear that he does not agree with proportional representation. On more than one occasion, the Prime Minister has let it be known that he would prefer not to destroy the constituency link by introducing PR in any Westminster election. The House and the country should ask whether those views can be trusted when the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary are content for the constituency link to be destroyed in elections to the European Parliament. It is a case of "read my lips."

Our European partners' demand for proportional representation in Euro-elections, or their predilection for a Europe—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is palpably straying into the matter of voting systems, which is the subject of the next group of amendments. He must confine his remarks to the matter of electoral regions.

Mr. Greenway: I thought that I was confining my remarks to the boundary commission—which the Prime Minister clearly thought was so important, but which has been disregarded in the Bill, and is the subject of our amendments.

The imposed solution of regional electoral boundaries has no basis in the United Kingdom. There has been no expression of popular support for that solution that is worthy of the name. I believe that the public will express a view on the electoral regions when they discover just what the Bill would impose on them in regional representation in Europe.

I do not mind if, as a consequence, voters take a dim view of the Government—the Government will deserve all the bad press and unpopularity that the regional lists will generate—but the Committee should have a concern that these vast electoral regions, established not by the boundary commission but by Government diktat in a way that rides roughshod over long-established democratic procedures, will have an adverse impact on popular support for the European Parliament.

The regional structure fails the electorate. It will undermine voters' confidence in the Parliament and in their representatives, because the voters will not have a sufficiently local identification with their MEPs to feel that their views really matter. It is but one further step for electors to conclude that it is pointless even going to the polls.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: In his excellent speech, my hon. Friend has mentioned the north-west region, in which my constituency is located. Can he say to whom constituents of mine should appeal or make representations in respect of a matter relating to the competence of the European Parliament? Should they choose one of the elected Members and make contact with some office and then go there, although it might be 50, 60, 70 or 80 miles away, or should they expect the European assembly Member to come to them?

Mr. Greenway: I suspect that they will go to my hon. Friend, as they do already.

In conclusion, the arrangements for the representation of the United Kingdom—

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): The hon. Gentleman said that he was going to conclude, so I thought that I had better quickly ask the question to which my hon. Friends and I have been awaiting the answer. If the hon.

[Mr. Vernon Coaker]

Gentleman is so opposed to regions, how has he arrived at the figure 18? Is it simply two times nine, an attempt to prove that he can do arithmetic or something?

Mr. Greenway: I could equally ask the hon. Gentleman where the figure nine comes from. The regional rationale is something in which the Government believe, but it is not something which the people of this country have been asked to vote on or say whether they believe in. If the Government were so convinced—

Mr. Cawsey rose—

Mr. Greenway: I shall deal with one intervention at a time.

If the Government are so convinced that this is such a good idea, why not have it put to the boundary commission? What is the rush to do everything in advance of the election next year? Is it because the Government are really seeking a cosy deal with the Liberal Democrats, and are stringing them along so that the Prime Minister can attempt to have the best of both worlds at the next general election?

Ms Quin: The hon. Gentleman just asked where the figure nine comes from. It is the number of Government office regions established by the previous Government.

Mr. Greenway: I am glad that the Minister intervened, because it enables me to point out that those regions were established for entirely different reasons. They were established, as I understand it, to put regional offices closer to the people; they were not established with the idea that they would suddenly become part of some federal system of which the Bill is a precursor. That is why it is so important that we have the matter out now.

Mr. Cawsey: We are still waiting for an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker), who asked about the figure 18. I know that the hon. Gentleman said that sums were not his best subject, but it seems that the best he can come up with is that 18 is nine multiplied by two. Why does the amendment suggest 18 rather than nine, which is the number of regions that the previous Government came up with? Is he seriously saying in response to the Minister that the public can keep in contact with an office in a region but not with several MEPs? That is a nonsensical argument.

Mr. Greenway: With respect, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. The public do not keep in contact with the regional office. Members of Parliament and local authorities certainly do, but the idea that members of the public have the slightest idea about what goes on in their regional Government office beggars belief.

As for the figure of 18, I said earlier that four was the number considered suitable for the north-east, and if we take four as an average, we end up with 18. However, our argument is that we should not be in this position in the first place.

There should have been a White Paper, consultation and an opportunity to discuss what would be a suitable number to balance the needs of having a proportional system, if that is what the Government intend, and of giving smaller parties as well as independent candidates a reasonable chance of winning seats, with the fact that we have always based our democracy on constituency representation, which means local people represented locally by their Members of Parliament.

The arrangements for the representation of the United Kingdom in the European Parliament should not be about carving up the map of Britain to satisfy European sensibilities over voting systems. They should be about satisfying the interests of the British people by ensuring identifiable and accountable local representation in an increasingly important institution. The amendments at least provide an opportunity to take this botched job back to the drawing board and to find a better solution. The interests of our democratic processes demand that we should do so. I commend the amendments to the Committee.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I shall speak to amendments Nos. 71, 72 and 74 which stand in my name and those of my colleagues, but I wish to comment first on the speech by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) because I found some of his remarks very strange and quite incomprehensible.

Part of the House's problem in examining European issues has been the dominance of Euroscepticism in recent years and a lack of commitment to try to make Europe work for the people of this country. If the Conservative party had done more to promote the European Parliament and other European institutions, there would not be so much cynicism among the voters. It ill behoves the Conservative party to treat the electorate as if they were stupid, because the electorate realise the importance of Europe.

The activities of Members of the European Parliament are every bit as important as a commitment to the European ideal. I draw the attention of hon. Members to a Charter 88 briefing, which refers to a later group of amendments, but which also shows that the work of a Member of the European Parliament does make an impact on local people. I must point out that the highest percentage scored by any MEP was that won by my mother-in-law who represents the Highlands and Islands constituency. That constituency is the size of Belgium. I heard the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) complaining about people having to travel 80 miles, but to me that seems like just down the road.

The Highlands and Islands constituency stretches from Muckle Flugga in the north of Shetland down to the Mull of Kintyre in Argyll. The MEP has contact with every constituency Member of Parliament, irrespective of political persuasion, and she holds regular meetings in all the Westminster constituencies. We should encourage such people to stand for the European Parliament to ensure that the message that European institutions are important is disseminated.

Mr. Gill: Why does the hon. Lady criticise my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who is defending the status quo in which Members of the European Parliament relate to a geographical area? Does she not understand that that will disappear under the new system?

Mrs. Ewing: The hon. Member for Ryedale said that Scotland should consist of two regions, but he did not define them or say how that would work. The Conservative party cannot even muster the 20 per cent. of the vote that he referred to—it is very much a minority party in Scotland—so I suspect that he would draw a line through the middle of Scotland and divide us into the highlands and lowlands. A community's identity with its MEP is a two-way street. Communication depends on the commitment of individuals and parties.

Mr. Greenway: The amendments would ensure that the boundary commission decided how Scotland would be divided. I know the hon. Lady's constituency, so I hope that she agrees—I repeat this point—that there is a world of difference between representing the main conurbations and representing the more rural parts of the country.

Mrs. Ewing: I assume, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman will recommend to the boundary commission that the borders and the highlands and islands belong together, with the central belt as the separate region.

As Members of Parliament, we all know the local problems that arise every time there is a boundary commission review. At the general election, I lost a substantial chunk of the Moray constituency, although the area remains within my local authority boundaries. That causes huge confusion; people are upset, because they have formed a particular identity.

The hon. Member for Ryedale said that the link between representatives and the people they represent can arise only through a regional identity, but I do not believe that that is so. He has not taken into account the information that the European institutions provide to communities to ensure that MEPs are more accessible.

We live in a world of information technology but, even in living memory, headlines used to read, "MP to visit constituency"; pipe bands would welcome a Member of Parliament off the train. A former Labour Whip tells the story of a particular hon. Member in the 1960s. The Whip often thought that the Member was in his constituency, while the constituents thought that he was at Westminster; of course, he was in neither place.

Mr. Beith: Was it a Glasgow Member?

Mrs. Ewing: I will not mention names.

Many pompous words are spoken about the link between Members of Parliament and their constituents. Members of Parliament are responsible for building those links when they are elected, through offices, information technology and e-mail or any other method that is open to them. Political parties are responsible for ensuring that top-quality people, who are committed to the European ideal, are selected and put on the list.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Ewing: No. I meant to speak briefly and I have not yet even mentioned the amendments. I apologise, Mr. Martin; as you see, I have become impassioned as a result of some of the remarks made earlier.

Amendments Nos. 71, 72 and 74 are simple; they would require the transfer of an additional seat to Scotland. In 1993, the Labour party voted against the European Parliamentary Elections Bill on Second Reading; the reasoned amendment was tabled by the right hon. Gentleman who is now Prime Minister. Labour Members argued at the time that Scotland should be given one of the six additional seats that were being allotted to the United Kingdom.

Amendments Nos. 71, 72 and 74 are a continuation of the Labour party's 1993 argument. We believe that, because of the nature of Scotland's geography and needs, there should be an additional seat. If one were to cut from an Ordnance Survey map the Westminster constituency of Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber and place it over a map of Greater London, one would see that that one Scottish constituency is larger than the whole of London.

In an independent Scotland—which I want—we would be entitled to 16 seats in the European Parliament, but, in my modest way, I am asking only for one additional seat. I hope that the Government will consider the amendments favourably.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): In determining the correct boundaries in which MEPs should operate, the Committee should consider what their functions are. We should accept that MEPs are not simply different forms of Members of Parliament. Their work is radically different and they should not receive constituents who are concerned with social security, housing or planning—the three staples of the surgery work of Members of Parliament. Generally, MEPs deal with business, education, local authorities and public bodies. A large part of their work is in representing corporate, rather than personal, interests.

The European Parliament is increasingly lobbied by business organisations because of the volume of its regulation and the creation of the single market. Since the days when the Minister and I were MEPs, the volume of work has multiplied enormously. I found that the educational institutions were very anxious to participate in the various educational programmes, which would also be relevant to the constituencies that we are considering. Local authorities and other public bodies were also keen to participate in the European programmes that were available to them.

MEPs do not have to have a Westminster-type constituency to carry out their functions, but they have to employ many of the same methods as Westminster Members of Parliament to be effective. They have to build up links with individual businesses and people. Their clients—if I may use that expression—are often the same people, who come time and again. MEPs need to find out how they tick, and they need to find out how their MEPs operate.

Moreover, when MEPs are lobbying on behalf of those people in Brussels—which, despite all the mythology, is no more than a big county council—and in the other European institutions, they need to be identified with a particular interest; others need to know that they can produce a brief or an argument that is concise and to the point, and has a definitive aim.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be making the case for the regions from which MEPs are to be elected to be conterminous with the regions in which the regional development agencies will be located. That is precisely what the Bill will do. The business matters to which the right hon. Gentleman refers operate at a regional level.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman would have a point if it were not for the fact that, under the proposed system, MEPs will have to compete for the affections of the RDAs—I shall come to that point in a moment.

Current European constituencies are large and—let us be honest—slightly incoherent. Some MEPs represent counties, which have an historical identity, whereas others represent areas carved from different counties, which lack that identity. The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) represents a vast chunk of Scotland, but I suspect that her constituency has a cultural coherence. [Interruption.] I appreciate her anxiety to have an extra seat for Scotland—no doubt for Sean Connery.

Mrs. Ewing: I did not respond immediately because my constituency is divided by the highland line and there is very much an eastern philosophy and a western philosophy. There is coherence, however, and much of it has resulted from local government reorganisation.

Mr. Curry: I can understand the hon. Lady's point of view, as my constituency is divided by the Pennines into Craven and the area east of the Pennines. So, to all intents and purposes, I have to manage two constituencies which are radically different in character. Woe betide any MEP who thinks that my constituency can be treated as one unit.

I now turn to the region that I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway)—Yorkshire and The Humber—which will be represented by seven MEPs. I start at the top left-hand corner of my constituency, on the Cumbrian border at the Ribblehead viaduct. One could not get much more remote. The area is characterised by the occasional train and millions of sheep. It is right in the heart of the Pennine chain. I am strongly in favour of the trains and the sheep, and I have campaigned hard to keep them. Given the present Government's policies, the train has a marginally better chance of surviving than the sheep.

My constituency continues down the Pennine chain, along the Lancashire border to the border of the Bradford city council area and the outskirts of Keighley. I have described half my Westminster constituency. It continues across the Pennines into the Vale of York, effectively to the line of the A1, and circles around Harrogate and through part of the suburbs of Leeds.

I have described just one Westminster constituency. It is difficult enough to represent such a constituency even though it is well defined and Craven has a strong sense of identity. We have to multiply that by seven or more to imagine a multiplicity of MEPs representing an extremely diverse region.

The region would comprise a vast upland area, the old West Riding and South Yorkshire—a textile area and the traditional heartland of Yorkshire, where enormous regeneration programmes have been put in place. It continues across the M62 virtually to the suburbs of Manchester, through South Yorkshire and along to the Humber ports. The region will be represented by a single clutch of MEPs. It is colossally diverse. That is bad enough, but the situation is even worse in the south-west.

I know from experience that Devon and Cornwall are rarely on speaking terms. Cornwall regards itself as wholly distinct from Devon. In a few years' time, the River Tamar may be the only frontier in Europe where passports will still be needed.

Devon and Cornwall have very little in common with Bristol. As has been pointed out consistently, Bristol is closer to London than to the principal points in Cornwall, yet Bristol and Cornwall will both be part of a great region which is very heterogeneous. Devon and Cornwall are lumped together for EU purposes—for example, in terms of getting aid from the European Union—but they are very different. Cornwall has wholly different problems from Exeter. They are much more serious and there is high unemployment. Many people forget that Cornwall is an old industrial county which certainly deserves to stand alone for the reworking of objective 2 assistance in two or three years' time. However, it is proposed to be part of a single constituency.

The prize-winning example is that people who live in Oxford, Gillingham, Canterbury or Southampton, and anyone who lives in or goes on holiday to the Isle of Wight, will be represented by the same clutch of MEPs. That enormous great arc will be deemed part of the same constituency.

The problem is very simple. Who will identify with what, and how will they go about it? If seven MEPs are elected to represent Yorkshire and The Humber, will they sit down and say, "You take this bit, Fred, and I will take that bit. I know the farmers, so I will take the Pennine chain, and as you want an industrial bit, you had better take South Yorkshire"? Will it be a colonial carve-up, with the appointment of divisional governorships of various parts of the region?

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the very heterogeneity that he has described is a strength, because it allows the elected representative to take a much more balanced view than somebody who represents a minority interest? He has just told us that his own constituency is divided by the Pennines—an area with which I am familiar from my childhood. Most of us represent constituencies with diverse parts, but that enables us to take a more balanced view. I do not see how, by describing the area, the right hon. Gentleman is making a case for his amendment.

Mr. Curry: It all depends on what the hon. Lady means by a balanced view. We are elected to represent people, to take their interests to governing bodies and to lobby on their behalf. We lobby in competition with representatives of different regions.

We shall have a heterogeneous set of MEPs because of the way in which things are organised. In most regions, the three principal political parties are likely to be represented. The Labour party will have chosen its candidates at head office, so we know that 80 per cent. of the election will be over for Labour candidates as soon as the apparatchiks have decided on the list. We and the Liberal Democrats have a reasonably democratic means of selection, but if there is a closed list, the election will be over for those at the top and the bottom of the list as soon as the list if published. Only the chap who is fourth on the list will consider it worth while to fight the election. We shall therefore have a heterogeneous team.

A constituent will be able to approach the Labour candidate, the Conservative and the Liberal Democrat and see who does better. That may be good from the point of view of the constituent, but we should consider the poor chap in Brussels who is trying to be helpful. He has to see on succeeding days different delegations of MEPs—or even MEPs from the same delegation—all trying their luck. His patience will soon run out, and the quality of representations will have no credibility.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) made the point about people going to the MEP for whom they voted. However, businesses, public bodies and educational institutions cannot do that, as, for them, party allegiance is not the essence of the matter. How will they determine which MEP to approach?

Mr. Curry: They will be very confused indeed. There is a long tradition in Britain of seeking redress from an individual. The representative puts an individual's case before the men in peaked caps. That is the traditional role of the Member of Parliament.

Mr. Coaker: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman about the problem that he thinks will be generated by a number of MEPs representing one region? In local authorities, wards are often represented by three or four councillors, who may be from different political parties, but it does not seem to be a problem. Many people in those wards see that as an improvement.

Mr. Curry: As the hon. Gentleman will know, representatives on local authorities with multi-member wards are elected individually in annual elections. If that is not the case, it is difficult to see why the Labour party is so enthusiastic in its consultation paper about reorganising, revitalising or reinventing local government about having annual elections in order to exercise some democratic control over local government.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is now addressing the next set of amendments. We are discussing the size of the regions, not the system of voting. If the right hon. Gentleman sticks to the amendments before us, perhaps we can dispose of them and move on to the next subject.

Mr. Curry: I was overcome by the spirit of generosity in trying to reply accurately to the question from the other side of the Committee. The parallel that was put to me is not precise. In local government, one votes for a named person. Under the proposals for the European Parliament, the electorate will be invited to vote for a list. Before the first member of the public casts the first vote on election day, we shall know the names of 80 per cent. of those who will turn up in the European Parliament.

7.30 pm

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) displays his lack of understanding by seeking to equate a local government ward, in which two or three named representatives are elected to cover perhaps 8,000 or 10,000 voters, with a new European electoral region with up to 11 MEPs representing up to 5 million people? There is no comparison.

Mr. Curry: That is the point.

Mr. Coaker: The principle is the same.

Mr. Curry: There is no point in telling the electorate, "I am sorry. I cannot do this. What really matters is the principle." The voters are interested in one's ability to deliver. That is what Members of Parliament exist for. That is even more true in the European Parliament, which is a consultative body with a powerful legislative role. There is a more consensual principle in the European Parliament—we can argue about whether that is a good idea—where the two principal groups tend to vote together to get a majority more frequently than here. With the political dividing lines being less strong than here, the role of the individual is more important.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): If the principle is what counts, would a facility to vote for individual candidates remove the right hon. Gentleman's objections to the electoral regions?

Mr. Curry: If I were stuck with a bad system and wanted to make the best of it, I would infinitely prefer to be able to cast a vote for a named candidate. When we come to that point, I hope that the Home Secretary, whose heart is not in the Bill—any more than his body is at the moment—will agree that it would be sensible to move towards such a system. You will get irritated with both of us, Mr. Martin, if we persist on that, so I shall move on.

It has been suggested that the proposals are sensible because the Government offices for the regions and the regional development agencies cover those areas. However, they do so by different processes. The Government offices were put in the regions because they had been based in London with a series of disparate outposts in the regions before. They were consolidated there to create a greater coherence so that bodies that needed to deal with them had a one-stop shop and could go to one person to deal with a range of problems. That system has been successful, but the argument cannot be extrapolated to the European Parliament.

We are now to have regional development agencies conterminous with the Government regions. The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning has said that there will have to be a sub-structure in the regions so that Devon and Cornwall, for example, feel that they have their say. We finished the Committee stage of the Regional Development Agencies Bill today, so I am fairly au fait with the issue. The Minister has implicitly acknowledged that we cannot put people under a great millennium-type tent and assume that everyone will find their corner in it. There is no argument for duplicating the situation for MEPs.

We shall eventually have regional assemblies, although that agenda has been heavily postponed. The Deputy Prime Minister was keen on them to start with, but he has retreated on the idea now. They are promised for a future Parliament. All the local councils busily packed their bags and waited, rather like commuters standing on the station only to be told that the train has been cancelled.

[Mr. Curry]

Who will represent whom? Will the MEPs carve the area up by geography? Will they carve it up by function, with one taking industrial issues, another taking agricultural issues and others—there are bound to be plenty from the education establishment—taking responsibility for education and training matters? The electorate will not have been consulted on any of that.

Mr. Drew: I am pleased that the right hon. Gentleman has gone on to education. He has already mentioned business. Does he accept that it is not just the Government who work on a regional level? There are regional branches of the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress. Higher education establishments are looking for a regional role. It is a myth to pretend that only the Government have a regional emphasis. The proposals will link in directly with those organisations.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman has missed the fact that being a Member of Parliament or a Member of the European Parliament is like being a doctor, a vet or a parson—we are never off duty. We have to be accessible. People come to us and ask us to do something for them. Accessibility and identity are crucial to being able to deliver what constituents want. A group of MEPs without a local base, possibly competing with each other and ordered by the party rather than the voters—unless the mechanism is changed—will not have the accessibility that I believe is necessary. There is also a danger of inefficient lobbying, with a multiplicity of MEPs falling over themselves and creating the impression—or reflecting the reality—of incoherence.

The examples of other member states do not give us a great clue. I remember dining with my Irish colleagues in the European Parliament. I did not get the impression that there was a surplus of charity when we discussed colleagues with whom they shared a constituency. They found it a bothersome business. Given the chance to get away from the situation, they would have done so. The great problem in Belgium was the linguistic divide, which was a touchstone for many issues.

No one would want the French national list system commended to him. Each faction of each party is reflected on the list. Those who are above No. 17 are home and dry and those who are below No. 23 have no chance. They can all go off to the Bahamas during the election campaign. Only the handful in the middle fight the election. The system is open to massive abuse and is regularly so abused because all the great and the good of the parties stand at the head of their list, get into the European Parliament and then resign a couple of weeks later so that someone else can take their place. Offering oneself for election with the specific intention of standing down for someone else is an abuse of the electorate. That is not the democracy that we have practised in the United Kingdom.

I do not take the view that all forms of proportionality are, by some biblical truth, wrong. We should consider different forms of representation. However, let us be honest. We have two Governments: one here and another—although we do not call them a Government—in Brussels. There is dual sovereignty. Access for the ordinary elector to that other Government, from whom many of the decisions that affect our lives flow, should be as ready as access to the national Government.

The institutions are not necessarily formidable. I have described the European Commission as like a big county council, but more open. The European Parliament is increasingly used by those who want to lobby. The various other European institutions are also surprisingly open. It is a mistake to think of the institutions as an alien power which is entirely closed.

The risk is that we shall make access more difficult, make the institutions more impenetrable, remove the electors from their representatives and remove the representatives from a means of effectively representing those who have elected them. That is why the proposed system is wrong. I support the amendment as a modest attempt to make it a little better.

Mr. Beith: At least the word "proportionality" passed the lips of the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). It barely passed the lips of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), whose heart is not in his amendments. He talked about the Home Secretary's heart not being in the Bill, but the hon. Gentleman really wants to go back to the present system, with a closed list of one and no proportionality.

One knows what the outcome of the election will be in a large number of constituencies—in which parties can place their people—because the system relies on the scale of the party vote. Many of the constituencies are in areas where, such is the distribution of votes, the outcome could be pretty well known from the start. Who gets the nomination gets the seat. It is a closed list of one. The electorate cannot interfere with that without voting against the party.

The hon. Member for Ryedale is seeking to go halfway back to such a system by halving the size of constituencies. The consequence would be to reduce drastically the potential for a proportional result. The hon. Gentleman has gone on and on about poor voters who cannot decide which of the selection of Members of the European Parliament from different parties to go to. Electors are being given a choice. To the hon. Gentleman, the poor elector being unable to decide that matter is far worse than the elector discovering that the votes that he and many tens of thousands of other people cast counted for nothing because nobody was elected as a result of those votes.

The present system produces a result in which vast numbers of people are disfranchised either because their party nationally has no seats, despite getting 10 or 15 per cent. of the vote, or because it has no seats in a whole area or a whole part of the country. The Conservative party now finds itself in the latter position in Scotland under the Westminster system.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Beith: I hope that Conservative Members will keep fairly quiet, because their party leader has been making a speech across the road, evincing a new and more open-minded approach to constitutional issues. By the time they read their speeches tomorrow, they might have to rethink some of the things that they said. Perhaps, however, the Leader of the Opposition has exempted from his new constitutional approach any assessment of the rights of voters to have the way in which they voted represented in the results of elections in which they have taken part. That is denied under the present system.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): The right hon. Gentleman and I have a similar attitude towards our constituencies and our concern to represent them, and—I think—have a reputation for doing so. Is it not at least conceivable that a kind of disfranchisement arises in a very large constituency in which candidates are very much directed by the list, which can be controlled by a party?

The right hon. Gentleman referred to a person being put into a constituency. I do not know what happens in the Liberal Democrat party, but if a Conservative were put into a constituency in such a way, he would soon be at the bottom of the list that was selected. Can the right hon. Gentleman not see that there is disfranchisement in huge constituencies?

Mr. Beith: The current European Parliament constituencies are huge; that is their nature. I cited the example of the Scotland South constituency. A few miles up the road from where I live is the fishing town of Eyemouth on the east coast of Scotland. The MEP for Eyemouth is also the MEP for Ayr on the west coast of Scotland. The constituency is vast. There is no way in which one can conceive of it as one does a Westminster constituency. It is simply not a natural grouping. It is the result of trying to put together numbers sufficient to fit the system with a single-Member constituency.

To change from that system to one in which electors' votes can be fairly reflected in the outcome with a range of Scottish representatives—to which they should have been able to contribute through the open list system, allowing them to influence the order—would lead to the votes that they have cast, whether as Liberal Democrats in the borders, Scottish nationalists, Labour supporters or Conservative supporters, securing proportional representation within the European Parliament's Scottish representation. That is a prize worth having.

Mr. Bercow: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is unsatisfactory for him to suggest that the existing system is bad and relatively unrepresentative when, as we point out, the proposed system would be a great deal worse? My MEP is a perfectly estimable individual, but how will he be able formally to represent 5 million people as effectively as he does now when he is responsible simply for the representation of 500,000 people?

Mr. Beith: I want to develop the way in which I think that Members work in multi-Member constituencies. On not one occasion during the past 18 years—I have been in the House throughout—has the Conservative party sought to remove the multi-Member constituency in Northern Ireland that elects by the single transferable vote. The Conservative party takes the view that it is perfectly reasonable for three Northern Ireland MEPs, representing three different sets of views in the community, to represent Northern Irish urban and rural issues—Belfast and the rural areas have very different issues—in the European Parliament. Not once have I seen an amendment from the Conservatives to change that system.

Nor in the experience of the Republic of Ireland, or, for that matter, in some of the other European countries, have MEPs found it impossible to represent key groups and interests in those countries. We would hardly have to work out ways of lobbying more effectively if we thought that MEPs throughout the rest of Europe were crippled by proportional representation systems and rendered unable to represent various parts of their country effectively. It is absolute nonsense to make that claim. We know that they are capable of using the European Parliament effectively to represent various interests in their countries.

Mr. Greenway: The right hon. Gentleman is making a good point with which in many respects I do not disagree, but Northern Ireland has slightly fewer than 1.2 million voters and three MEPs. That suggests that our proposal for 18 regions in which there would be an average of four Members ought to be supported.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman ought to know that, if a constituency set an average of four Members, a disproportionate result would be produced. An even more disproportionate result could be achieved by having single-Member constituencies—the present system demonstrates that.

The choice of a regional level for constituencies is appropriate because, by and large, it produces big enough constituencies to secure proportionality, and the constituencies relate to other activities and institutions which also operate at a regional level. Most of the institutions with which we deal—not just Government institutions—from the CBI to the Churches operate on a regional basis. They know that they have to do so particularly at European level. Indeed, in dealing with Europe, regional representation has been most extensively developed outside government by organisations which see it as necessary in order to put their case in Europe.

Mr. Lansley: To bring the right hon. Gentleman back to his own region, under the Government's proposal, the north-east would have four MEPs. Is he saying that he does not regard that as sufficiently proportional? What does he propose should be done for the north-east of England?

Mr. Beith: I do not think that the outcome is satisfactory, but it is the direct result of using Government office regions. It is not satisfactory from the standpoint of proportionality. If it were repeated across the country, there would be a very disproportional result—but it is not repeated across the country. I am rather intrigued that Conservative Members should keep quoting the north-east as an example of an ideal size of constituency, when they have tabled an amendment that would change it by incorporating Cumbria and making it a five-Member constituency. From a proportional point of view, that would have advantages, but I see the Government's logic in attaching parliamentary constituencies to the regions which exist for so many other purposes.

Right hon. and hon. Members who try to treat European constituencies just like a Westminster constituency do not understand either how the European Parliament works or the need to secure proportionality in the result. The one Member who came closest to an understanding of the European Parliament was the one with some experience of it, the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon. He made some quite sensible comments about how that body functions and what can be achieved through it.

[Mr. Beith]

In assembling the list that parties first put before the electorate—bearing in mind the fact that the electorate should be able to influence it—they will need to secure candidates from various parts of the region, or they will deprive themselves of votes. If they ignore the scale of the region in which the election takes place, they will cut off their noses to spite their faces and undermine their ability to win votes.

The idea that, in a larger region, MEPs either cannot work together or will be destroyed by competition comes strangely from the lips of Conservative Members. I thought that Tories were in favour of competition and of people realising that they had to test their ability to do things against what others were doing. People who think that, in the House, there are not tensions and disagreements and competition between hon. Members must be unaware of what is going on around them.

Members can and will co-operate and work together. Members will go in joint deputations on behalf of a region. There will also be an element of competition in wanting to show voters that they are doing the best possible job and ought to get extra support when the next election comes along, and win personal votes in the system that I shall advocate in the debate on the next group of amendments.

Can that be unhealthy? What could be more unhealthy than the present system, where Members believe, under the closed list of one, that the only determinant of whether they get re-elected is whether they get the party nomination for a seat at the next election? If that is the only determinant, there is no pressure to produce the best possible performance for the electorate or to show independence of mind from time to time. Multi-Member constituencies where there is an element of competition increase the likelihood of Members exercising some independence.

The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) talked about the prospects of an additional seat for Scotland. Her argument has often been advanced generally and inapplicably, as if Scotland consisted wholly of its remote and thinly populated areas, which have a very particular case for representation. Under the present Westminster system, that has led to the over-representation of densely populated urban areas, such as much of Glasgow. Scotland's case must be examined in a more sophisticated way. The hon. Lady has a fair point. The appropriate way to consider it—here I come to other Conservative amendments—is through a subsequent boundary commission. It would be much better, after the next European elections, for a boundary commission to review the boundaries between seats.

I am not happy with the idea that the representation of Scotland and Wales should be permanently fixed. Wales could be disadvantaged by that. If anything, there is a possibility that the number of Welsh seats will be reduced and the number of Scottish seats increased by one. The appropriate body to deal with that is a boundary commission rather than the Secretary of State.

There is an overriding reason why the Government were right to make provision in the Bill for the next elections. If they had not, they would have put at risk the ability to offer a fair system of voting at the next European elections. It is reasonable to use an accelerated process to secure that, but I recommend that subsequently, instead of the Secretary of State reviewing such matters, we should have a boundary commission able to review not only the boundaries of English constituencies but the number of seats for Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful for the opportunity to add briefly to an interesting debate which has illustrated some of the problems that will arise in relation to the very large regions. The provisions are another example of the principle whereby if any institution, particularly an institution of government, that is created for one purpose is applied to another, a law of unintended consequences comes into force. In this case, that will be to the detriment of accountability and of the representation of the electorate of the European Parliament.

I will not labour the points made by my right hon. and hon. Friends. I take the points made about the character of Members of the European Parliament. I have not been one, but it is clear from my visits to the European Parliament that its Members do not deal with quite the same range of interests day by day with which we deal in this place, which often arise from constituency concerns. They are often representatives who, in addition to their geographical representation, have a functional specialisation in the European Parliament. However, as representatives of a European constituency, it is of continuing importance that they should be available to an elector on the basis of that elector's particular interest.

It will serve Members badly if electors find that, when they ask Members to take up a case, they are told only that their Member's functional specialism is different. Electors will argue that they elected the Member to be their representative to the European Parliament, and want their line of argument to be followed.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is an argument between politicians who favour believing that people want proportionality and the people, who want access to their local Member of Parliament? My experience is that even a person who had voted Conservative would prefer to go to a Member of Parliament of a different party who was locally available than be proportionally represented. Most people regard that as a distant concept.

Mr. Lansley: I agree with my right hon. Friend. That is a worrying potential development which arises from the Bill's structure. I hope that—I know that this is so of me and my neighbours in Cambridgeshire—we have always taken it as axiomatic that, although we were elected as representatives of a political party, we sit as representatives of the whole electorate. We therefore would not expect people to come to us on the basis of party allegiance or, notwithstanding the customs of the House which would preclude it, go to another party's representative in another constituency. We would all deprecate that, but that could be the outcome of the Bill.

People will tend to regard someone from their party as their representative rather than the person elected to the European Parliament to serve a whole area.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: I am glad to give way to my neighbour in Cambridgeshire.

Mrs. Campbell: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that I get many letters from his constituents, who write to me because I am a Labour Member? I presume that he gets quite a large number from my constituents who write to him because he is a Conservative Member. People feel allegiance to the party for which they have voted. Our system does not allow us to overcome that. I normally send such letters to him if people want problems solved, but if they ask my opinion, I freely give it. I assume that he does that, too.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we can get back to the amendments, which concern the size of the region rather than party allegiance.

Mr. Lansley: The size of the region has some bearing on all this. There is a media relationship involved. The hon. Lady and I inhabit, as it were, the same media. Inevitably, when she says one thing and I say another, people will respond to one of us. That is fine in respect of opinions, but the convention by which we operate in the House—that we should deal with people in our constituencies and not deal with cases from constituents of other Members—serves well in dealing with public bodies and in determining who has the responsibility to pursue a constituency case through to its conclusion. There is no sense in which any of us can wash our hands of that.

Mr. Allan: Is the hon. Gentleman not guilty of confusing the role of MPs with that of MEPs? MEPs principally represent wider interests in Europe, rather than taking up individual constituency cases as we do.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, which brings me to my next point. I recognise that there is a difference. In Cambridgeshire, we are well served by our Member of the European Parliament.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: We never see him.

Mr. Lansley: To pursue the point that I was making—

Mrs. Campbell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Lady is presuming a little in asking me to give way a second time. Before I do, I want to make this point clearly.

Members of the European Parliament are different in that they often adopt a functional specialism alongside their responsibility as geographical representatives. The Member of the European Parliament for Cambridgeshire pursues his role as spokesman on agriculture for his group, the European People's party, in the European Parliament. For the county that he represents, there is a good fit between his functional specialism and his geographical role as an MEP.

Mr. Bercow: Unless I misunderstood or misheard the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell)—if I did, no doubt she will correct me—when my hon. Friend was speaking about the great merits of his local MEP, she exclaimed from a sedentary position, "We never see him." Is that or is that not an ironic commentary? Under these massive, unwieldy and unsuitable electoral regions, will she not see even less of that excellent MEP in future than in the past?

Mr. Lansley: I am going to give way to the hon. Lady, but, before I do so, I should say that, if that is indeed the point that she is going to make, it is wholly unjustified. Notwithstanding my hon. Friend's point, I believe that, given that my local MEP is representing a large area—larger than Greater London—with a population of half a million, he does extraordinarily well at being seen around the county. However, I shall happily give way to the hon. Lady if she wants to dispute that.

8 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell: It is enormously valuable to have all those points made in speculation of what I am going to say, but I have to say that the current MEP representing Cambridgeshire is not seen frequently in the constituency, unlike some of the neighbouring MEPs who are frequently seen in their constituencies. I suspect that that is partly because he has a farm in Yorkshire and spends most of his time there and not in Cambridgeshire.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are definitely going wide of the amendments.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Lady and I are bound to disagree on that matter, but I am sure that I could present an enormous amount of testimony to the effect that the MEP for Cambridgeshire is often seen in his constituency and is much appreciated for what he does there.

A point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) bears emphasising. Several Labour Members appeared not to understand why the amendments are structured so as to increase to 18 the number of electoral regions, but the reason is quite straightforward, although it is not simply a case of taking nine regions and doubling their number.

If it is acceptable, as has been illustrated in debate, for proportionality to be achieved in Northern Ireland by reference to three MEPs and in the north-east by reference to four MEPs, it is perfectly possible for proportionality to be more readily achieved across the country with, on average, four MEPs per constituency. It has been amply shown in the debate that, when one reaches the point of having eight MEPs for the eastern region, or 10 in the north-west, or 11 in the south-east, one sees that, in pursuit of very marginal increments in proportionality, one has dramatically increased the distance and lack of shared representational factors within the electoral regions one has constructed.

We are simply trying to balance, on the one hand, the desire to have electoral regions that have a degree of commonality of interests and purpose, against, on the other hand, the principle of the Bill established on Second Reading, that there should be proportionality. We are not trying, by way of amendment, to undermine the whole purpose of the Bill and go back to single-Member constituencies; we are trying to strike that balance. To have eight or more MEPs representing the south-east, or London, or the north-west or the eastern region—with the idea that such areas have a commonality of interests that are susceptible to coherent representation in the European Parliament—is to create areas that are too big.

We have to strike the balance at a lower level and I subscribe to the view expressed in the amendments, that the balance is better struck at the level of three, four or possibly five MEPs per constituency. Five should be the maximum number of MEPs—for example, in Wales, although there may be those who say that it would be difficult to represent in the European Parliament the commonality of interests between south and north Wales.

One then comes to the question of how to structure the electoral regions. If not on the basis of the Government office for the region, on what basis should it be done? As my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale made clear, it is determined by the boundary commission and is built up from local authority areas and so on, but, in a sense, that illustrates the relationship between the size of electoral regions and the impact on the politics of those who are elected.

If, starting with a blank sheet of paper, we were to design electoral regions that would make sense for the purposes of European Parliament elections, we would probably do that on the basis of media maps, rather than administrative maps, because, come the elections, we would be looking for candidates who could represent themselves and make an impact on a large electorate. The extent to which administrative regions cohere with the media map is rather limited in certain areas of the country. It would be difficult to correlate Meridian's television broadcasting area with the administrative regions when considering its impact in the south-east and south-west. It might be easier to do that in respect of Anglia Television, which covers East Anglia, but harder in respect of Central Independent Television or Yorkshire Television.

Those media maps are significant because, if we are trying to achieve a more effective system of electoral representation, having a geographical structure that matches the context within which the campaign will be fought—through the media, as that is the best way to communicate personalities, ideas and issues—would be an advantage. It would make more sense to relate the geographical structure to the media map than to the administrative convenience of Government Departments or standard statistical regions which are not created for electoral purposes. The Government are displaying a lack of imagination, because in pursuit of administrative convenience they may have missed the point if what they are trying to achieve is not only proportionality but a sense of involvement in, and understanding of, the European Parliament.

When creating large electoral regions, one changes the character of the opportunity for minority parties and independents. Notwithstanding the speech by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) earlier in the debate, I believe that there is a balance to be struck when creating large electoral regions which will offer opportunities for minority party representation. The point can be reached where one is contemplating some extremely narrow interests being represented in the European Parliament.

In the south-east, if someone were able to make an impact through the national media and acquire just 10 per cent. of the votes cast—remember that, on past precedent, turnout has been only 36 or 37 per cent., so I am talking about only 3 or 4 per cent. of the total electorate—that person might have sufficient votes to win a seat in the European Parliament. That might give some people cause for concern.

Mr. Drew: I am slightly confused—perhaps the hon. Gentleman will elucidate. My understanding is that all the minority parties are in favour of the regional list system: not only parties represented in this place, but others—in particular, the Green party. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he is against that, and so in favour of those parties being excluded for ever, or is he saying that he feels that they will be excluded because of the system that we will have? The minority parties do not think that they will be excluded; they think that they will have a better chance.

Mr. Lansley: I am sure that the minority parties do feel that they will have a better chance. My point is that, if one is going to have proportionality, one has to do it through multi-Member constituencies that give minority parties that can gain the support of a substantial minority—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not enjoy interrupting hon. Members, but we are drifting into a discussion about the system of voting, rather than talking about the size of the regions, which is the subject of the amendments.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to you, Mr. Martin, but I hope that you will let me explain my point.

The size of the regions is relevant in this respect only: the larger the region, the smaller the proportion of the electorate that can justify the election of a minority party or, indeed, an independent with a particular appeal. Unfortunately—I wish that it were otherwise—we are talking about elections where the turnout may be as low as 40 per cent. or less. For example, 4 per cent. of the electorate in London may elect a Member to the European Parliament. I do not dispute what the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) has said: minority parties may be in favour of that system. However, from a public policy point of view, there is a limit to how far we should go in that direction.

Everything points to striking a balance. The current balance is not correct in some very large regions, although it may be all right in some of the smaller regions. If we were to pursue the amendments, we could certainly strike a better balance.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I shall be brief, as many of my hon. Friends wish to contribute to the debate.

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) is interesting, in that it proposes taking a seat from London and giving it to Scotland. Under the first-past-the-post system, it is possible to take account of remote geographical regions. The distribution of boundaries under the current system allows Scotland to have quite large seats but a lower quota.

The relationship between the respective countries in the Union is relevant when considering this amendment. According to the Library, England represents 83.3 per cent. of the electorate; Scotland, 9 per cent.; Wales, 5 per cent.; and Northern Ireland, 2.7 per cent. The Scottish nationalists are trying to pinch a seat from England. A 71-seat allocation gives England 81.6 per cent. of the electorate, which means that we are under-represented. Seventy-two seats gives England 82.75 per cent. of the electorate, which means that we are still under-represented—but at least we would be approaching quota. England would be over-represented if we had 73 seats.

Mrs. Ewing: Under the 1993 settlement for the European parliamentary elections, the average Scottish electorate comprised 491,000 people. The figure for England was 512,000. Without the highlands and islands, the figure for Scottish electorates is 511,000. There is not the huge difference that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Syms: "Proportionality" is a word which seems to fall from many people's lips. We are discussing the relationship between the countries of the Union and how seats in the European Parliament are allocated. This Bill is based on the principle of proportionality. England is currently allocated 71 seats but, on the basis of electoral size, it should be allocated 72 seats. We may even have a claim to 73 seats. Therefore, the Scottish Nationalists' proposal to take a seat north of the border, thereby creating further under-representation in England, is not exactly fair.

I return to my original point. The first-past-the-post system allows for sparsity to some extent. However, under a proportional system, we must allocate seats in terms of electoral size. We should begin not by subtracting a seat from England and giving it to the Scots, but by reconsidering the allocation of seats and adding one to England to ensure that it is properly represented.

Turning to the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), the key point is that there are quite large differentiations in the regional lists at present. That creates great unfairness. There is a 25 per cent. quota for Wales but only a 10 per cent. or 11 per cent. quota to win in the south east. That will skew the nature of political competition. Someone like Sir James Goldsmith would not stand for election in Wales because there is no chance of receiving 25 per cent. of the vote. However, someone like him might stand in the south-east or north-west of England where the quota level and breakthrough point is much lower.

If we are to have fairness in politics, there must be a relationship between the regions in terms of size—otherwise we will skew the nature of nominations. All the odds and sods will congregate principally in the north-west and the south-east of England where their prospects of victory are good, and none will stand for election in Wales. As the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale suggest, the boundary commission could address that problem. Size is important under the proportional system.

I draw the attention of the Committee to the situation in southern Ireland, where the Government draw the boundaries. Some gerrymandering occurs under that system. Extra seats may be determined by whether there are three, five or seven-member wards. There is an old Irish tradition that the party in government—it does not matter whether it is Fine Gael, the Labour party or another major party—always rejigs the boundaries in terms of numbers in order to give that party a slight advantage.

Under this Bill, the Home Secretary retains the power to rejig the system. I have no doubt that the present Home Secretary is an honourable man who will act fairly. However, I am not sure about future Home Secretaries.

Mr. Cawsey: Not former Home Secretaries.

Mr. Syms: That is an interesting point.

The advantage of the boundary commission is that it examines issues independently. It will receive representations from communities, local authorities and other bodies and allows for the exercise of some logic.

At the sharp end of such inquiries—numbers always come into play—there is always concern that things might not gel. However, the system is logical, and I do not think that these boundaries have been drawn logically. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale mentioned having regions of four. I believe that we could have regions of three or five, depending on the circumstances. The boundary commission could examine the matter sensibly and rationally. The European elections are some way off and it is not beyond the wit of the boundary commission to examine the arrangements before then.

Mr. Gummer: If we do not have a boundary commission, the boundaries are based on the Government regions. In the south-east, it was expected that bodies and organisations could travel from any part of that area to London. In the context of elections, we are talking about people. I hope that people are not expected to travel across the south-east to London. As it is extremely difficult to travel across the south-east—and there are similar difficulties in the eastern region—it will be very difficult for ordinary people. Does my hon. Friend agree that the boundary commission should consider that matter because it will be concerned with people rather than parties? This Bill appears to be concerned with parties rather than people.

Mr. Syms: My right hon. Friend makes a good point: the boundary commission can take a broader view and consider local interests. One of the strengths of the current system—although the seats are too large—is that an elected member of the European Parliament can deal with local authorities and other organisations. The boundary commission would allow a range of bodies, from trade unions to businesses, to make representations.

Mr. Bercow: Further to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said a moment ago, does my hon. Friend not think that it is significant that, in the course of our discussion, no Labour, Liberal Democrat or Scottish National party Members have countered the original point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) in his opening speech: that there is no obvious common interest between the constituent parts of many new electoral regions? If there is such a commonality of interest, why have hon. Members failed in the past 90 minutes to identify what it is?

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I am sure that, if the Government conceded the principle of the boundary commission, people could express their views about which regions they should be in and how representation should be provided. In politics one must be seen to be doing the right thing. Keeping the matter within the Home Office is not seen to be playing the game in British politics. It is sensible for the task to be carried out independently by an organisation set up for that purpose, which can listen to representations and set out a logical framework for the distribution of regions across the United Kingdom.

I hope that the Minister will listen to the Opposition arguments on this important point. When the principal Opposition party and other Opposition parties support the principle of an independent boundary commission, it would be a serious matter for the Government to turn their back against the proposal and say that the Home Office knows best, and that everything is set and sealed.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) made a good argument about the media areas throughout the country. We all know, especially MEPs who tend to be a little more remote, that it is important to be able to go to a local radio or television station to get people to know us. Most boundaries for television areas do not correspond with constituency boundaries.

There are further practical problems. It is difficult to get across many of the regions. MEPs will come back from Brussels and have to be in Penzance one day, in Poole the next day, and then perhaps in Stroud. I thought that we did not want MEPs to be driving around and spending a great deal. We will have extremely peripatetic Members of the European Parliament running around vast areas and trying to have an impact.

We all understand the point about geographical size. I have a relatively compact constituency. Some hon. Members with constituencies of 200 or 300 square miles find difficulty in getting around.

Mrs. Ewing: That is very small.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Lady says from a sedentary position that 200 or 300 square miles is small. Perhaps it is, compared with the highlands.

Mr. Gill: Does my hon. Friend agree that the new MEPs will not chase round those huge constituencies? They will not be accountable to the people because they will be able to make so many excuses about having to be somewhere else. A further problem is that there is no means of getting rid of a bad MEP under the system proposed by the Government. Is that not the final indictment of it?

Mr. Syms: I agree with my hon. Friend, but the key point is that, if we can reduce the number of MEPs for the regions from 11s and 10s to threes, fours or fives, we would have a definable area where an MEP could have a fixed office. With that number of MEPs, people might even know the name of the MEP who represents them, or be able to find a Member of Parliament or a local council that knows the name of the representative.

If we look at the size of some of the proposed regions and add up the number of local authorities in them, it is clear that that will cause problems. Local authorities have considerable dealings with MEPs.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) stressed the importance of regions. There is indeed a regional role, but local authorities are also important. MEPs may be dealing with 20 or 30 different local authorities, which may have different priorities and may want the MEP to turn up to support a particular project. Tremendous problems are bound to arise.

To summarise, I do not believe that the regions are drawn in a sensible and logical way. I support my hon. Friends' amendments calling for an independent boundary commission to examine them. If we must have a proportional system, although I dislike it, I think that constituencies with three, four or five MEPs would be more acceptable and would at least be an attempt to maintain a geographical relationship between MEPs and their constituents. That would be a great improvement.

As I argued earlier, I believe that England is under-represented in the proposals. If proportionality is supposed to be the flavour of the month, is it not a little rum that we are starting off by allocating 71 seats to England, rather than 72?

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I support my hon. Friends' amendments to reduce the size of Euro-constituencies and to task the boundary commission with the duty of allocating the electoral regions.

We should all be worried about the lack of identification of the people of the United Kingdom with the rest of Europe. Other continental countries do have an identification with the ideal of Europe. France, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands, marched over three times in the past 130 years, look to Europe as a guarantor of their democracy. Spain can still remember Franco, Portugal can still remember Salazar, Germany is conscious of its aggressive history, and Italy has its own problems. All those countries look to Europe as a guarantor of their democracy and their prosperity.

At the critical moment in our history, we did not regard Europe as our guarantor. In 1940 we stood alone, and we tend to identify still with the United States and Canada. The problem is still one of identification with Europe.

Representation in the European Assembly was originally by Members of Parliament and Members of the other place. Direct elections changed that, and Members of the European Parliament made considerable efforts to establish links with their own areas. I accept that most members of the public do not know the name of their MEP, but those who do need to know it can find out. They will find that their MEP has a geographical responsibility—a duty of care.

In Wight and South Hampshire we have a sense of unity of purpose. The coastal belt, the M3, the A3, the M27 roads, access to ports at Portsmouth and Southampton, Solent, Spithead, the Isle of Wight—we have a sense of identity in that Euro-constituency and with a larger area, but that would not be the case with an area that stretched from Kent to Milton Keynes, to Oxfordshire, West Sussex and the Isle of Wight. That would take in far too large an area.

In addition to their functional roles, MEPs have a geographical responsibility. That is one of their strengths and one of the advantages that gives us a sense of identification with the European Parliament. With proportional representation in large constituencies, a constituent might apply to an MEP in his own party or, more dangerously, he might apply to different MEPs from different parties, playing one off against the other and trying to find one who will assist his cause if others will not.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that the position is worse than that? No individual MEP would be responsible for that constituent. Once we move away from the single-member system, that problem arises. Constituencies must at least be small enough for people to know when MEPs do not do their job properly. With eight, nine, 10 or 11 MEPs, several will be unavailable to anybody. We must know to whom they are available, in order to know to whom they are responsible.

Mr. Viggers: Indeed. In very large Euro areas such as the south-east, where there will be 11 MEPs, I expect that the older and grander MEPs will seek to delegate responsibility for looking after such minor parochial matters to MEPs further down the list. The only thing that will matter will be to get themselves well up on the list to start with.

The practical implications of choosing European candidates has not been discussed. Despite the stories that we have heard about the large Euro-constituencies in Scotland, in the south and south-east of England the Euro-constituencies tend to be sufficiently close to each other for people to know one another at constituency chairman and constituency officer level. There can be a commonality of purpose in choosing a candidate.

Let us consider the problems of choosing the candidates for the south-east where there will be 11 seats. In the south-east area, the Conservative party is trying anxiously to fulfil the aims of true democracy and one person, one vote. There is to be a large meeting in docklands in the east end of London, which as far as my constituents in Gosport are concerned, might well be on the dark side of the moon.

As has been pointed out by my excellent constituency chairman, Commander Geoff Bartlett, he and his officers are deeply concerned that the candidacy of our excellent and exceptionally able MEP, Roy Perry, is unfairly penalised in what cannot be a level playing field, when the remote associations such as Gosport and the Isle of Wight will not be proportionally represented by having ready access to the open meeting in docklands. He says that it is unreasonable to expect constituents from Gosport to travel by bus, coach or train to docklands to take part in a selection procedure over, perhaps, a 15-hour day, involving reading the CVs of many candidates and then deciding among them. It would be physically impossible for constituents to know the candidates.

8.30 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): My hon. Friend is making a point that is directly relevant to the size of the electoral regions. At least in the Conservative party we are trying to introduce an element of one-member, one-vote democracy. The Labour party wishes to entrench on the statute book a system that works only with Stalinist centralism—[Interruption.]

Mr. Viggers: My hon. Friend is right. Once this constitutional Pandora's box is opened, we do not know where things will lead.

The constitutional measure before us is based on the Labour party's wish to reshape its representation within the European Parliament. It is imposing a duty upon the rest of us for its own narrow party purposes. I greatly regret that.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Viggers: I believe that the hon. Gentleman has only recently entered the Chamber, but I shall give way.

Mr. Bermingham: I have been listening quietly to the hon. Gentleman. If he were so kind as to listen to me, he might find that I am with him.

Surely a better approach than the Stalinist argument is to question what Milton Keynes has in common with Gosport. The answer is nothing. We have the same problems in the north-west. What does St. Helens have in common with Cumbria? The problems of the two areas are entirely different. Given the proposed system, those are the problems that we should be addressing.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Viggers: I am reluctant to take any further interventions. I wish to make a brief speech.

I move on to the difficulty of continuing identification with the cause of Europe if we enlarge the Euro constituencies to the extent that is proposed. We shall alienate more people from the concept of Europe. Indeed, the proposal will prevent identification. I therefore urge my colleagues to support the amendments.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I am delighted to have the opportunity to take up the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). I shall return to the specific point which underlay the whole of his speech when I come to my concluding remarks.

I shall confine my remarks to London, especially at this hour. Dr. Johnson was a constituent of one of my predecessors, and I continue to enjoy the observation that, if a man is tired of London, he is tired of life. With a Londoner's pride, though in a manner less lapidary than Dr. Johnson, I say that, if something will not work in London, it will not work in the rest of the country.

I spoke last year of a Londoner's sense of locality. London is an agglomeration of villages which have come to pass. The great success of "Passport to Pimlico", which was filmed in my constituency, derived from the fact that Londoners feel a strong sense of local loyalty. To go outside my constituency, I do not believe that the authors of the Bill have recently read "The Napoleon of Notting Hill".

The Minister, like the Secretary of State on Second Reading, based her argument for the constituencies on the contention that they match the regions which were introduced by the previous Government, of whom I was a member. I would not dream of offending against the Official Secrets Acts by revealing what others said in Government when we discussed the concept of regionalisation. I assume, however, that I am allowed to reveal my own views, which were that I was deeply sceptical of the concept. I can say with certainty that we did not at that stage discuss using the regions as a basis for Euro-constituencies. Had we done so, it would have armed me with a powerful argument that was not available to me at the time.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) spoke of how well the other countries in the European Union have made the proposed system work. For better or for worse, I served longer continuously on the European Budget Council than any other British Minister since 1972. I first met my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), who made a most distinguished contribution to the debate, in that capacity, when he was a Member of the European Parliament.

When I recall the closing stages of the negotiations on the European Community budget, between the Budget Council and the European Parliament, I would not commend the manner in which the European Parliament was elected as conferring flexibility in negotiations.

The Parliament on the budget was an instrument of adamantine inflexibility. The only resolution of that came not from the Parliament but from myself as holding the presidency of the Budget Council, in inventing a comparatively un-Tory instrument in the negative reserve that had the extreme pragmatic virtue of resolving the problem. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon for the fact that, on having been elected to the European Parliament by a method other than that applicable to the rest of Europe, he helped me to persuade the rest of the Parliament to adopt my proposal.

My next point turns on the amendments that relate to the boundary commission as against the Secretary of State. I am not a man to wear wounds on my sleeve, but proposals brought forward by successive Secretaries of State have given me an employed day-time population in my constituency that is 20 times that of the average constituency throughout the nation. In London alone, 22 per cent. of the population of greater London work in my constituency. My 73 parliamentary colleagues—I see some on the Government Benches—are good enough to look after the other 78 per cent., or a little more than 1 per cent. each. I do not have to serve individual commuters but, on the ancient principle of no taxation without representation, I have to represent any business or employer who comes to me on any matter that pertains to that business or employment.

This absurd disproportion militates against my ability to serve the entire constituency properly. To be fair, the boundary commission has always been sympathetic to my argument at public inquiry that there should be some shading to reflect the employment population. I am seeking, Mr. Martin, to remain within the rules of order.

London seems to be the loser in the circumstances that I have outlined, especially if 22 per cent. of London's working population, who come to work in my constituency, have by their feet indicated that they recognise the strategic significance of the constituency. However, the boundary commission can do nothing about my problem, which is why I would rather it address the origins of the problem instead of the Secretary of State, who created it.

Under the present system, the member of the European Parliament who represents my constituency and other areas is a good man whom I know and like. He is a former Member of the House of Commons, but not a member of my party. He has no hesitation in taking up domestic issues that occur within my constituency, but he has to be pushed and prompted—not least by myself—to take up matters that powerfully affect the constituency but which specifically have a European dimension. I give the art market as an example, which classically has a European dimension.

I fear that shifting this problem into the much larger constituencies that the Bill envisages will make it a great deal worse.

Finally, with a Government who pride themselves on European enthusiasms, decentralisation and referendums, I regret that on the issue before us the Government have not consulted. If by being doctrinaire—I return to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport—the Government remove us further from an enthusiasm for Europe in this process, they will in my view at least, have served ill the European cause and ideal that they claim to espouse. They will have shown themselves separately to be self-contradictory on the principle of decentralisation.

Mr. Collins: We have had an excellent debate, which has included some notable speeches. I shall direct my remarks to two in particular. First, in a superb speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) lacerated these ludicrous provisions, although a couple of his comments were—uncharacteristically—excessively generous.

My hon. Friend was right to stress the importance of the boundary commission, as an independent, non-political and non-partisan body, taking decisions about the proposed electoral regions. I noted that he did not observe that we have a Government who take the view that politicians' taking a view about food safety is excessively political but their taking decisions about electoral boundaries is not. That is a curious stance for the Government to take.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the absurdity of Members of the European Parliament having to jump around vast and difficult-to-traverse electoral regions. One must bear in mind, however, that we are dealing with MEPs who, under the present arrangements, are expected, even when they are on continental Europe, to travel between Strasbourg, Brussels and Luxembourg in the course of their parliamentary duties—before returning to the United Kingdom where they will have to zoom around vast electoral regions.

Movement will be a constant process. The majority of UK MEPs will simply represent the air, because they will be airborne much more than they will have their feet on the ground. That will not be their fault; it will be the fault of the system.

Mr. Bercow: In the case of Labour MEPs, might not that be thought to minimise the potential for damaging action?

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend may be right. In the case of Liberal Democrat MEPs, it may be appropriate that their feet will be in the air, because their heads are always in the clouds.

The other speech on which I want to comment is that of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). He said that, under the new system, it will be possible for MEPs to represent interest groups and promote certain issues. That may be true, but the Conservative party is interested in elected politicians representing individuals, not just groups. He also said that he hoped that voters will see a fairer system. The Conservative party is interested in whether voters will ever see the people they elect. Given the vastness of the electoral regions, I seriously doubt whether voters will ever see the person they have elected.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is making an important point, but I hope that he will not argue that the people are to blame. It would be understandable if ordinary MEPs, faced with regions of that magnitude, felt at the end of a hard week that the task was so big and threatening that their inclination was simply to go home.

Mr. Collins: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. The problem that I have highlighted is in the nature of the system. It does not relate to the electorate, who will be unable to identify with their MEP; and it relates still less to those who are elected to the European Parliament.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if MEPs decide to go home, they will have a problem deciding which home to go to? If an MEP represents an area from Milton Keynes to Gosport, his selection committee must meet in the docklands. Where could he place himself so as to be available to his electorate? That is a fundamental argument. Moreover, for the right hon. Member for Berwick–upon–Tweed (Mr. Beith) to say that the Church is run on that basis suggests a view of the Church that is unbeknown to anyone I have ever come across.

Mr. Collins: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for correcting the religious and other references in the speech of the right hon. Member for Berwick–upon–Tweed. As the right hon. Gentleman is having such a hard time of it, I shall omit some of the other matters that he mentioned and build on what my right hon. Friend said. He is right: hon. Members on both sides of the House will recognise that, increasingly, our electorates expect us to be in our constituencies when we are not in this place and to be resident in our constituencies.

To use an analogy that is close to my home, if an MEP represents a region that stretches all the way from the Scottish border to Cheshire, how is he supposed to find a home that his electorate considers places him within the community that he seeks to represent? Would he live geographically halfway up or down, which might place him in Manchester? My constituents in rural Cumbria would deeply resent the idea that someone living in the urban heartland of Manchester represented their community. Should the MEP place himself at one extremity or the other? That would be difficult, because people in Chester would not feel that someone living in Cumbria understood their concerns, and vice versa. It would be absurd.

Mr. Bercow: Let us not be coy about this. There is not only an absence of common interest and identity within many electoral regions; it is worse than that. Many residents of those electoral regions have never been to, and in many cases are unaware of the existence of, large parts of the region. For instance, many noble people in Gosport have never been to Buckingham, and many noble people in Buckingham have never been to Gosport. They are none the worse for it.

8.45 pm

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend is a great reminder of the importance of not being coy in these matters, and I shall not seek to be coy. He points out that I have been understating my case, and I shall seek not to do so in the remainder of my remarks.

In addition to the geographical problems is the problem of the sheer size of the electorate. Electorates for some regions will be about 4 million, 5 million or even 6 million people. It is simply not possible for one person to feel a link with that many people.

Let us take a practical illustration, which hon. Members on both sides of the Committee will recall—the period, less than a year ago, before the general election, when everyone who succeeded in being elected to this House, of all parties and of none in the case of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell), who was with us earlier, will have spent a large portion of their time knocking on doors, speaking to individual voters, replying to letters, telephone canvassing and pursuing other methods of contacting individuals. How on earth will someone seeking election by an electorate of 4 million, 5 million or 6 million people knock on that many doors or make that many connections with the electorate?

Mr. Cawsey: The hon. Gentleman said that it is wrong to expect one person to represent a constituency of that size. The Bill does not expect one person to represent a constituency of that size. Does the amendment suggest that it does? If so, that is a good reason for rejecting it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Collins: I am delighted, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) is pointing out from a sedentary position, that intervention means that the hon. Gentleman has committed himself to voting for our next amendment, which will establish precisely what he suggests. As the Bill stands, 11 people will be elected in the south-eastern region. Each will have a duty to represent all the people in that area. Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that, under the Bill as drafted, those 11 representatives can split the region between them? The Bill does not provide for them to do that. The whole of that electorate of 5 million or 6 million people will regard their MEP as someone to whom they must look.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): The hon. Gentleman's argument seems to be that it is impossible for someone to represent a constituency of more than 4 million or 5 million electors. Can he explain how the Conservative party supports a directly elected mayor for London, who will represent more than 4 million or 5 million electors?

Mr. Collins: This is an entirely different point. The mayor of London is not expected to spend most of his time travelling between Brussels, Strasbourg and Luxembourg, but can spend all his time in London. He will not have to shuttle back and forth across a vast area, so it is simply not a parallel argument.

The practicalities of the Bill are clear: they simply do not work. One must therefore look behind the matter and try to work out what could be the motivation for choosing a system with this size of electoral region and this provision for the boundaries of the electoral regions. We know why the Liberal Democrats support such a system: they want a system that puts proportionality first. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed was entirely open about that. He wants a system that is rigged in favour of the Liberal Democrats. It is not a noble aspiration, but it is clear. But why do the Government favour it?

The Home Secretary made it clear, even today, that he remains against proportional representation for this place; why, then, is he in favour of it for the European Parliament? We must conclude that he does not take the European Parliament seriously. He thinks that the European Parliament should be used to do deals with the Liberal Democrats to influence the outcome of the next general election and to test run little experiments before the Jenkins commission reports. That is not the way to treat the European Parliament, which has serious powers over the people of this country. That approach is frivolous, so I support the amendment.

Mr. Green: Two events, one of which was a careful study of the map accompanying the helpful Library research paper, have inspired me to speak. The map, which shows Britain divided into regions, illustrates better than the eloquent remarks of my right hon. and hon. Friends the absurdity of the Government's proposal. Amendment No. 48 would have an ameliorative effect.

I declare a constituency interest. Many hon. Members have pointed out how absurd the regional boundaries are. The Government feebly defend the current system by saying that they accord with those of regional development agencies, but east Kent is already part of a European region. We have many economic ties with Europe because of the channel tunnel and links with Nord Pas-de-Calais and part of Wallonia.

Existing economic regions could sensibly be used for European elections, because businesses, local authorities and public bodies are used to working together. We could sell that idea to the people of Ashford and other parts of east Kent, but we will not be able to sell the idea that they have anything in common with the constituents of my hon. Friends the Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). Those places are like the dark side of the moon to people who live in the blessed country of east Kent.

Mr. Gummer: Is my hon. Friend aware that the situation is worse than that? Bedfordshire will be associated with east Kent, even though Bedford decides whether roads in East Anglia should be repaired. It is extremely difficult to understand how Bedfordshire and Kent could, by any stretch of the imagination, have the same economic, political or, as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) suggested, religious connections. I can count at least 30 Anglican and Roman Catholic diocese within one regional electorate. Surely it is nonsense to link Bedfordshire and Kent.

Mr. Green: I agree with my right hon. Friend. I take his point about the ecclesiastical nonsense that is attached to the political nonsense. I feel particularly strongly about that, as the home of the Bishop of Maidstone is in the village in which I live. He has made the point that, although the Church of England may be run from Canterbury, the Church in Kent is run from the village of Charing.

The Government's assertion that the regions accord with reality is self-evidently nonsense. They make the wider point that other countries do well under this system, but the tradition of parliamentary representation in other member states of the European Union is different at every level. New Zealand's use of the German additional member system of proportional representation does not work, because the New Zealand electorate treat their representatives as do the British electorate: they want them on call and they want to know who and where they are. The system works perfectly well in Germany, but not in New Zealand. It is invalid to argue that, because a system works elsewhere in the European Union, it will work in this country.

My second inspiration was the speech of the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing). She seemed to think that the amendment expressed a deep-seated dislike of the European Parliament and would damage it. The opposite is the truth. The amendment would strengthen the European Parliament and would be less damaging than the Government's proposal because there would be more chance of MEPs being identified with their constituencies.

It would be better if the boundary commission took all sensitive decisions. It would be bad if politicians were seen to be interfering with the structure of a Parliament that is deeply embedded in the public's affections—or, indeed, disaffections.

Mr. Bermingham: I declare an interest. I was the instructing solicitor in Foot v. the boundary commission in 1982, which is the lead case in this matter.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman entirely. Allegations of political interference are deeply damaging to democracy, which was the case with allegations made in the late 1960s about the Home Secretary interfering with parliamentary boundary commissions. That is why the Americans, for example, have taken the matter out of the hands of politicians and put it, bluntly, into the hands of computers. We should examine the matter carefully if we are to exclude the boundary commission, which considers parity and community of interest rather than size and numbers. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister would be so kind as to listen to words of wisdom from people experienced in these matters who know the dangers of ignoring the commission.

Mr. Green: The hon. Gentleman is right. I hope that the Minister will give weight to his words about damage to democracy. The situation is as bad as that, and the Government must address that point.

The European Parliament has largely excited apathy in this country. The election turnout has always been low. If the general public think that there is a whiff of gerrymandering about the election for the European Parliament, they are even less likely to hold the institution in high regard. The European Parliament is an important democratic institution, and it is the duty of the House to try to strengthen it, but the Government, for all their pro-European rhetoric, are heading in the wrong direction.

The amendment would improve the Government's proposals. Why have they chosen a particularly damaging proportional system using large regions? As has been said several times, the Home Secretary's hostility to proportional representation is so deeply embedded that he proposes its most damaging form for these elections in the hope that the system will be discredited in the eyes of the Jenkins commission and will not be adopted for any Parliament about which he cares more than he does about the European Parliament.

Ms Quin: I at least agree with the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) that the European Parliament is an important institution. We do not believe that its role will be undermined by the Bill.

Perhaps predictably, the amendments led to a wide-ranging debate, which at some points seemed to veer into what we shall discuss shortly—the subject of voting systems—and at others included references to the internal procedures of the Conservative party, which were raised by the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). There were even references to the difficulties in this Parliament faced by the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) in his daily duties.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) moved the amendment, with which were taken others relating to, in particular, the size of constituencies. It struck me as bizarre to introduce sub-regional divisions that seemed to have no coherence, and no historical or current justification. The hon. Gentleman referred several times to the constituency link, but nothing he said dissuaded me from the belief that what we propose for the regions is far better than the bizarre concoctions that he suggests.

It is certainly possible to secure representation of valid interests within a regional framework. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) reminded us, that happens in other countries. Listening to some of what was said earlier, I reflected on my own experiences in the European Parliament. The issues that I pursued most vigorously in my early years of membership—issues such as shipbuilding, the fishing industry and European funds—relate to a regional dimension, and could be satisfactorily fitted into a regional framework.

Mr. Bercow: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Quin: I know that hon. Members are keen for us to make progress, and I have been keen to listen to all the views that have been expressed so far; if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will continue with my speech.

The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) referred to corporate and business interests that often lobby MEPs. I believe that it was the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) who mentioned the regional development agencies that we are setting up, and the business role that they will have. That relates very clearly and easily to the regional boundaries proposed in the Bill.

At one point, the hon. Member for Ryedale stated categorically that Dover had more in common with Calais than with Milton Keynes, but then ruined that apparently knowledgeable assertion by saying that he did not know or care about what happened in the rest of Europe, which presumably includes Calais.

Mr. Bercow: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Quin: I will give way once, but I am anxious to make progress.

Mr. Bercow: As I did not speak in the debate, it does not seem unreasonable of me to intervene.

I was a little worried by the Minister's definition of valid interests. I am not sure why she thinks that it is for her to determine what constitutes valid interests, in the context of parliamentary representation in the European Parliament. [Interruption.] It is no good laughing at the point; I hope that the Minister will seek to answer it.

Ms Quin: I certainly will. By "valid interests" I meant issues that come within the European Union's ambit and relate to the work of MEPs. Those are not interests that I have decided; they are interests that are governed by directives and other action at European level.

For example, I referred to the fishing industry in connection with regional interests. The fishing industry is greatly affected by directives, and by a host of European rules and regulations. That is not my judgment; it arises naturally in the course of work in the European institutions and the European Parliament. That is what I mean by valid interests. There are a great many with which MEPs deal now, and they will be able to deal with them very satisfactorily in the framework proposed in the Bill.

Opposition Members' speeches featured many inconsistencies in regard to size. They criticised considerations relating to size, and then proposed the division of Scotland into two in a rather arbitrary way—as the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) pointed out. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Berwick–upon–Tweed rightly drew attention to some of the geographical absurdities in the present arrangement, and—again rightly, in my view—said that they could be better addressed in the proposed regional framework.

I believe that a strong and democratic case can be made out for the regional divisions proposed in the Bill. I think that they make a great deal of sense in European terms, and that they will deal with the issues that the European Parliament will have to handle.

Let me now refer to some of the other amendments in the group, to which other hon. Members spoke—referring, in particular, to the role of the boundary commission. I see no need to involve the commission in this instance, when England is following regional boundaries that—as we know—were established by the previous Government, and have been widely accepted.

The situation is not the same as that in 1993, when we discussed amendments to the old European election system. The boundary commission had a well-established role then, as it does in terms of House of Commons constituencies. However, that does not apply in terms of the regional boundaries for these European elections.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Is the hon. Lady telling the Committee that she foresees no further role for the boundary commission in the whole context of European elections?

Ms Quin: Given these particular boundaries, such a role would not seem likely, but, of course, after elections, we all discuss what has happened and what may happen. However, given the system we have—given that these are established boundaries—there is no need for the boundary commission to exercise the role that has been established and works well in terms of the House of Commons.

The Conservative Front-Bench team has been completely inconsistent, because, in 1993, when dealing with a system where nearly all of us agreed the boundary commission did have a role to play, the Conservatives tried to push forward changes without the commission. I remind them of that fact.

In choosing the regions, we have mathematically made sure that the ratio of registered electors to MEPs is, as near as possible, the same in every electoral region in England. We believe that that is a satisfactory way in which to deal with the matter. The amendments of the hon. Member for Ryedale would simply delay the Bill and postpone its implementation. I understand why he would want to do that, but that is their only effect; they would not make any real contribution to the question of boundaries.

I agreed with many of the comments made by the hon. Member for Moray, particularly her description of the work of MEPs and of the European Parliament, but I cannot accept her amendment. Each English MEP currently represents an average of 518,000 electors; by contrast, Scottish MEPs represent, on average, 498,000 electors. If Scotland were given an extra MEP, each English MEP would represent an average of 526,000 electors, while their Scottish counterparts would represent an average of only 443,000 electors. In London—it is a London seat that would be jeopardised under the arrangements—the ratio would be one MEP for every 559,000 electors.

As the hon. Member will know, we are introducing a new system and we believe that the arrangements of the parties—her own, as well as mine and others—will provide for effective representation of Scotland as a whole. Therefore, there is no justification for additional representation, as her amendment proposes, and I urge her not to press it.

We have proposed a satisfactory deal. It certainly meets the democratic test and allows a system for representation in the European Parliament that can closely relate to the concerns of electors and to the issues which, as we know, form the bulk of the work of the European Parliament and the European Union.

Mr. Greenway: In the past three hours, we have had an important debate. Attendance in the Chamber now, in the prelude to what will undoubtedly be a Division, is greater than it was for some of that important debate. However, it would be a disservice to the Committee and the people of this country to rush precipitately into a Division without dealing with some of the points raised.

First, I must assure the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) that we see nothing in our proposal for two MEPs for the Scottish region with which she should wish to differ. We are not adopting a Eurosceptic stance in the amendments. On the contrary, our proposal for smaller electoral regions results from our concern that the already low public esteem for the European Parliament in this country will be undermined still further by the scale of the regions.

Mrs. Ewing: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that, with the establishment of a Scottish Parliament, which will work in close conjunction with MEPs from Scotland, there seems little point in having two distinct regions in Scotland?

Mr. Greenway: We do not agree. We believe, and we thought that she would agree, that the interests of the rural communities in the highlands and islands are different from those of the large urban conurbations in central Scotland. We do not propose where the boundary should be drawn. A central tenet of our proposals is that the boundary commission should have decided those matters, independently of any political interference.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon brought his practical experience of life in the European Parliament to the attention of the Committee. He, of all Conservative Members, cannot be regarded as a Eurosceptic, yet he agreed totally with the suggestion that the proposed regions are far too large and would undermine the effectiveness and accountability of MEPs.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made an extraordinary speech. On the one hand, he made it absolutely clear that proportionality first was the order of the day with the Liberal Democrats—no great surprise in that—but he went on to argue that, somehow, because the Member of the European Parliament for Scotland South had to cover an area from Eyemouth to Ayr, it was a bad thing, and that it was all right to have MEPs covering the whole of Scotland. His argument did not seem to justify the conclusion that he drew from it.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) made the important point that the Bill would have unintended consequences, which would be to the detriment of accountability and representation in the European Parliament. Party allegiance with voters would determine to whom businesses and communities turned with problems that needed to be addressed. More than anyone else in the debate, he put his finger on what we are about with this group of amendments. For the marginal increase in proportionality that would result from the nine electoral regions, as opposed to the 18 that we propose, we are asked to accept a disproportionate extension of distance and remoteness of MEPs from their electors.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) pointed to the large differentiation in electoral regions. He, of all people, should know that what the Minister said about drumming up bizarre sub-regions with no historical justification is complete nonsense, because, not that long ago, the area around what is now east Dorset was in Hampshire. The Opposition believe that there is a need for the boundary commission to re-examine all those matters.

In an intervention, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) told the House why the south-east region is so large; it was established for a wholly different reason from that which the Committee is being asked to consider. He said that the south-east region was established to conform with a Department's perspective on how to cover a region in which communities were already relatively close to London. It was not established as a basis on which we should form electoral regions for the European Parliament.

9.15 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) said that the proposals ill-serve the cause of the United Kingdom's identification with Europe. He also mentioned the extreme practical difficulties for political parties in giving 11 seats to the south-east region.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) said that it was never intended that the geographical boundaries of the regions—with which he was involved as a Minister—should be used as the basis for European electoral regions. There is a need to reflect further on the demands of those representing central London. The boundary commission, not Ministers, should have reflected on those demands. The Bill's 10-Member London electoral region will make matters much worse. The Government have not consulted, and their doctrinaire attitude undermines the European cause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said that electoral regional boundaries were never intended to become electoral regions for the European Parliament. The regions have been adopted by the Home Secretary purely for convenience, so that, in this Parliament, proportional representation will have a test run, showing Ministers how the public might respond.

Opposition Members believe that we have a pretty shrewd idea of how the public will respond to those electoral regions. There will also be unforeseen consequences, because the regions will undermine the credibility not only of the European Parliament and of the European elections but of the Government.

I have a high regard for the Minister—our constituencies are not that far apart—but her reply to the issues raised in this debate was pretty poor. She has not addressed any of the important issues, including one on which there was cross-party consensus.

Whatever the House decides on the issue of electoral regions, we believe that this group of amendments includes important constitutional amendments relating to the boundary commission and to who should determine future changes in electoral arrangements. We think that it is fundamentally wrong for the Secretary of State to determine electoral regions. Even more important, we think that it is entirely wrong and unconstitutional for him to determine future electoral arrangements, electoral regions and proportionality.

The Committee should reflect on the fact that the Prime Minister, when he was shadow Home Secretary, criticised the previous Government for failing to consult the boundary commission on the possibility of increasing the number of European seats. The Minister said that that was a valid criticism. That may be so, but, given the way in which the extra seats came about, there was no time for consultation. That cannot be said of future changes.

If the Prime Minister believed when he was shadow Home Secretary that the independence of the boundary commission should be paramount, the Committee has a right to expect the Government to honour that belief now by accepting amendments Nos. 54 to 56 so that it is not the Secretary of State but the boundary commission that is involved with these matters in future. There must be no question of the gerrymandering of boundaries in the European elections.

It was right to have a debate of this length to expose the Government's hypocrisy. They say that they are in favour of democratic representation, but the Bill's arrangements are a botched job. At the European elections next year, the country will decide that the Government got it wrong; we are giving the Committee the chance to show tonight that the Government got it wrong.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Clive Betts and
Mr. David Drew.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): On a point of order, Mr. Lord. I should like to raise a matter relating to the rights of the House. This evening at 6 o'clock in Committee Room 14, there was a meeting of the Conservative Back-Bench agriculture committee, to which a lady called Ms Kate Ashbrook, representing the Ramblers Association, came to speak. In her papers she had an advance copy of a Government document to be made available tomorrow, which has not yet been made available to Members of Parliament. We have checked in the Vote Office that the paper is not available. Would you be good enough to investigate and ensure that Ministers understand that documents that are issued in advance to fringe lobby groups should be issued first to Members of Parliament?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): I do not know the precise details of the document to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The Committee—no doubt those on the Government Front Bench in particular—will have heard what he has said.

Mr. Soames: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. I should have made it clear that the document concerned was the statement that I understand is to be made tomorrow on the right to roam legislation.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have dealt with that point of order.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 1, line 24, leave out from 'region' to 'shall' in line 29 on page 2.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in page 1, line 25, leave out from 'be' to end of line 26 and insert

'an open regional list system.

3A. An open regional list system is a system which complies with the following requirements, namely—

(a) each electoral region shall be divided into a number of constituencies equal to the number of MEPs to be elected for that region in accordance with subsection 2(4) above and Schedule 1;

(b) each candidate shall nominate on the ballot paper one constituency in the relevant region which he will represent, if elected;

(c) in the event of the same constituency being nominated by more than one successful candidate, the candidate elected first shall represent his nominated constituency;

(d) successful candidates unable to represent their nominated constituency for the reason given in sub-paragraph (c) shall, in the order of their election, choose another constituency to represent, and;

(e) if an elected candidate has nominated a constituency which no candidate elected before him has nominated, he shall represent that constituency even if a candidate elected before him, whose own nominated constituency has been taken, seeks to choose it.'.

No. 1, in page 2, line 1, leave out from 'cast' to end of line 2 and insert

'in one of the following ways:

(a) for a registered party;

(b) for a candidate listed as a member of a registered party; or

(c) for an individual candidate not listed as a member of a registered party.'.

No. 51, in page 2, line 2, after 'candidate,', insert

'whether or not the candidate is a member of a registered party,'.

No. 2, in page 2, line 4, after 'candidate', insert

'not listed as a member of a registered party'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 4, after 'votes' insert

', with votes for candidates listed as members of a registered party counting towards the total vote of that party.'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 8, leave out from 'number' to end and insert 'shown below.

Number of seats already allocated	Divisor
6	11
8	15
9	17
10	19.'

[Mr. David Trimble]

No. 5, in page 2, line 16, leave out from 'filled' to end of line 18 and insert 'as follows—

(a) a quota shall be determined which is equal to the total number of votes polled for all the parties, divided by the number of seats to be allocated, plus one.

(b) votes cast for the candidate at the top of the party list shall be compared with the number of votes cast for the registered party to which that candidate belongs.

(c) where the candidate has fewer votes than the quota, the votes for that candidate will then be topped up to reach the quota using votes from the party vote, reducing the number of votes won by the party accordingly.

(d) this process continues for each candidate on the list until the party votes have been exhausted, except where there are insufficient votes in the party vote to top up a candidate, in which case those votes are allocated to the next person on the list with sufficient votes, who moves one place up the list.'.

No. 6, in page 2, line 20, at end insert—

'(7A) The style of the front of the ballot papers to be used shall be in the form set out in Schedule (European Parliament Ballot Paper).

No. 10, in page 2, leave out lines 22 to 24.

No. 11, in page 2, leave out lines 25 to 28.

New clause 4—Evaluation by Secretary of State of open list system and method of allocating seats—

'.—After section 7 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978, there shall be inserted the following section—

"Evaluation by Secretary of State of open list system and method of allocating seats

7A.—(1) As soon as is reasonably practicable after the first election held under the regional list system set out in section 3 of this Act, the Secretary of State shall lay a report before Parliament, setting out what appear to him to be the principal advantages and disadvantages of conducting subsequent such elections by an open list system.

(2) A report under subsection (1) above may also contain proposals for changing the arrangements for the allocation of seats set out in this Act.

(3) In this section, 'open list system' means an electoral system in which the names of those candidates on a party's list are listed on the ballot paper and each voter can choose whether to cast his vote either—

(a) for a registered party, or

(b) for an individual candidate, whether or not that candidate is on a party's list of candidates."'.

Amendment No. 27, in schedule 2, schedule 2, page 8, leave out lines 19 to 25.

New schedule 1—

Mr. Trimble: I will address myself primarily to amendments Nos. 26 and 27, which stand in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth). The amendments relate to the electoral system that should be used for the election of Members of the European Parliament. During the previous debate—of which I heard bits, but not all—hon. Members anticipated this debate several times, and commented on the proposed regional party list system. I was interested to hear some of those comments.

One Conservative Member referred to the party list system as Stalinist. Another hon. Member from another party—I am not identifying them by name, because I do not want to embarrass them—said that the procedure resembled something that might emanate from the central committee of the Bulgarian Communist party. I was surprised by those comments, because the regional list system is not new—not even to the United Kingdom. It was proposed and enacted by a Conservative Government in 1996.

Mr. Mitchell: They are Stalinists.

Mr. Trimble: The hon. Gentleman is also, by implication, making a comment about his Front-Bench colleagues, on which he may wish to elaborate later.

I was not going to make that point. I was saying that those who applied such a label to the regional list system were wrong. I am sure that the Conservative party would not have proposed a Stalinist system and the Labour party would not have supported it. Labour supported the regional list system when it was voted through the House in 1996. My party pointed out some of the disadvantages.

It is amazing to hear debates about various proportional representation systems with no reference being made to the experience that we have had of operating them. We in Northern Ireland have experience of two proportional systems—the regional list system and the single transferable vote system. We have operated the latter longer—since 1973—and had quite a bit of experience of it. We used the regional list system on just the one occasion, but we have a basis for comparison. It is from that experience and on that basis that we come to the Committee with the amendment.

Criticisms of the regional list system are somewhat misplaced. It is a proportional system with its own particular characteristics, but to try to dismiss it with the sort of blanket criticism that we have heard is not appropriate. There is nothing necessarily undemocratic about a party list system. It depends to a large extent on the procedures of the party that operates it. We all have different selection procedures for the Westminster elections under the first-past-the-post system. A party presents the electorate with a candidate. The electorate do not have any choice of candidate, and they support him or not. We do not regard that as undemocratic, providing that the party has internal democratic procedures. There have been occasions on which people have criticised parties for operating selection procedures that are too narrow, but the trend is very much in the direction of one member one vote.

We in the Ulster Unionist party used to pride ourselves on the democratic nature of our selection procedures. While other parties were selecting by small committees, our selection was by large groupings of delegates who represented a very wide cross-section of the community. Meetings of several hundred delegates would regularly make the choice. We have been overtaken by parties that have moved to a one member, one vote system. I applaud those moves. It is probably about time that we caught up. Having had an excellent system for many decades—in fact, throughout the century—we do not want to end the century having been overtaken by everyone else. But that is by the way.

When we had the regional list system and had to draw up party lists, we simply used our normal internal party procedures. The very same delegates who would have been involved in selecting a candidate for the Westminster election were involved in the selection of people for the list. The point that arises is that the position on the regional list is crucial. The power to rank people on the list becomes vital.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the strength of selection on a one man, one vote basis, or a delegate basis, as in the Ulster Unionist party over many years, was that it produced an identifiable man or woman to whom the electorate could be asked to relate? That was one of the inherent strengths of the system, which is much less obviously true of a list system.

Mr. Trimble: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. It is true and applicable to any such comparison between a first-past-the-post system of electing Members in a single constituency and any proportional system that has multiple Members. That criticism is not unique to a regional list system.

I was making the point that the ranking on the list is crucial, and gives rise to power that could be abused. Conscious of that, we decided, when we operated the system in 1996, that we would ask our delegates to undergo two exercises at selection meetings. We first asked them to undergo procedures to identify the number of candidates to fill our list. We were dealing with five members for each list. After they had selected five members, we asked them to vote again to determine the ranking of members on the list.

The crucial ranking was done, therefore, not by party apparatchiks, and certainly not by the leadership, but by delegates. We felt that that was essential both for the maintenance of some degree of internal democracy in the party and for the credibility of the system from the electorate's point of view. While we have operated the system only once, my impression—my hon. Friends may wish to comment on their experience of it—was that it was regarded as satisfactory.

There is one curiosity about the list system, and I have seen nothing in the Bill that relates to it. I shall be interested in what the Home Secretary has to say about the question of the removal of names from the list. It is a party list. A person on it, even if elected, is elected not in his own right but as a member of a party. Should he or she cease to be a member of the party, he or she automatically comes off the list. People cannot cross the Floor in a list system.

9.45 pm

A provision under the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996 gives the party leaders in Northern Ireland, as individuals, a power to remove people from the list. In the Northern Ireland Forum, which was elected in 1996 under that legislation, all the individual party leaders in Northern Ireland possess the power to dismiss people from an elected body with the stroke of a pen. It has not happened. None of my colleagues has used the power. The chief whip of our forum party tells me that I should occasionally threaten to use it. He says that it would have a marvellous effect on discipline if I threatened to write a letter saying, "Mr. Bloggs is no longer a member of the forum." I have not done it because it is a bit of a nuclear deterrent. One would never dare to do it unless one was confident that one would survive the resulting furore. If there is to be criticism of the list system, it should focus on that.

Analogous procedures exist for all list systems to enable parties to dismiss their members. I may have missed that point in the debate, but I should be interested to know what the Government propose.

Mr. Straw: We are proposing nothing different in this Bill from that which obtains for a Member elected to this House or to any other democratic institution under our constitution. If someone is elected under one party banner, but decides to cross the Floor, for the period for which they were elected it is a matter between that person and his or her electors, and no one else. There is no difference in principle. Any of us, having been elected under one party banner, can change allegiance. Some of us think that that is fairly reprehensible; others sometimes take a different view. The same system would obtain in respect of the party list system, as we propose it in the Bill.

Mr. Trimble: I am interested in that reply. I understand why the Home Secretary said that, but it introduces a tremendous contradiction into the proposals. If we operate a party list system, my point follows. That may be an uncomfortable conclusion, but under this system, people will vote not for individuals but for a party. If the votes of the people in one of the electoral regions are sufficient to elect three or four members of that party, the electorate, having voted for a party not a person, must surely be entitled to have that number of party representatives representing them in that area for the session. Anything else is a denial of the democratic system.

Mr. Drew: Does that not depend on whether it is an open or a closed list system, which we shall debate later?

Mr. Trimble: I take that point. The argument that we are exploring is relevant to our amendment and to the system that we propose. Noting the implications of a party list system in a sense prepares the ground for the points that I will make later. The hon. Gentleman should not assume that I approve of the system that I am currently exploring. I am merely pointing out the logical consequences of the system and the deep contradiction in the Home Secretary's actions. In having proposed a party list system, but then undermining it by not following through its implications, he has given rise to a legitimate complaint on the part of the electorate about the logic and principles of the system.

I am not here simply to praise the party list system, because it has disadvantages. In Northern Ireland in 1996, we did not find that the party list system was satisfactory. In fact, we ended that election feeling that it was quite unsatisfactory and flawed in comparison with the other proportional representation system with which we are familiar—the single transferable vote—although it is a nice point whether those flaws are greater with a five-member system or with a larger one.

The flaw that we perceived was that a party list system encouraged the creation of parties. We have far too many parties in Northern Ireland as it is, but under that system, the number increased significantly—indeed, about half a dozen were created specifically for the 1996 election, so we were faced with quite an array. Each of those parties, even the silliest, attracted some votes, albeit not many. Under the party list system, those votes for small parties are wasted votes. They simply disappear and are not counted—well, they are counted, but they have no effect on the outcome of the election, so they become wasted.

Under the STV system, with which we have been familiar since 1973, votes are transferred and consequently a more proportional result is achieved. Looking at the outcome of the 1996 elections and comparing that to what the outcome would have been under an STV system, we saw quite a difference. We felt that the electoral system cost us five seats in a 90-member body. We estimated that, had an STV system been used, we would have got an additional five seats. The same was true for other large parties.

The curious consequence of the disregard of the votes cast for small parties is that the larger parties tend to lose in comparison with those that are not quite so big. I would need to go through all 18 of our regional list elections and compare the outcomes with those that would have been achieved under an STV system before I could make that point with absolute certainty, but I believe that I can make and sustain it without much difficulty now.

We found that there was that disadvantage; so, having read the Bill and seen that it proposed a regional list system for Great Britain and the STV system for Northern Ireland, and having a strong view that there should be a uniform system throughout the United Kingdom, we had to decide among ourselves whether to press for the adoption of the regional list system in Northern Ireland so as to have a uniform system or to go for STV. I consulted colleagues in the party and, after much discussion, we reached the overwhelming view that the STV system would be better, and to a large extent the reason was the transferability of votes.

To have votes that are transferable means that one does not then suffer the penalty that flows from a multiplicity of parties. If many parties stand in an election, as will inevitably happen, the electorate will want to be able not only to cast a vote for the party that reflects their views, but to cast a vote that is effective and can secure the election of their representatives. A transferable vote system allows that.

Some other benefits will flow from extending the STV system to the United Kingdom as a whole. The most obvious is that it will allow the electorate to make a choice between individual candidates. Although an open list system, such as that proposed by the Liberal Democrats, gives an element of choice, it is cumbersome. Telling the electorate to choose between a party vote and a personal vote confuses the issue. The attribution of the party vote to individuals could have a capricious element. One should choose between voting either for parties or for persons. The open list system has an untidy and unhappy compromise feel about it. I had understood until recently that the single transferable vote was the preferred system of the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Allan: The STV system is still preferred by the Liberal Democrats. Our amendments seek to improve existing provisions in the Bill, but we have not abandoned our commitment to STV as a matter of principle.

Mr. Trimble: I am delighted to hear that the Liberal Democrats still believe that STV is best. When my colleagues and I tabled our amendment on STV, we said, "Well, we are bound to gather support from the Liberal Democrats, because they have been advocates of that system for many years." It was with deep chagrin and disappointment that, as the days and weeks went by, we saw no sign of support from the Liberal Democrats. We were left to wonder what possible reason they could have for abandoning the system that they had supported for many decades. If the Liberal Democrats still believe it to be the best, perhaps we shall give them the opportunity to vote for the single transferable vote system when the time comes on Thursday.

Mr. Mitchell: Although the right hon. Gentleman praises the open list system with faint damns, does he agree that it is much preferable to a closed list system?

Mr. Trimble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. I did not think that I was praising the open list system. I had intended to criticise it rather gently—perhaps I was too gentle, and did not give the Committee the correct impression. Even if we concede that an open list system is preferable to a closed list system, we should go one step further and move to a system that is clearly and unambiguously a vote for persons. That is what the single transferable vote system is.

The STV system compels the electorate to vote for a person. It compels every elector to think about the persons who are standing for election, and it compels every elector to think about how he or she will vote. When STV was introduced in Northern Ireland, concerns were expressed that it was unnecessarily complex and that people would have difficulty with it. At one of the first elections under the STV system—it was not the first: there was a local government election in May and then the assembly election in June 1973—there were 18 or 19 candidates in the constituency where I resided and was foolishly persuaded to stand as a candidate. I should remember the number of candidates as, when it came to the count, I was at the bottom of the poll and came 18th or 19th.

My experience on that occasion was that the people thought carefully about their vote. They examined the election material from the various parties and looked through the potted biographies of the candidates. They came to the polling booth with the lists of candidates that they wanted to support, and they voted accordingly. Consequently, the voters took an interest in the elections. The electorate will not take the same interest in individuals standing under a party list system—whether it is closed or open—and the people will obviously take less interest in a closed list than in an open list system.

We are moving to larger regions—which were rightly criticised in the previous discussion—with more people and an electoral system that discourages paying any attention to the personalities involved. That degrades the system.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman has related his own experience with respect to the STV system. Does he agree that the first-past-the-post system, which he has not addressed, is the best, because it gives a clear choice and a connection between the local area and the decisions that are taken at the ballot box by individuals who know exactly for whom they are voting? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the problem with the regional list system is that it can result in the tyranny of the party leadership, and the STV system has the grave disadvantage that people lose the ability to make a clear choice when their vote is shuffled through the system?

Mr. Trimble: I shall deal later with the relative merits of first past the post, as there are some comments that I should make with regard to it. In his other comment, the hon. Gentleman gives expression to a misconception about the system. The vote is transferable, but it transfers in accordance with the choices and preferences indicated by the elector—

Farmers' Incomes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

10 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): The issue which I am about to raise is of concern not just to farmers, on whose incomes I shall comment shortly, but to the economic health of the countryside as a whole. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Would hon. Members leave the Chamber quickly and quietly, if they are going?

Miss Widdecombe: It is not insignificant that a point of order was raised with you earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about the fact that an important statement affecting farmers has apparently been made available in advance to a pressure group whose principal aim is to make farmers' lives difficult, yet it has not been made available to Parliament. That sets the background for the way in which the Government look at the problems confronting farmers.

It is true that farmers have faced problems in the past. The main source of their current difficulty is the strong pound. Of course, this is not the first time in our economic history that we have had a very strong pound, but on this occasion there are other factors, not just in one or another section of the industry, but across farming as a whole. Those factors, taken together with the strength of the pound, are making life so difficult that we should be concerned for the future of farming if matters are not sorted out.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the problem is not so much the strength of the pound as the weakness of the other continental currencies, as European Union member states pursue their convergence criteria, with all the resulting damage to their economies?

Miss Widdecombe: Yes indeed, but that weakness leads to the comparative strength of the pound, so what I am saying is a summary of the rather complex model that my hon. Friend was introducing.

I shall deal with specific parts of the farming industry. Fruit farmers not only experience the difficulty of exporting in the face of the strong pound, but are confronted with all the results of frost in May. I could be cynical and say that I believe that frost in May greeted the arrival of a Labour Government, but I could say rather more realistically that frost in May has not happened for an extremely long time. No serious help has been given to fruit farmers, who make up a large percentage of the farmers in my constituency. No real help has been given to them, or much hope held out.

Cereals are facing an expanding world market in which additional supplies are coming from many quarters at the same time as a reduction in livestock has reduced demand, and once again the pound is strong. I hardly need to refer to the problems that are confronting beef farmers, which have not been helped by the Government's decision to ban beef on the bone. Finally, although this is not an exhaustive list, there is the problem of sheep farmers, who are also suffering from a strong pound and from the increasing difficulties of live exports.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Is the right hon. Lady aware that in areas such as mid-Wales, including Montgomeryshire, we are facing a fully fledged recession on account of what has happened to sheep and beef farming?

Miss Widdecombe: I am indeed aware of that. Hon. Members must forgive me if I do not go into an exhaustive description of all that is wrong in farming. The number of hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber at this hour of the night is a sign of the concern that is felt in the House. I hope that the Government will take on board that concern and respond positively.

My debate has made special reference to the south-east, and that is because, notwithstanding the fact that there are obvious problems in other parts of the country, we have special factors. For example, huge capital investment followed the 1987 storm. There was the decimation of the hop market—it was more than decimation, of course, because that would have left 90 per cent.; that market was almost destroyed. There are higher labour costs in the south-east. There are also difficulties in transferring to something like beet because of the distance involved in haulage and processing. Also, in the south-east, we have a very mixed economy; there has not been, for example, the situation which until recently appertained in East Anglia, where there was extremely strong cereal farming, accounting for most of that economy.

At the same time, there has been a decline in the percentage of retail prices enjoyed by farmers. For example—these are only examples—in November 1995 a beef farmer received £2.35 per kg deadweight, which represented about 39 per cent. of the butcher's price. That farmer now receives only £1.78 per kg, which is slightly more than 30 per cent. of the butcher's price.

I could quote similar examples for milk, where there has been a reduction in the farmer's share of the end price from 72.5 per cent. to slightly less than 65 per cent. Lamb prices are now £2.16 per kg, which is only a 36 per cent. share of the butcher's price, which has increased from £5.37 to just under £6. Similarly, I could draw on the examples of pork and of cereals.

We have a strong pound and individual factors are affecting many sectors. We have a decline in percentage retail prices. In addition, we have a rise in the costs of regulation, which the Government want to pass on to the industry. The Government have proposed a food agency. I do not intend to argue the merits of such an agency, but I severely question the wisdom of making the industry pay for it. There are costs involved also in the traceability of individual animals.

All this is happening when others of the Government's policies are posing enormous threats to the countryside. For example, there is the proposal to build on the green belt—that proposal is now being somewhat softened, but it still remains, having been announced without, apparently, very much feeling for the farmers. There is a proposal to tax car parking. Who uses car parks? Who are the people who use cars to get to work? The answer is that cars are used by people who are coming in from the country, who do not have alternative forms of transport.

There was also the iniquitous right to roam. There has been quite a U-turn on the roam towards that. Nevertheless, the proposals were made, and earlier tonight we were presented with an example of how closely the Government were co-operating, apparently, with one of the pressure groups involved in the right to roam.

Will the Government comment on their attitude to the rural White Paper? The previous Government's rural White Paper was widely respected by all sections of the countryside. It was welcomed, and its implementation was monitored. Is that monitoring to continue at the same level and in the same depth as in the past?

Low income from farming does not just affect farmers but has many knock-on effects on ancillary trades—on those who supply farm machinery, feed suppliers, dealers and hauliers and on the small trades or enterprises that depend on a healthy rural economy for their survival. There are various measures that the Government could take and I do not propose a complete prescription for solving the problem, but the use of agrimonetary compensation has been inadequate. I appreciate that this would be the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Exchequer rather than the Minister of State, but the Government could consider a longer period of tax averaging. Above all, they could try to reassure farmers that there is not a huge amount of ignorance involved in ministerial decision taking. The feeling of those in the countryside is that, although Ministers may understand the theory, they are not clued in to the practice of what goes on.

On Monday morning I was in Maidstone market, where I studied the last three years' auction catalogues and heard at first hand from farmers how sharply prices have declined. The Ministry's figures show that, across farming as a whole, total income from farming has fallen by 35 per cent., but farming income alone—that of farmers and their spouses—has fallen by an overwhelming 45 per cent., which means that nearly half the income has gone. The value of output has declined by 11 per cent., yet output itself has risen. Despite the fact that more is being produced, there is still a net decline in the receipts taken.

I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that I have painted a dangerous picture and will not suggest that farmers are just being a bit awkward. I have quoted the factors chapter and verse. Farmers and those who depend on farming prosperity are entitled to know how the Government intend to deal with those serious issues.

10.12 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this important debate. She is right to seek to raise the issues. Hon. Members on both sides of the House accept the picture she paints, although they may not agree with all her florid language. She has described, on behalf of her constituents, the problems in respect of farmers' incomes. We have freely admitted that—we have made no secret about it in terms of the information that we have published—and she is right to bring the matter to the attention of the House, as other hon. Members have done recently.

In view of the nature of the hon. Lady's constituency, I was not certain whether her speech would go much wider. The subject of farmers' incomes is as long as a piece of string. I suspected that she would raise the difficulty that growers in Kent suffered last May because of the onset of an unusually hard frost. That has been the subject of parliamentary questions and correspondence with the Ministry ever since. The answer is the same as it has always been: we cannot and will not legislate for the weather. What happened was most unfortunate. Recently, farmers in Spain, Portugal and Italy suffered droughts, earthquakes and floods, but no aid has been given especially because of those unique weather conditions.

Miss Widdecombe: Does the Minister acknowledge that the Conservative Government compensated farmers after the 1987 hurricane, to the extent of £2 per tree? We were able to do that, so why cannot he?

Mr. Rooker: I do not remember compensation being paid, but I remember the events of 1987. People who watch Michael Fish's weather forecasts are constantly reminded of them, as I was last weekend in Kew by the mural of the devastation caused by the hurricane. I do not have the details of any compensation to hand, and I cannot deal with that matter tonight.

The Government are aware that agriculture is going through a difficult time: we have made that abundantly clear. There is no doubt that the past year has been a bad one for farm incomes generally and, as the right hon. Lady said, for the livestock industry in particular. There are various definitions of total income from farming, but there is no argument about the figures she gave. Farm income fell by 37 per cent. in real terms in 1997. Some sectors—

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: I must say a little more. I have a fair bit of time—rather more than I had in my previous Adjournment debate.

Some sectors have fared better than others, but averages can be misleading. The 25 per cent. fall in incomes for the general cropping sector is much less than the 51 per cent. fall for mixed farms, while that in the lowland sheep and cattle sector is 63 per cent. There is no question but that the principal cause of the across-the-board fall in incomes is the lower prices attracted by major commodities. As the right hon. Lady rightly said, the relative strength of sterling throughout 1997 has also had a major effect on prices attainable in the United Kingdom.

While sterling remains at its current high level, and there are structural surpluses in most agricultural sectors caused by over-production within the European Union, prospects for increased commodity prices, and therefore improved incomes in the short term, are not good. Everyone knows—I claim no special privilege—that Barclays bank has reviewed the prospects of agriculture. Its report notes the cyclical nature of farm incomes over the past 30 to 40 years. While agreeing with our short-term prognosis, and with the reasons behind it, Barclays predicts an upturn in the industry's fortunes in 1999.

I recognise the impact of the fall in farm incomes. The decline has been dramatic, particularly last year, and prospects are not good for this year. Although the decline has attracted the headlines and the difficulties are real, we must retain a sense of perspective when considering the damage to the industry as a whole.

[Mr. Rooker]

Incomes fell dramatically last year, but that fall followed several good years; some were very good. Incomes rose steadily from 1990, peaking in 1995. At columns 91-92 of yesterday's Hansard, there is a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams)—I apologise for my pronunciation. For example, in one farming sector, general cropping, net incomes in real terms at 1997 prices, deflated by the retail prices index, varied a great deal. The figures are: roughly £43,000 in 1989–90; £34,000 in 1990–91; £30,000 in 1991–92; £31,000 in 1992–93; £38,000 in 1993–94; £60,000 in 1994–95; £72,000 in 1995–96; £37,000 in 1996–97; and, provisionally, £28,000 in 1997–98.

There has been a great deal of variation in real terms. Some years were very good, others were modest, and there was a fall last year.

Mr. Tyler: The Minister will agree that farmers have long memories, and that they do not think that everything went wrong from 2 May. I hope that he is not saying that all sectors of the industry enjoyed the same profitability, as those figures imply. As a direct result of the previous Administration's cuts in support, livestock hill farmers have suffered incredible losses for several years. The cumulative effect is damaging. Barclays may be right to say that there will be an upturn in 1999, but some farmers will not make it to 1999.

Mr. Rooker: Hon. Members can look at Hansard. I gave information relating to dairy farms, cattle and sheep in less favoured areas, cattle and sheep in the lowlands, cereals, general cropping, pigs and poultry, mixed farming and all types of farming, excluding horticulture.

I chose the example I gave—in fact, I had marked it before the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald spoke—because I thought it more relevant, in general, to farms in the Kent area. It would be unfair for me to quote upland and less-favoured-area prices, which are worse. Nevertheless, the fluctuation is there.

There will be business failures in agriculture, just as there are in every other sector of commercial activity. Such failures, wherever they take place, are regrettable, but they are part and parcel of business life. It is not current income levels that determine whether an individual farm stays in business; that will vary according to individual circumstances, and what happens to the farm will relate more to indebtedness than to current income.

According to much of the information that is available, because of the number of good years that there have been recently, the level of indebtedness in agriculture is much lower than that in most other industries. There will always be examples in particular cases, but indebtedness—which is more likely to lead to bankruptcies than one year's low income—is much lower in agriculture than it is in industry as a whole. We must take a rational, long-term view.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): May I ask the Minister to answer a question that has not been addressed in this important debate? Does he not agree with my point about the reform of the common agricultural policy? In practice, the real problem is that we are dealing with an artificial framework that is in need of reform. Whether the pound is strong or weak, the bottom line is that the framework requires significant reform. Will the Minister be good enough to address that?

Mr. Rooker: Yes. Indeed, I intend to do so a couple of paragraphs later in my speech. The hon. Gentleman is right: we are not in a completely free and open market, and the rules that would apply in such circumstances do not apply here. No one claims that they do. The Government, however, cannot change the rules on their own. We are members of a single market; we are a member of the European Union; we are constrained enormously by the disparity between what we can do and what we want to do.

We were elected on a platform that made it clear that one of our key aims was to seek reform of the common agricultural policy. The CAP is a disaster, in terms of its effect on the British economy and food prices in Britain. It has almost been designed to stop, for example, our dairy industry competing in the world market, because of the quota system. We are opposed to quotas: we want them to be lifted. We have modest proposals for change on the table in the form of agenda 2000. They are all that is on the table, and, although they do not go far enough, they are what we must adopt and proceed with.

There is no common view—if I may use that term—in the member states of the European Union in favour of reform of the CAP. The United Kingdom and Sweden stand out as beacons in their support of sensible reform of the policy. Many other EU economies that are on the leading edge of competitive markets, science and high technology do not want change in the CAP. That constrains us in seeking an agreement with our partners in the European Union, and we cannot deal with the matter alone.

There is no time to go into the matter in detail, but parts of the industry differ. I did not say this earlier, but pigs and poultry are quite different from sheep and cattle, in that they are in a much freer and more open market. I invite hon. Members to read the written answer to which I referred earlier. If they do so, they will see that, by and large, over the period between 1989–90 and the present year—in real terms—in areas where there were no subsidies, incomes were much higher than in areas where there were subsidies. It is not all one-way traffic in respect of the CAP. The CAP is a problem, however. It is a constraint within which we have to work, and the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) was right to mention it.

Because of that problem, as shown by my right hon. Friend's statement of 3 December 1997, we must secure permission to make the payments that we wish to make to our farmers—not so much from our own Chancellor of the Exchequer, which would be right, as from Brussels. As everyone knows, Brussels did not accept the way in which we wanted to proceed as announced on 3 December. We kept the total package the same—£85 million of support. I accept that that was only to cattle and sheep farmers, and it probably will not affect much of the right hon. Lady's constituency, but the pattern changed between the two announcements. That was because of the need to get the agreement of Brussels.

The right hon. Lady raised other issues, which I would love to deal with if there were more time. She did not quite attack the proposed food standards agency, but Conservative Members will make up their minds when the legislation comes before the House, either when it is here in draft form, as we intend, or later. The agency must be paid for. It will be paid for—as everything is—by the consumer, one way or the other. The item in the White Paper, on which there is still consultation, was only an example. We said that, if the 600,000 food establishments in this country, which did not include farms, paid a levy of £100, it would bring in £60 million of new resources to assist with the agency's operation. One cannot argue that £60 million is a small sum—and I would not do so—but I would argue that £100 is a fairly small and modest sum.

If the right hon. Lady is arguing that using traceability to protect our food supply is not the future, she is wrong. [Interruption.] It appears that she does not argue that, so we agree that traceability must be the order of the day. In the end, it will probably apply throughout the whole of the food chain and in all sectors. I have made no commitments in that respect, but I think that that is the way in which we are going. With organic sheep farmers, for example, we have traceability. Sheep are tagged all the way through the system, but we do not have traceability in the rest of the sector.

Cattle traceability, of course, started under the previous Administration, which was absolutely right. A computerised system for Great Britain that meets our requirements will be up and running by the end of this year. We have had such a system in Northern Ireland for several years, which is why we hope to achieve the first breach in the ban.

The running of that system is exclusively for the benefit and in the interests of the industry as a whole. That has been accepted; no one argues about that. Therefore, I remind the right hon. Lady that, last week, in the four minutes that I had to reply to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), who in another life was my pair, I pointed out that we had not yet made our announcements and final decisions about the costs of traceability and specified risk material controls.

Miss Widdecombe: The Minister has three minutes left in which to answer my debate, having already taken a quarter of an hour. Do I gather from what he has said so far that, to the simple question, "What will this Government do to alleviate the current problems with farmers' incomes?" his answer is, "Nothing at all"?

Mr. Rooker: We are going to provide more money fast. We have already announced support of £85 million. If the right hon. Lady says that that does not matter and that no one wants it, she is wrong. We have promised that that will be paid, if possible, by the end of March and certainly by Easter. That is the aim.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) rose—

Mr. Rooker: I am not giving way again, because I have only a couple of minutes left.

The right hon. Lady raised many other issues. She has what I would call a chocolate-box image of the countryside. There are enormous difficulties and deprivation in the countryside. It is not the idyllic place she describes when she talks about the green belt. We are reversing the building programme in the green belt that we inherited from the previous Government. It is not urban dwellers who are digging up hedgerows and over-using pesticides. The image she presents is totally wrong.

Mr. Jack rose—

Mr. Rooker: I am not giving way to the right hon. Gentleman, because everyone knows that, at 10.30 pm, the debate finishes. I was hoping to ask him and the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald to deny that, this year, £1.7 billion is going to the livestock industry. The idea that we are doing nothing is ludicrous beyond belief. We are giving the livestock industry—

Mr. Jack rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has said that he is not going to give way, and this is, of course, a Back-Bench debate.

Mr. Rooker: In 1997-98, we are giving the livestock industry £1.7 billion. By anyone's standards, that is a massive sum of public expenditure. Conservative Members say, "Give more." We are working to the budget that we inherited from the Conservatives—[Interruption.]—including the mouthy Conservative Front Bencher, the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who shouts from a sedentary position.

The Government recognise the concern felt by farmers about the pressures faced by their industry and in particular about the immediate effect on farm incomes. We are doing what we can within the constraints of the European Union and the budget we inherited from the previous Government, consistent with our responsibilities to the rest of the population. Unlike the previous Government, we are pledged to work quickly for the long-term future of United Kingdom farming by seeking common agricultural policy reforms. During the presidency, we will do all we can to ensure our success and to ensure that our successors have to take matters forward.

If Opposition Members find that we are not spending the cash that they left the present Government for the industry, we will be pleased to look into it. The right hon. Lady has not yet given a single example of where we could use the money that is consistent, after examination, with what we have discovered. We have not had one example in terms of agrimoney—

The motion having been made at Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at half-past Ten o'clock.

Health Inequality

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

9.34 am

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I am grateful for this Adjournment debate because never has it been more important for the House to debate inequalities in health. After 18 long years when the divide between those in good health and those in bad health got worse than ever, for the first time we now have positive action from the new Labour Government and a commitment from the Minister for Public Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Ms Jowell), whom I am pleased to see in her place this morning, to do something about health inequality.

I have spent 11 years representing North Staffordshire, so it is not surprising that, along with my colleagues from the area, I want us to address the issue of health inequality. I want the Government's actions to mean something and to make a real difference to my constituents' lives. That is why I asked for this debate.

It is also fitting that, 150 years after the first public health Act and 50 years after the birth of the national health service, we now have a public health Green Paper, "Our Healthier Nation". We have until 30 April 1998 to submit our comments, so we need a countrywide debate on public health. That would be a first step towards improving the nation's health, and I hope that this morning's debate will stimulate that debate.

I want people in both the urban and rural areas of my constituency to discuss public health, and I want the debate to take place at local level: at work; in schools; in youth clubs; in voluntary organisations—I have received many representations from voluntary organisations about the importance of this morning's debate; in the community; in councils and in parish councils in rural areas; in sports halls, churches, halls, clubs, pubs and working men's clubs; in doctors' surgeries and clinics while people wait for treatment; and wherever people get together.

I welcome the four main categories set out in the Green Paper: heart disease and strokes; accidents; cancer; and mental health. It is important to debate the targets for those categories. I spent many years as president of the West Midlands Home Safety Council, which, along with many other organisations, such as the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, has long pressed for more to be done by local authorities to prevent accidents in the home. Obviously, more also needs to be done to prevent road traffic accidents, and accidents and disease at work.

I welcome the targets to reduce heart disease and strokes by a third, cancer deaths by a fifth and suicides by a sixth. I doubt whether anyone would challenge or question those laudable objectives and I hope that they will be discussed at length as the debate about public health takes place throughout the country.

I am concerned that, while the Government get on with changing the structure and framework of the NHS through the new NHS White Paper, I do not want them to lose sight of the important, all-embracing, over-arching concept of sustainable development, which recognises that the principles behind public health are part and parcel of all aspects of public policy. I welcome the White Paper, as it lays the foundation for beginning the process of modernisation and especially accountability, so that we can deliver uniformly high standards of health care. It consults, and puts a clinical focus on the four main targets.

This is a challenge for us all, and we must support our Minister for Public Health, no matter which side of the House we are on. We must help her in her co-ordinating role to ensure that the comprehensive spending reviews that are taking place across all Departments recognise the importance of public health policies. The Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation must tackle real needs, and the new health improvement programmes, which identify and meet local needs, must have the resources to do what is necessary.

I shall mention some of the consultation documents that are being discussed across the country. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has produced a White Paper, "Building Partnerships for Prosperity"; a review of planning guidance and of planning for the communities of the future. The housing conditions survey is important, as housing is crucial to health. A consultation document on contaminated land is due shortly, and a review of water charging is currently out for consultation.

The DETR has also produced a document on opportunities for change and a new strategy for a sustainable future. There are reviews of the crucial matter of national air quality and of regulation strategy, which are being undertaken by the Department of Trade and Industry, and new lottery legislation will bring in many bids across the country. All are integral to the promotion of an enhanced quality of life and improved public health.

The public health Green Paper makes many healthy references to the need for local authorities to work in public health partnerships with NHS trusts. A duty on local government and health trusts to work together to produce local health improvements is proposed. However, we must not fragment public health provision by leaving councils with insufficient means to close the huge health gap between the rich and the poor.

Health inequality is tied up with domestic metering of water and disconnections; energy efficiency in the home; the fact that the worst sewers are often in the oldest parts of urban areas; poverty wages, low-income households and the condition of people's homes; and a lack of sports facilities. Many schools in my constituency lack proper sports facilities: how can people take up healthy, active life styles without them?

Health inequality is also tied up with poor diet; unsound agricultural practices, such as the use of untreated abattoir waste as fertiliser for crops and the risk of that getting into the food chain; polluted air; stress; and low educational achievement—we know all about that in North Staffordshire. Unemployment also has an effect, and, in parts of my constituency, people are on a four-day working week. We must also urgently address the failing child support system.

I speak as the vice-president of the Institute of Environmental Health Officers. Environmental health officers often do not get the recognition that they deserve: they come a poor third in health authority partnerships. Indeed, a MORI survey for the Anchor Housing Trust showed that only 56 per cent. of health authorities consulted environmental health departments when putting together plans for 1998-99.

Just as Edwin Chadwick—an engineer, not a doctor—inspired medical officers of health and developments in public health, we must, as the millennium approaches, recognise the importance of public health to all areas of policy if we are to reduce ill health and health inequality. Ordinary people, just as much as doctors and clinicians, can contribute to improving public health.

That over-arching framework is as relevant to Europe as to the United Kingdom. I urge the Minister to press urgently for wider European Union public health competence through an extension of article 129 of the treaty of Rome when she chairs the European Union Health Council. The Institute of Environmental Health Officers would welcome the opportunity to work with the Government to achieve that.

The truth is that the previous Government failed to recognise the effects of their blatant cumulative under-resourcing of local authorities through the standard spending assessment formula and the abandonment of the resource allocation working party, which did much to redress the balance. Those of us who have been around for a while know that RAWP attempted to iron out the health inequalities that left people in many parts of the country suffering appalling ill health. Such people lived in rundown inner-city areas which traditionally depended on heavy manufacturing industry, but there were pockets of deprivation in rural areas, too.

Ill health reduces daily living to a remorseless and painful struggle for survival. Month by month, our national health services are merely firefighting. Hospital waiting lists are unacceptably long; efficiency savings to pay for treatments have to be made despite our injection of extra money; and litigation costs have to be paid because underfunding has meant that services cannot be provided.

We could start to improve the service if we were able to prevent ill health. The Green Paper will help, but the reality, at least for many of my constituents, is a world apart. That brings me to the second part of my speech—why I want the House to discuss these issues.

Health, good or ill, depends largely on where people live and on their circumstances. I do not think that it should. We in North Staffordshire consider ourselves fortunate. We are a proud community, and we look after one another as best we can. The performance of the Staffordshire ambulance service trust is such that an ambulance arrives at life-threatening emergencies after an average wait of six minutes 11 seconds. The average in all other cases is seven minutes nine seconds. That performance is not bettered anywhere in the United Kingdom; I doubt whether it is bettered in Europe.

In this financial year, the Staffordshire ambulance service trust has responded to 90.28 per cent. of life-threatening emergencies in eight minutes, 97 per cent. in 14 minutes, and 99.36 per cent. in 19 minutes. That is excellent, but there the good news ends. The bad news is that, in an area of 1,000 square miles, the trust had responded to 48,285 emergencies by 20 February this year.

We must learn the lessons of best practice from the trust, and recognise its experience and the improvements that it has made. That must be fed into the review. But the downside is the high death rate from chronic heart disease, which must be treated in the short term, and prevented in the long term.

In my constituency from 1981-92, the odds of people dying before their 65th birthday were 25 per cent. higher than the British average for someone of their age and sex. Furthermore, those odds were more than 75 per cent. higher than in Esher and Walton and in South Cambridgeshire, the constituencies with the lowest rates of premature mortality.

Hon. Members know that people can use statistics to show whatever they want. Whatever figures I consult, however, I receive the message that North Staffordshire, and Stoke-on-Trent in particular, rank highly in terms of relative deprivation. The public health common data set figures show that, in regard to most causes, Stoke has a standard mortality rate of more than 100. In the case of heart disease in men, the rate is 123, 23 per cent. above the average. That makes us 30th out of the 358 local authorities in England. In terms of accidents among women, we rank 23rd.

As for premature and infant mortality, in 1996 there were 5,597 perinatal deaths in England and Wales; there were 689 in the west midlands, and 57 in North Staffordshire. Since 1983, our rate has been consistently higher than the average, and consistently higher than the west midlands rate and the west midlands rate trend, never falling below 10 per 1,000.

Contributory factors include poor nutrition, social deprivation, teenage pregnancy—there is a high risk of teenage pregnancy in North Staffordshire—smoking and drinking alcohol during pregnancy, and inadequate standards of obstetric and paediatric care. Such inadequate standards have been identified as causes of some deaths in confidential inquiries throughout the United Kingdom, and North Staffordshire is clearly no exception.

It is not just infants who start off with reduced life expectancy. The Association of Retired Persons over 50 campaigns for the rights of older people. I am sure that many of us who are present today, if we have not quite reached 50, are not all that far from it.

The North Staffordshire pensioners convention and North Staffordshire Healthwatch campaign for improved services for older people, believing that discrimination on the basis of age rather than need leads to the delivery of inappropriate treatment and, in some instances, the complete absence of effective care. They are worried about the widening gulf between the treatment of older people and the treatment of those under retirement age. I do not want that to happen in my constituency.

Screening for breast cancer in women over 60 is a matter of special concern. I know that the House has discussed the issue before, but I want to flag it up briefly today. There is also a lack of adequate preventive treatment for osteoporosis and prostate cancer. I am especially concerned about health issues affecting women, because I think that women's health care is very important.

In North Staffordshire, we have a particular problem. It is no accident that we have a relatively high number of long-stay continuing-care beds. In our area, older people cannot necessarily afford private health care. Despite an extensive campaign to keep our NHS long-stay beds, 37 beds are mothballed at Stanfield hospital, and so far no progress has been made on a proposed private finance initiative bid for reprovision of beds at Westcliffe hospital, although it has already been formally agreed through consultation.

There is a good deal of fear and anxiety, because the legacy of underfunding—not just of the health service, but of social services—has left us short of resources for community care. I feel that I have a debt of honour to my elderly constituents. We must plan for the long term and the short term, and also plan transitional arrangements.

I have been inundated with briefings from a number of organisations that want to hammer home to the House just how unfair the system is to those who happen to live where services are insufficient, and whose particular illnesses are not given the priority allocated to them in other parts of the country. We have had another campaign in Stoke-on-Trent to prevent the proposed closure of the fertility unit by the health authority. Although we have had a minor victory, in that the unit has been reprovided, it has been reprovided in a private clinic. There is not enough money from the national health service to pay for treatment there. Those living elsewhere have access to fertility treatment, but there is a definite ceiling on the amount of money available in North Staffordshire.

Dental care is another problem. It is barely possible to gain access to a dentist at present. We currently have applications for extra bids to help the provision of dental care on the NHS in North Staffordshire. Our children have the worst dental health care record in the west midlands—hence our bid.

There are many indicators relating to coronary heart disease, strokes, lung cancer, schizophrenia and suicide. In every instance, the North Staffordshire rates are worse than the west midlands rates, and worse than the rates in England and Wales. I hope that the Minister will have a chance to examine the figures.

There are even worse figures. The extent of ill health in North Staffordshire is illustrated by data showing an increased use of health services in Stoke-on-Trent and North Staffordshire. In 1996–97, there were 170,230 finished consultant episodes at the two NHS trusts in North Staffordshire. That represents about 360 per 1,000 of population, compared with 230 for England as a whole.

The problems that my constituents face daily are illustrated by the fact that the average GP list size in North Staffordshire was 2,077, higher than the England average of 1,881. That average was the highest in the west midlands, and the ninth highest in England, as of 1 April 1997, according to statistics from the NHS executive.

Yesterday, I received a telephone call from a constituent aged 74, who had hardly ever had any NHS treatment. He, his wife and his son—who has had a stroke—have all been struck off by their GP, who does not have to give a reason. We have a shortage of GPs. Not enough trained GPs are being provided, and, in an area without a medical school, we cannot train the people we need.

I do not like painting a black picture, and I do not intend to do so this morning. We all live with the position daily in North Staffordshire, and we know how urgent is the need to deal with it. Some 10 years ago, the city council published a report called "Health of the City", which remains a blueprint for action, and confirms what I know from my surgeries.

It is clear that there are pockets of extreme ill health and deprivation in North Staffordshire's health authority area that urgently need to be tackled. The key indicators of risk of poor health in certain wards have led to their being designated health action areas. We are making progress, and doing a great deal to offset the problems. The designation of health action areas is a result of joint action that Stoke-on-Trent city council and Staffordshire Moorlands district council have already taken with the health authority. In those health action areas, the Jarman score is unacceptably high, but it is clear that we are making progress.

The problem is that many people cannot wait to be treated, no matter how much we are doing to put in extra money. Many cannot easily see doctors or dentists, and many must wait too long for social work support. Many cannot easily reach clinics. I am currently doing my best to stop the closure of a clinic in Fegg Hayes. We are hoping for a joint initiative to retain clinics in areas where they are needed, to provide family planning and other services.

It is obvious that there are not enough services to meet the needs of people in North Staffordshire. That may lead the House to conclude that our trusts, councils and voluntary organisations are not doing their best, but nothing could be further from the truth: they are doing the best that they can in very difficult circumstances. I want the Minister to know that. They are working in partnership to reduce health inequality in North Staffordshire, especially in those pockets of deprivation where health is worst.

The Green Paper sets out targets relating to specific illnesses, and calls for local initiatives jointly to tackle specific local problems.

We have already started that joint work in our health action areas, but we could do much more. There is a new unitary local authority in Stoke-on-Trent, and it could also do much more. As a result of wanting to do more, it has submitted a proposal for a health action zone. I want that bid to succeed, because it shows that we have the will and the vision and that there is local co-operation to address our specific problems.

I understood that need would play a large part in determining the areas that would succeed in being designated as health action zones. We in North Staffordshire are convinced that our bid is based on need, and we want it to succeed. We are concerned that the panel that is advising Ministers seems already to have excluded our bid. Only three of the six bids from our region are being forwarded with a regional office recommendation for consideration. There will be a decision at the end of March, and I fear that North Staffordshire will not be chosen, because our bid has not been forwarded. I urge the Minister to look in detail at our needs and our bid. We should be pleased to co-operate if she wishes to arrange a meeting.

[Ms Joan Walley]

I am unaware of the criteria under which bids have been reviewed by the NHS executive, because that information has not been made public. In the spirit of openness and accountability, I urge the Minister to consider carefully how she can assist us. If our bid has demonstrated the need for a health action zone but falls down in its detail, I ask the Minister to show some flexibility and offer us advice so that we can redraft our proposals and intensify our present action to address health inequality.

By asking for this debate, I could be accused of building false optimism and unreasonable short-term expectations. The Government warned us against that on page 82 of the Green Paper. North Staffordshire people are realistic and understand that they need long-term, sustained and co-ordinated effort. We realise that there are no quick fixes, but we want an understanding of how much there is to do, and a Government commitment to support us in our efforts.

10.2 am

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on securing a debate on a thoroughly important topic that affects the lives of many people. The publication of the White Paper on the national health service and the Green Paper on public health, both of which build on the considerable achievements of the previous Administration, means that the debate is timely.

The hon. Lady spoke about a range of inequalities in health care. I hope that she will understand when I say that I shall speak on only one—cancer care provision in the United Kingdom. Cancer remains our greatest medical problem. One in three people suffer from some form of cancer; one in four will die of it, and demographic changes mean that, by 2020, one person in two will get some form of cancer.

It is essential for the Government to support the previous Government's recognition that cancer is one of the main challenges facing our health service. The previous Government commissioned a report on a strategic plan for cancer services. It was published in 1995 and became known as the Calman-Hine report. It is one of the best reports that I have read in the past 20 years. It was practical and focused, and it has already led to considerable achievements in the provision of cancer care. However, there is still much to do.

The aim of the Calman-Hine report was to ensure that all patients

"received a consistently high level of service regardless of where they lived."

It highlighted

"variations in recorded outcomes of treatment" and advocated that

"all patients should have access to a uniformly high quality of care in the community or hospital".

Much work was carried out under the previous Administration to make that strategic plan a reality, but much remains to be done. I urge the Government to take the opportunity that is presented by the Green Paper on public health to make fair and equal access to specialist, high-quality cancer care their priority.

Perhaps I may be allowed a short commercial. For some years, I have worked with the Cancer Macmillan Fund, which is a superbly run charity. It does not waste money, but does what it is meant to do, which is to help people. It does that in a number of ways, one of which is by working with the NHS and with Government. It does not spend its time complaining but gets on with the job. My commercial is that those who are thinking of giving money to charity should put the Cancer Macmillan Fund on their list.

That charity has made it clear to me that there are significant variations in the availability and quality of services—the so-called cancer lottery. I congratulate the charity on its work with the NHS, which has benefited many patients. Much of its pump-priming work will be known to the House. It is the only charity that works with the NHS and others to provide cancer patients with expert nursing and medical care. It also provides a service that is often lacking in the NHS because it offers emotional and practical support from the point of diagnosis onwards, so that patients and their families may continue with productive working lives.

There are many examples of health care inequalities in tackling cancer, but I shall give just a few, because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. Fewer than 50 per cent. of cancer patients are referred to a specialist for treatment, and only a fraction have access to clinical nurse specialists such as Macmillan. There is considerable evidence that some black and ethnic groups and older people are less well served than other members of the community. For instance, there is a low uptake among the Asian population for screening and palliative care, and there is a chronic shortage of information in languages other than English.

People in rural areas also have limited access to specialist services. I have not even touched on the widely differing arrangements for different types of cancer. For example, lung cancer patients often receive what is coyly called sub-optimal treatment whereas breast cancer patients rightly have a fast-track diagnosis.

One fundamental element links all those issues, and it is the lack of appropriate patient information on the types of services that are available, on the nature and course of the disease and, most importantly, what patients have the right to expect from those who are caring for them. Such information is not expensive to produce, but it is critical if we are to deal with what is already a scourge and will get even worse. Patients can demand better services only if they have access to the most basic information on their condition. Too often, that information is lacking.

The Government have made some welcome commitments in their recent White Paper and Green Paper, which I hope will end those forms of health inequality. However, fine words have to be supported by action and backed by resources. There is—to give one specific example—a considerable shortage of clinical and medical cancer specialists. The Government have given a pledge: to ensure that everyone with suspected cancer will be referred to a specialist within two weeks of their general practitioner recommending that course. That will be achieved only if action is taken now to recruit and train new postholders—otherwise, it will not happen.

I urge Ministers to seize this opportunity to work with the national health service and with voluntary organisations, such as Macmillan, to make Calman-Hine—one of the best reports of the past 20 years—a working reality.

10.10 am

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on introducing this debate on health inequalities—an issue that Ministers in the previous Government completely failed to address properly. One of the most disappointing features of the debate following the Green Paper's launch by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health was the continuing inability of Opposition Front Benchers to recognise the clear links between ill health and poverty, ill health and unemployment, and ill health and poor housing.

The London Research Centre—one of many research bodies working in the subject—has published many excellent reports, which have consistently highlighted the link between ill health and deprivation. Mortality rates in London are consistently worse in areas of deprivation. In the most deprived inner-London boroughs, mortality rates are up to twice as high as in some outer-London boroughs.

Therefore, one of the most positive aspects of the recent Green Paper on public health is the Government's commitment to improving health for the worst-off in our society and to narrowing the obvious health gap. Other positive features of the Green Paper are explicit recognition of the link between childhood injuries and social deprivation; of higher mortality rates for coronary heart disease and cancer among men of working age in the bottom social classes; and of rising incidence of poor mental health, particularly among the socially disadvantaged.

It is frustrating that it has taken so long for Government health policy to address health inequalities. As far back as 1980, the Black report concluded:

"much of the evidence on social inequalities in health can be adequately understood in terms of specific features of the socio-economic environment."

We should not have had to wait until 1998 before the Black report's conclusions were listened to and acted upon.

The failure to acknowledge and address the socio-economic factors affecting health was the most serious omission of the 1992 document "The Health of the Nation". The document's only reference to those socio-economic factors was made in section F of the appendix, which mentioned "variations in health status between different socio-economic groups".

Sadly, it went on to conclude:

"the reasons for these variations are by no means fully understood".

In cold light, such apparently wilful ignorance of the causes of health inequality is astounding. I do not believe that those who drafted "The Health of the Nation" simply did not know or understand the causes of health inequality. The previous Administration—who were responsible for great increases in poverty and inequality—simply did not dare to admit that growth in the numbers of those on low incomes might have wider social consequences. They chose instead to focus almost entirely on individuals' own behaviour, failing completely to own up to the consequences for the nation's health of economic policies that generated increasing poverty, poorer-quality housing and higher unemployment levels.

As the Green Paper clearly states, poverty and unemployment can result in problems in keeping the home warm, may inhibit healthier life styles and increase the likelihood of accidents. The Government's welfare-to-work programme to tackle unemployment by offering a new deal to young people, the long-term unemployed and lone parents will be crucial—with the introduction of a national minimum wage—in beginning to tackle immediately those two key causes of inequality: low incomes and lack of employment opportunities.

Establishment of the Prime Minister's social exclusion unit—focusing on the needs of those on low incomes, who face a combination of social problems—will generate welcome longer-term initiatives to tackle health inequalities.

In my constituency, my local authority is due to receive next year about £2.3 million under the capital receipts initiative—part of a national programme that will, over the next two years, provide almost £800 million to enable a much more ambitious programme of repairs and improvements to our housing stock than would have been possible had the previous Administration's plans been continued. The measures will help tenants in social housing—who are usually the least well-off and most vulnerable to ill health—to be able to live in healthier domestic environments, free from the twin spectres of damp and overcrowding that not only damage our lungs and our respiratory system but increase the likelihood of accidents, sleeplessness and the spread of infections.

Increased energy efficiency programmes will be deliverable by the Energy Saving Trust now that the threat of a £5.5 million funding cut has been lifted by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor has cut value added tax on energy saving materials. Those programmes and the resources provided under the capital receipts initiative will be crucial in tackling the health problems of the least well-off that are caused by living in cold homes.

The Government have begun the task of confronting the inequalities in income, housing and job opportunities that are also the causes of major health inequalities. We have to ensure that international, national, regional and local partnerships for health improvement are developed by all key stakeholders. Such partnerships must be sustained and rigorously monitored to ensure that they are appropriately targeted and successful in narrowing—and eventually eliminating—health inequalities.

The success in Europe of my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health in securing European Union agreement on ending tobacco advertising and sponsorship is one positive example of international action to reduce the greater incidence of smoking in low-income families. If our targets are to be achieved, it is essential also that effective work across Departments—which has already started, as the Green Paper demonstrates—continues.

Focused and co-ordinated policies in delivering long-term reductions in health inequalities will be crucial also at a regional and particularly at a local level. I look forward to a London regional development agency and a Greater London strategic authority focusing on health inequalities across the London region.

[Mr. Gareth R. Thomas]

Too often, public health has been the cinderella service for health authorities, to the chagrin of many of the staff working in those authorities. Public health has not been singled out for development and has often been the first service to be targeted for service cuts. I welcome the important development of primary care groups, which will rightly shift health authorities' thinking to focus much more on improving health and away from concentrating on episodes of illness.

I look forward to my own Brent and Harrow health authority developing—in tandem with the council, local voluntary groups and other statutory bodies—a health improvement programme to help achieve the Green Paper's national targets and to tackle local priorities. Health action zones are a particularly welcome initiative in the Green Paper to focus investment and to generate impetus in tackling health inequalities in areas of considerable deprivation. The zones must generate long-term and sustainable strategies to confront those health inequalities.

Despite my constituency's relatively wealthy image, it has some significant pockets of poverty and poorer health. Just as Harrow will benefit from the health authority's—I hope successful—bid for a Brent health action zone, so we must ensure that best practice in the health action zones that are established is quickly identified and disseminated to all health authorities.

The most effective initiatives to date in tackling health inequalities have been born out of partnerships between a range of agencies and groups of local people. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North recognised, new duties on local authorities and NHS bodies to work together to promote well-being in their areas will help to deepen and cement the effective local joint working which is crucial to the success of the Green Paper.

The desire to improve health must also be at the core of regeneration initiatives in our inner-city areas and on rundown estates and part of the Government's wider drive to make urban areas more attractive and healthier neighbourhoods in which to live.

An integrated transport policy—for example, the provision of safe cycling and walking routes—will help to ensure better air quality, improve levels of fitness and lead to fewer accidents in areas of deprivation. In many such areas, banks and shopping facilities have been withdrawn, making access to the cheapest and most nutritious foods difficult. Credit unions, food co-operatives and local exchange trading systems all have a role to play in improving access to a range of services that tackle inequalities.

As regional development agencies work to increase investment, I hope that they will focus specifically on areas of high deprivation and will have a strong public health dimension to their work.

Measures to make sport and physical activity in general more accessible are essential components of a healthy environment, whether at school, in the workplace or in the wider community. Research by the English Sports Council clearly shows the link between unemployment and a sedentary life style. I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North about the lack of decent sports facilities in many areas. In my constituency, a number of key communities are a considerable distance from proper sports facilities, and this problem needs to be tackled.

I congratulate some of our major sporting governing bodies, such as the Rugby Football Union and the English Sports Council, on targeting some of their development work on areas of great deprivation. I hope that the White Paper, when it appears after the consultation period, will encourage increased partnerships between sporting clubs and their communities to tackle health inequalities. The decision to stop the sale of school playing fields is a crucial step in the development of healthier schools, where pupils take regular exercise and are encouraged to participate in sports.

I especially welcome the proposal for a network of healthy living centres, funded by £300 million from the lottery, to complement the drive to focus statutory bodies on the health of their communities. Healthy living centres will be an important boost in tackling health inequalities in areas of deprivation. They will enable local communities to have access to a range of health-related programmes appropriate to local needs in areas where, perhaps, existing health and fitness facilities are either off-putting or, as in my constituency, difficult to get to.

At last we have a Government who are focusing on the key link between inequality of income and inequality of health. The nonsensical idea that poverty and poor health were not related has at last, thank goodness, been discredited and discarded. Using the tools in the Green Paper, I look forward to working with the Government, the new Greater London authority, and, especially, stakeholders in my constituency to tackle health inequalities in Harrow.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on her wide-ranging and comprehensive introduction to this important debate. She clearly showed that there is inequality in health, and I think that every hon. Member could have made a similar speech, perhaps using different examples.

The problem is that we have no longer a national health service but a fragmented one. What one can expect depends not on one's clinical need but on where one lives—it is a lottery by postcode. We need the Government to declare what they will deliver to users of the health service and what people's core entitlements are. If we cannot deliver a comprehensive entitlement, let us be honest about it. It is wrong to leave it to clinicians to cover up for politicians who are not prepared either to raise the money or to suppress the expectations of the people who rely on the health service.

Mention has been made of the allocation of resources. We can make wonderful speeches about what we are trying to achieve, but without resources we cannot do anything. We need to look again at how resources are allocated. RAWP, the resource allocation working party, went a long way, but it was very insensitive. We must have a system that considers not only patients' profiles—including age, incidence of illness and social and economic deprivation, which are important factors in determining the input of resources to a particular area—but the cost of delivering care.

It is more expensive to deliver comprehensive core services in an isolated area. I know that the Government are examining rurality as one aspect of this problem, but I make a special plea for those who experience a unique aspect of isolation—those who live in island communities in England. Such communities in Scotland are recognised as having a greater need, and I hope that there will be a similar recognition south of the border.

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, North made a very good case for partnership and the encouragement of partnership. I welcome the health action zones that the Government have introduced as pilot projects. I hope that they will be bold and choose a wide range of pilots. It is sad that they are restricting themselves to 10 to 12, and I hope that they will have a rethink.

We are getting messages telling us that we may or may not be successful in respect of the pilot projects, but I hope that the Government will encourage local enthusiasm where it exists, because enthusiastic people tend to deliver, no matter what the resources. If one thing has kept the NHS going in spite of all our concerns, it is the commitment of the people working in it. It is for the politicians to encourage that commitment, and a wider acceptance of health action zone bids will go some way to fostering that.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I too congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley), not only on securing the debate, but on introducing it in the way she did. As is clear even from this debate, we might have different views and different suggestions as to how to tackle the problems, but there is no doubt that there are inequalities in health provision.

The hon. Lady drew on her constituency experience as a starting point, but the figures for her constituency also tell a wider tale. She referred us to the public health common data and the standardised mortality ratios. They show that Stoke is below the national average only in cerebro-vascular disease. That is bad news: I am not saying that Stoke is a terrible place to live, any more than she did, but it clearly concerns her.

However, the picture is mixed, because the same figures show that Stoke is below the national average when it comes to infant mortality rates, with about 5.5 deaths per 1,000 live births compared to 6.1 per 1,000 in England as a whole. That brings us to the "gap" about which we have heard so much today.

In 1995, the age-standardised death rate per 100,000 of the population in Stoke-on-Trent was 860, compared with 1,056 in 1985. Both those figures for Stoke were higher than the averages for England in those years, which were 748 and 894 respectively. Interestingly, if one compares the average rates in 1985–87 with those for 1993–94, one finds that, in percentage terms, the reduction has been greater in Stoke than nationally. One could ask, "Is my glass half full or half empty?" I accept that one could say that there was more room for improvement in Stoke, so the decline would be greater. That is a perfectly fair point, which needs to be made.

If the health gaps between social classes widened in the 1980s, that must be seen in the context of a declining mortality rate for all classes. For men aged 35 to 64, age-standardised death rates fell by 32 per cent. for classes one and two between 1976–81 and 1986–92. The highest fall—44 per cent.—was experienced by socio-economic group three, whereas there was a 21 per cent. fall for groups four and five.

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, North reminded us that we all use statistics to back our particular cases, but I mention those figures because they show how careful one must be in using the gap as a measure of success or failure. I suspected that the hon. Lady—I hope that she will take this as a compliment—was going to make more of the gap, as the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) did, but she was right not to.

The gap is a relevant fact and indicator, but what matters more is the absolute standard of treatment that the poorest and most disadvantaged members of society receive. We could, for example, imagine a situation in which the gap had narrowed even though the absolute position of the poor had worsened. No one would regard that as a measure of success. It is too simplistic to argue—as people often do—that the continuing gap between the rich and poor must mean that the situation is worsening. I compliment the hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, North on not overplaying that argument.

In the debate, there has been more than a hint of the great cry,

"Four legs good, two legs bad".

It was suggested that everything that happened under the previous Administration was bad, whereas everything that will happen under this Administration will be good, and that the previous Government allocated insufficient resources, whereas things will be much better now. I do not think that the figures substantiate that argument.

Ms Walley: I made it clear that the setting up of the health action areas has made a significant difference. I want us to address the current situation.

Mr. Nicholls: I am sure that the hon. Lady is absolutely right in that, but it is not the case that, when the new Government took office, they found that the previous Government had applied manifestly inadequate resources. I shall not blind the House with statistics, but the previous Government spent some £80,000 every minute on the national health service. One can always cry, "Even more should have been spent," but that was a substantial sum.

The third progress report on the "Health of the Nation" project, which was published in July 1996, showed that progress had been made on 18 of the 21 targets. The death rate from coronary heart disease for those under 65 had fallen by 19.2 per cent. and by 12.5 per cent. for those between 65 and 74. The death rate from breast cancer in women aged 50 to 69 had fallen by 9.6 per cent. The death rate from strokes among those aged between 65 and 74 had fallen by 14.3 per cent., and the death rate from lung cancer among men aged under 75 had fallen by 13.9 per cent.

We are debating this subject against a background of substantial improvement in the nation's health. As the hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, North said, we do no good by saying that the position is worse than it is.

[Mr. Nicholls]

Numerous studies have made the connection between poverty and ill health. The hon. Member for Harrow, West seemed to take the view that the wicked old Tories had always said that there was no such link. I am not trying to avoid a good argument—I am always in favour of one if necessary—but the hon. Gentleman is wrong. People sometimes advance the view that the cause of ill health is poverty, and that ill health will disappear at a stroke if poverty is abolished. That is an attractive view, but numerous studies show that it is not so.

The Minister may mention—or we may hear about them in the continuing debate—the various reports that are cited as evidence that poverty causes ill health. Sir Douglas Black's report is the most famous; it is often cited as showing the linkage beyond doubt. However, the Black report said that the argument is much more subtle and complicated. For example, it found that health inequalities related not so much to poverty as to the way in which different parts of the population used health services. It suggested that the lower occupational classes made greater use of general practitioner services, but that their use of preventive health care was markedly lower than that of higher occupational classes. That argument was confirmed in a study by the King's Fund in 1995.

There are other factors that are not directly related to poverty. The Policy Studies Institute report on aspects of health inequality, which received some publicity, argued that the differences between ethnic groups and between ethnic groups and whites could not be explained by the disadvantage that was experienced in the country of birth; those who were born in Britain or migrated at early age were, if anything, likely to have less good health.

The report also emphasised the significant variations within specific ethnic groups, and said that a key factor appeared to be socio-economic status. Nevertheless, it said that it was unlikely that that was the only cause; if it were, it would be hard to explain why ill health in one group was demonstrated through increased risk of hypertension, whereas in another group it manifested itself in heart disease. The report also suggested that biology and culture, with other factors such as the knowledge and experience of racism, might also be relevant.

I make those points not to muddy the waters; I want to clarify the arguments. The link exists, but it is more complicated than has been suggested. People may be poor because they are in ill health, and there are a range of other factors, including environmental and genetic.

We should also consider life styles. We now know that smoking wreaks devastation on the population's health. No one—whether rich, middling or poor—much above the age of 10 does not realise that smoking is harmful.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: The example of smoking is particularly apposite. Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the incidence of smoking is greater among low-income families than among high-income families? Does not that demonstrate the need to tackle inequalities of income as well as the other inequalities to which he has referred?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken; one cannot say that poverty drives people to smoke. We have to accept that, ultimately, people are responsible for their health. Some people use poverty as an excuse and ignore what is in their best interests. One cannot say that people who are poor or on low incomes are entitled to turn away their faces from the damage caused by smoking.

Smoking, whether one has a high, middle or low income, is devastating. I give the Government full credit for the fact that they have made that abundantly clear, and done a great deal to publicise the damage that smoking does. I believe that a forthcoming White Paper will make the same point.

Whatever we may have had to say in the past—it may be relevant to say it again in the future—about the fact that sometimes, even in taking forward a good policy, one can unexpectedly strike an uncertain note, the fact is that the Government have made it clear where they stand on smoking, and that is a jolly good thing.

I want to leave sufficient time for the Minister for Public Health to respond, but first I shall comment on a note that I detected, more in the speech by the hon. Member for Harrow, West than in that by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North—perhaps because, like me, the hon. Lady has been in the House long enough for a certain cynicism to sink in—to the effect that, somehow, everything will now be sweetness and light.

I do not necessarily see that. Yes, some things in the Green Paper on public health were worth while, but the targets were cut from more than 20 to four. So far as one can compare them—that is not easy, and it probably was not intended to be—the four targets are less exacting than those in "The Health of the Nation".

The Minister will correct me if she thinks that I have it wrong, but I see nothing in the Green Paper that deals with inequalities in health in particular. Obviously, that is the dimension of the national health service that we are talking about today.

I am not the only one who says that. Let us look at the reception that the left-of-centre press gave the Green Paper. We now have four targets, none of which seems to address health inequalities specifically. That aspect has been criticised by both health groups and journalists.

The Financial Times said:

"ministers have dropped plans for targets to cut the health gap between the social classes. Karen Caines, director of the Institute of Health Service Management said: 'on this most crucial issue of health inequality they have bottled out. Without measurable targets, even over a long time-scale, there will be less pressure for change and less scope to hold them to account.'"

There was a leader in The Guardian, too. On the whole, Guardian leaders do not give comfort to Conservative spokesmen—[Interruption.] I suspect that that intervention was good enough to put on the record, but I did not hear it.

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): We have not found them helpful, either.

Mr. Nicholls: It is always nice to enable a Whip to record something for posterity. Let me assure the hon. Gentleman that he will not find what I am about to read helpful, either, but he may find it true.

The Guardian leader said:

"The Government is wrong to shrink the number of targets from 27 to four . . . Most serious of all is the absence of targets for reducing health inequalities. Anti poverty campaigners must insist on their inclusion. There must be a specific commitment to close the gap".

There is more from the Health Service Journal in the same vein:

"King's Fund chief executive Julia Neuberger said, '. . . we do have to measure progress in reducing inequalities, otherwise there is a danger that no one will take responsibility and be held to account'".

I could read out more of the same sort of thing.

I must say in passing that the wholesale closure of hospital facilities in London, although the Labour party said a little while before the election that it had no plans—[Interruption.] I shall go through it all if hon. Members want. There is the closure of the accident and emergency department at Guy's and of the Greenwich district general hospital; there is the transfer of facilities from Queen Charlotte's hospital to Hammersmith hospital, and many other similar developments throughout London. It is all about hospital closures and the reduction of facilities in areas of high social deprivation.

It is not only Conservatives who are entitled to raise doubts about the idea that nothing was done under the previous Government and nothing like enough was spent, yet that, under the present Government, everything will be different. The left-wing press is expressing the same doubts.

The argument is not as easy as it may seem. Inequalities in health must be addressed, but as for the idea that simply by a change in Government one can produce a brave new dawn in which complex problems become simple, I do not believe it. But I shall wait and see what the Minister has to say.

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I begin by adding to the congratulations offered to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) on prompting the debate and providing an opportunity for one of the best debates on the issue that we have had for some time. We are grateful to my hon. Friend for that, and for the way in which she has raised issues of such direct concern to her constituents.

I shall deal first with some of the general issues arising from the Green Paper on public health and the response to it. It has two broad aims. One is to increase the length of healthy life, and the second is to close the health gap. For the first time in 18 years, there is the recognition that inequalities in health linked to social class have got worse.

For example, if, between 1991 and 1993, all men had had the same death rate as those in social classes I and II, there would have been more than 17,000 fewer deaths each year. Children born today into social class V are five times more likely to be killed in an accident before they are 15 than children born into social class I. The litany of evidence in support of the existence of health inequality goes on.

We should not take a simplistic view of health inequality, but we must start by recognising that it exists. The poorer people are, the more likely they are to be ill. For example, people in social class IV or V are more likely to face every illness—except, I think, melanoma—than people in social class I or II.

The case for the existence of health inequality—the link between poverty and ill health—is clear, but the story is not as simple as that. That is why the Green Paper does not take a simple deterministic view of ill health and poverty, but recognises the important role of confronting poverty as a way of improving health.

We also draw attention to the inequalities between different ethnic groups and between regions. The rate of heart disease is three times lower for men in Oxfordshire than for men in Manchester. We need to take such regional inequalities as seriously as other manifestations of inequality, including inequalities between men and women.

When we talk about tackling health inequality, we are talking about tackling the reasons that divide us as individuals in our enjoyment of good health, and about recognising the many factors that are brought to bear. Some of those are determined early in our lives and others later, and they result in a differential expectation of good health between men and women, and between people from different social classes and ethnic backgrounds. The expectation even varies according to where people live.

The inheritance is complicated, and things were not helped by the previous Government's refusal to recognise the link between poverty and ill health, and to confront the complex nature of inequality. The targets that we have set to meet our two overriding aims of improving healthy life expectancy and tackling the health gap aim to yield two results.

The first is a reduction in avoidable deaths. More than half the people who die under the age of 65 die from cancers or from circulatory disease, including heart disease or stroke. If we are to make an impact in reducing preventable death, we have to concentrate our efforts on those areas which represent the greatest risk.

It is important to recognise the need to establish a proper balance between nationally determined targets and those that measure specific problems in relation to particular local needs. It is not true to say that we have refused to set inequality targets. The better informed commentators—the leader in the British Medical Journal, Professor Julian Le Grande and others—have made that absolutely clear. They have endorsed the Government's approach in reducing the number of targets, and linking targets to a clear strategy for action.

Setting national targets for inequality is a complex and inexact science, which is why the Government have commissioned Sir Donald Acheson to review the evidence relating to inequality and to provide guidance on the areas of Government policy where action to reduce health inequality which impacts on other aspects of policy is likely to be most productive. In that respect, as in all other aspects of our health policy, we are pursuing a common approach, which is to apply what works, based on the best available evidence. Through consultation, and in the light of Sir Donald's conclusions, we shall reach a judgment as to whether or not to set national inequality targets; but we shall urge local health authorities to set inequality targets in the context of health improvement programmes.

We are determined to deliver a strategy, and it is one of the toughest challenges facing the Government. As my hon. Friends the Members for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) and for Stoke-on-Trent, North made abundantly clear, delivering improvements in health, especially to the poorest, will rely on successful

[Ms Tessa Jowell]

Government policy across a range of issues, including getting people off benefit and into work, improving educational standards and tackling environmental problems such as air pollution and congestion. Those are all vital ways of improving health and reducing avoidable death, as well as being policies for economic renewal and regeneration.

Cross-Government working and partnerships at local level will also be key, but we need to recognise that success in delivering the strategy will rely on effort in three broad areas. First, the Government must take the action that only the Government can take. Secondly, through health action zones, the single regeneration budget, education action zones and the range of regeneration initiatives and health improvement programmes, we must ensure a local fit to local circumstances when addressing local priorities.

Thirdly, we must all recognise that we bear a responsibility to ourselves and to our families for improving and safeguarding our health. Only if we secure properly balanced action in those three areas—Government action, local intervention and action and personal responsibility—will we begin to see progress in those areas where progress has been elusive thus far. That is the essential national contract for better health which sits at the heart of the Government's approach.

I shall now deal quickly with some of the important points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North. With other hon. Members, she pointed out the extent of inequality whereby areas of poverty and poorer health can exist alongside areas of relative affluence. Her own constituency clearly illustrates that point.

The national average mortality from heart disease is 42 per 100,000 people, whereas it is 53 per 100,000 in North Staffordshire, and that picture is repeated when we look at other causes of premature death: death rates from stroke are worse than average, as are those from lung cancer; infant mortality is worse; and schizophrenia and suicide are more common. Those are only averages, which conceal pockets of deprivation and poor health in wards that suffer problems equal to the worst in the country.

I should also underline the evidence of great enthusiasm and resilience shown by voluntary organisations, the local authority and the local health authority in the face of that deprivation in my hon. Friend's constituency. I have read with great interest their recent bid for health action zone status and of their bid to the single regeneration budget, and their work with the World Health Organisation on the healthy cities initiative. All those initiatives, to which so much effort has been devoted, show that there is real spark and a commitment to get to grips with the problems facing her constituents.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will forgive me if, having given her every assurance about the careful consideration being given to the health action zone bids from her constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West, I do not make any announcements today about successful applicants. However, whether or not their bids are successful, all the 41 authorities that have bid for health action zone status should use the effort and partnerships developed for the bid as the foundation for continued progress in tackling health inequality.

I reiterate the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North about fertility services in North Staffordshire. I note that the health authority has been taking positive action to compare its expenditure on fertility services with that of other health authorities.

Although I am conscious that all health authorities need to balance local spending with local need, I would encourage my hon. Friend's local health authority to ensure that provision is in keeping with the level of service available elsewhere in the country. In passing, I pay tribute to the Staffordshire ambulance service: it is a beacon to other services, and another example of successful local endeavour.

Let me now deal with some of the other aspects of the broader relationship between the Government's approach to public health and the regeneration of the national health service. The Government view the White Paper "The new NHS: Modern—Dependable" and the Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation" as components in the plan to improve the health of the people of this country.

Let me restate the guiding framework, which was set out in our election manifesto and repeated in the NHS White Paper and within which treatment—whether for cancer or for any other condition—will be delivered to the people of this country:

> "If you are ill or injured there will be a national health service there to help; and access to it will be based on need and need alone—not on your ability to pay, or on who your GP happens to be, or on where you live."

We are deeply concerned about inequalities in access to treatment, which is why the fair access dimension is one of the key performance measures for the new NHS. We are also concerned that areas whose residents are in greatest need of health care may not be getting their fair share of health care resources. We are determined to make every possible effort to ensure fairness in access and in treatment.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Jowell: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not. We have almost run out of time, so I shall not take his intervention, other than to say that I accept his analysis that the cancer care framework set out in the Calman-Hine report provides a model for the development and delivery of health care services in other areas. The Government have made it clear through the development of service frameworks that we intend to build on that approach to provide an integration of prevention, health promotion, community care, primary care and acute care, available where it is needed and on the basis of need alone.

Let me finish by recalling the words of William Farr, the first Registrar-General, who said 150 years ago:

> "Good health is as dear to the rich as it is to the poor."

We are determined to remove the many obstacles which stand in the way of the poor enjoying the good health to which they are entitled.

Strategic Defence Review

11 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank you and the House for the opportunity to have an Adjournment debate on this important subject. I applied for an Adjournment debate on the strategic defence review before Christmas, as I thought it unlikely that we would have an opportunity to have a major debate on it before it was published some time in the spring or summer. It is coincidental that the debate has been selected this week, against the background of the Iraq crisis. There is no conspiracy in the Speaker's Office; this also happens to be the week in which the Defence Committee visits Washington, but this is not a method by which we can debate defence in the absence of the distinguished members of the Select Committee.

This is an opportunity for hon. Members to question the Minister about the strategic defence review and for him to provide an interim report on where we are. There is a rumour that the Secretary of State for Defence, apart from official appearances in the House, is now in purdah and will no longer accept outside speaking engagements for fear of lifting the veil on the strategic defence review.

We last debated defence in the two-day defence debate in October. Since then, we have had a good Adjournment debate in November, introduced by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), on the defence industry. I compliment the hon. Gentleman on his assiduity and his great interest in defence. In December, we had an Adjournment debate, introduced by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), on the important subject—given the Iraq crisis—of anti-missile defence.

It is usual at this time of the year, as more experienced hon. Members know, to have single-service defence debates. Perhaps at the end of the debate the Minister will confirm whether the Ministry of Defence intends to go ahead with the single-service debates, or whether we will have a further hiatus.

The strategic defence review is as much about continuity as change. One thing we should establish this morning is how much is continuity and how much is change and what that change means for the United Kingdom and for defence. I do not have to tell the House that defence is still important. I would like to believe that there is a consensus among the majority of hon. Members that the defence of the United Kingdom, our people and our interests is of paramount importance and cannot be taken lightly. It cannot be cut back, nor can the capability be given up lightly as we may be forced to readopt it in the event of a major crisis. Ultimately, the defence capability of our country is a war-fighting capability. The defence of our country gives us the political leverage that is important in the new world disorder in which we live.

The defence budget, of nearly £22 billion, is by no means the largest in Whitehall; it comes well below social services, health and education. I do not need to remind the House that the MOD has 210,000 regular service personnel and employs 109,000 civilians. It is UK industry's largest customer—11,000 UK companies have a defence interest. Defence affects virtually every Member of the UK Parliament. Some 10 per cent. of all UK industrial employment and 11 per cent. of all industrial output is connected with defence. Defence exports are probably worth in excess of £4 billion a year. It is a major earner for UK plc.

During the Prime Minister's statement to the House yesterday on the Iraq crisis, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition asked whether the Prime Minister agreed that the "strategic defence review, which is now approaching completion, could not reasonably conclude that there is scope for reducing the defence budget?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"I have always thought and said that this country's defence forces are vital to our foreign policy and Britain's standing in the world. That is precisely why the strategic defence review will ensure that our armed forces have a secure and certain future."—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 177.]

On that, we would all agree, and that is the litmus test for the review. I sincerely hope that those words of the Prime Minister will not come back to haunt him in six months' time.

I want to take the Government at their word. They claim, not only on defence but across the board, that they are into greater openness and public accountability. The Government have continued, and indeed expanded, the policy of previous Conservative Secretaries of State by providing more information about defence. It is exceptionally good that the wide range of expertise in our universities and establishments of higher education on defence and security matters has been consulted. The defence industries have been brought in, as have non-governmental organisations, which have much to offer. The public have also been consulted. We can all agree on that and the Government have undertaken a major programme.

That is the easy bit. The hard bit is making decisions. How do we assess the progress of the Government's strategic defence review? How do we judge the strategic defence review when it is published? I suggest five tests. First, does it provide effective security and defence for the United Kingdom? Secondly, does it succeed in meeting the United Kingdom's national and international obligations? Thirdly, will our armed forces be organised, manned and equipped to meet those obligations? Fourthly, has the strategic defence review taken into account the twin revolutions in political and military affairs? Finally, will the financial resources be allocated to meet this remit? That final point is the crunch in terms of the strategic defence review.

There are two ironies connected with the Iraq crisis. One is a question of national identity, the other a question of defence direction and capability. Certain elements of the new Labour Government—the Minister does not fall into this category—have been keen to rebrand Britain as cool Britannia, whatever that means, yet there is a certain irony that the reality of sending a task force to the Gulf in the Iraq crisis has been more traditional and—without jingoism—more rule Britannia than cool Britannia.

Secondly, despite all the Government's allegations of how weak the defence capability was after 18 years of Conservative government, the reality is that the command and control system set up as a consequence of the experience of the Falklands and the Gulf war—the Cabinet, the MOD and the permanent joint headquarters—was established by the Conservatives. The remit to send a task force was established and tested by the Conservative Government, as were the doctrine, weapons, equipment, manpower and resources.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

Here is a great irony. If the Government think that our forces were in such an appalling state, how did they successfully command, control and organise a task force of the type that was sent to the Gulf, and which has made such an important contribution to maintaining international security? There is a certain bijou irony there.

Some observers might argue that fulfilling major deployments such as Bosnia and the Gulf while undertaking the strategic defence review places great strain on our services. Thirty years ago, another Labour Government were—surprise, surprise—carrying out one of their many defence reviews. Later, the then Secretary of State for Defence, now Lord Healey, observed the contradictory nature of simultaneously deploying and trying to review defence. Later he wrote:

"I did not think it made sense to carry out an appendix operation on a man while he was lifting a grand piano".

I suggest that many members of our armed forces feel just like that man or woman attempting to lift a grand piano.

In opposition, new Labour faced reality. It moved away from unilateralism and argued that there was a need for a strategic defence review that would stop the decline in Britain's defences. The Labour Opposition said that they would properly assess Britain's strategic priorities and that the process would be foreign policy led. Every question asked by hon. Members—Conservative and Liberal, at least—to ascertain more detail was met with what appeared to be the reasonable holding answer that Labour Members could not commit themselves until they had looked at the Ministry of Defence books.

Nevertheless, in the lead-up to the general election, the Labour Opposition felt able, without looking at the books, to commit themselves to maintaining our strategic nuclear deterrent and to honour the Conservative commitment to Eurofighter—a commitment, at that time, of about £16 billion. That blew a hole through the carefully constructed arguments for a strategic defence review. On what basis did the then Labour Opposition decide to maintain Trident and Eurofighter when the strategic defence review was supposed to be foreign policy led? Why did they not commit themselves to order Challenger tanks or purchase carriers? Where did the information come from that they said in other areas was so vital that they would have to wait until they had looked at the books?

Our military friends have a saying; a bad commander—for that read politician—does not appreciate the situation, he situates the appreciation. That is exactly what Labour did before the general election.

Let us move on from the flawed logic behind the strategic defence review and see how an assessment of British foreign policy could provide the driver for the strategic defence review.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Simpson: I gladly give way to the Minister.

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman has finally tempted me to the Dispatch Box with his phrase, "flawed logic". Will he explain why the Conservatives spent the period leading to the general election complaining, "You can't trust Labour; they won't keep Trident or the Eurofighter" and have spent the time since then complaining, "Labour can't be trusted because they are going to keep Trident and the Eurofighter"?

Mr. Simpson: I think the Minister should allow me to continue my point. He should not have allowed himself to be tempted.

If, in opposition, people argue a perfectly acceptable case—that they cannot commit themselves before looking at the books—and maintain that they will carry out a strategic defence review because they lack information, where does the information come from to cause them to say that they will keep Trident and Eurofighter but that they cannot commit themselves to other important areas? By making that declaration, they largely determined the outcome of the strategic defence review, which was supposed to be foreign policy led. I thank the Minister for his intervention.

I shall now examine the flawed logic behind the strategic defence review and see how an assessment of British foreign policy could provide the driver for it. We know, in general terms, from what the Foreign Secretary said when he launched his Foreign Office mission statement on 12 May 1997, that UK security will remain based on the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and that the Government want to be an active member of the United Nations.

However, we still do not know the foreign policy baseline for the strategic defence review. Both the Foreign Secretary and Secretary of State for Defence have refused to publish it. Several times, the Secretary of State has replied to any question about the foreign policy baseline by saying, "Nudge nudge, wink wink, you will find bits of it in the defence debate in October 1997 and in some of the speeches that I have made to outside bodies."

Why the coyness? Why not publish the foreign policy baseline? This is open government. It is crucial that we establish what, if any, foreign policy commitments have changed and how they will impact on defence capabilities and—even more significant—resources. In default of a foreign policy baseline, Opposition Members—and I suspect that there is a nagging doubt among Labour Members—are forced to conclude that the Treasury is unwilling for the foreign policy baseline to be published before the tough negotiations that are about to start between it and the MOD. If the foreign policy baseline is not published here, on the official record, it can always be massaged to fit the budgetary restraints.

I challenge the Minister: prove me wrong. Stand up today and tell us what the foreign policy baseline is or give us a commitment. If he fails to do that, the strategic defence review is fatally flawed.

On 12 May 1997, the Foreign Secretary made great play of launching a Foreign Office mission statement, saying:

"Every modern business starts from a mission statement that sets clear objectives".

Quite so. This is now the requirement for most business and industry and, indeed, the military. By any definition, the Ministry of Defence is a very large modern business, worth £22 billion, so where is the Ministry of Defence mission statement?

I asked the Secretary of State that question in June 1997. On 16 June 1997, the Minister for the Armed Forces replied:

"We intend to issue shortly revised aims and objectives for my Department in the form of a mission statement."—[Official Report, 16 June 1997; Vol. 296, c. 15.]

Since then, despite repeated requests by several hon. Members, there has been no MOD mission statement.

Ironically, 50 or 100 years ago, if someone had asked an old-fashioned and politically incorrect Minister, either Labour or Conservative—or, if we go back far enough, a Liberal—he would probably have said that the mission of the Ministry of Defence was killing the Queen's enemies. That is not so today; it is a politically incorrect statement. Therefore, as the MOD moves forward the complex process of the strategic defence review, it lacks, according to the Foreign Secretary, who is laying down the foreign policy baseline, those clear objectives so essential to any modern business—or perhaps they form part of that foreign policy baseline, which remains unavailable to parliamentary scrutiny.

My second challenge to the Minister this morning is, can he either tell us the Ministry of Defence mission statement or tell us a date in the near future when it will be published?

That logically brings me to the central issue of resources. Across the board in Whitehall, the Government face the dilemma of keeping their election pledge not to raise taxes while maintaining the Conservative Government's public expenditure plans for the first two years and at the same time delivering on Labour's priorities of education, health and employment. We know that, although the Prime Minister has pledged to maintain strong defences, the defence budget will remain static at best—and at worst it will probably be reduced.

A real strategic defence review, which genuinely examines our foreign policy, our capabilities, and our possible commitments—a real one, such as the Australians had—might broadly reflect Conservative foreign policy commitments, the need to be proactive in the United Nations and to undertake the wider requirements of defence diplomacy, the need to purchase new weapons and equipment that are required and the need at least to maintain the pay and conditions of service personnel. Such a review might conclude that the defence budget should be increased—but we know that that has been ruled out, so this is not an objective strategic defence review.

The political and financial realities confronting the Secretary of State for Defence are almost insoluble. First, his constituency, the parliamentary Labour party, backs defence cuts. In a survey of Labour Members published on 11 May 1997 in The Observer, a ratio of 6:1 favoured defence cuts; the ratio rose among the 1997 intake to 12:1. Not only are many Labour Members sceptical about the need to maintain the present defence budget, many of them believe that that budget provides a milch cow for education and health.

Secondly, despite Labour denials that the strategic defence review would not be Treasury led, the evidence proves the contrary. In October 1997, the Ministry of Defence was forced to make savings of £168 million after the Treasury claimed that there had been overspending and that the savings would help to avert a winter shortage of national health service beds.

There is continual pressure—I know that the Minister is affected by it—from the Treasury to offload the cost of British peacekeeping operations in Bosnia from the contingency reserve on to the Defence vote. However, I suggest that the real financial squeeze will come from the Treasury's comprehensive spending review, which was announced in June last year and should be completed this summer. We know from the answer to a question asked in this place on 3 November 1997 that the strategic defence review is the Ministry of Defence's contribution to the comprehensive spending review. That review is tasking Departments to look for savings—it does not require them to come up with ideas for obtaining new money from the central reserve.

Thanks to the delay in completing the strategic defence review—I remind hon. Members that its publication was promised in December last year, but the completion date has now slipped and we expect it in the first half, perhaps May or June, of 1998—the Ministry of Defence's ideal solution of a quick bilateral deal with the Treasury appears to be receding into the distance. The strategic defence review is being dragged further and further into the orbit of the comprehensive spending review.

Whitehall rumours—who am I to gainsay them—have suggested that the Treasury is seeking long-term cuts of £2 billion, or 10 per cent. of the current budget, or even £4 billion, or 20 per cent. of the budget. If that is not bad enough, the MOD—like other Departments—will have to introduce resource accounting by the financial year 1999-2000.

Dr. Reid: The Tories introduced it.

Mr. Simpson: I assure any hon. Members who have not come across them that resource accounts will have a major impact on Government Departments. They will involve valuations of the MOD's assets, inflate the size of the MOD budget and make the MOD appear to other Departments even more of a Whitehall milch cow. The Ministry of Defence will be seen as a soft touch.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Did my hon. Friend hear the seated intervention from the Minister a moment ago? In response to my hon. Friend's comments about resource accounting, the Minister said the Conservative Government introduced it. Does my hon. Friend agree that it sounds as though the Government are planning to abolish it?

Mr. Simpson: I thank my hon. Friend. I am not certain that the Government know what they are doing in this area. However, they intend to go ahead with resource accounting, which will have a major impact on the Ministry of Defence.

In the short term, the MOD budget will be under considerable strain and, in the medium term, it will be very vulnerable. That will seriously constrain the Secretary of State's strategy of paying for the MOD's one "big idea". A young officer who works at the Ministry of Defence told me recently that the staff are thinking about putting up a series of signs around the Ministry—rather like in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland"—that will point to "The Big Idea". Ministers and their special advisers might find it one day—but it will be in the boiler room.

[Mr. Simpson]

The Ministry of Defence's one big idea—which is largely a product of MOD studies; it has nothing to do with Ministers—is an expeditionary force capability. There is a certain irony here because, if we had been sitting in the Chamber 90 years ago, we would have been discussing the formation of an expeditionary force capability under a Liberal Secretary of State for War, Richard Burdon Haldane. We have turned a full circle in 90 years.

Even if savings are found elsewhere in the MOD budget, an expeditionary force capability will require new weapons, equipment and information technology that will not be compensated by internal savings. Even if assumptions are made that our allies will provide many of those capabilities, the United Kingdom will still require a minimum stand-alone capability, which I do not at present envisage the Government's being able to fund.

Quite correctly, the Government have emphasised the quality of our armed forces personnel and the need to sustain their morale and that of their families. We all agree about that, but how do service personnel judge the strategic defence review? We know the answer to that question because a leaked Ministry of Defence report provides the damning evidence. At the end of last year, the MOD conducted a three-week assessment of 1,500 personnel from all three services at 14 different establishments, covering all ranks from private to two-star general. In a damning phrase, the strategic defence review liaison team assessors found almost unanimous suspicion that the review is a "cost-cutting exercise dressed up in policy rhetoric".

In the spirit of openness, I ask the Minister whether he will place that report, and any other studies of service morale that he has commissioned, in the Library.

Furthermore, as the publication of the strategic defence review has slipped and slipped, many service personnel and local communities have experienced a great period of unease about their future. In my constituency, the 9th/12th Lancers—an armoured regiment based at Swanton Morley that is currently deployed in Bosnia—are concerned about their future. My constituents at Coltishall and the surrounding villages are concerned about press reports regarding the future of the Jaguar force at RAF Coltishall based in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior).

Despite all the promises and good intentions of Ministers, we are forced to conclude that the strategic defence review lacks a purpose. To paraphrase Winston Churchill, this strategic defence review lacks a theme. We are unable to determine the foreign policy baseline that is supposed to form the basis of the MOD's defence review. Ministers have been unable to produce a departmental mission statement with a clarity of purpose. The defence budget is vulnerable to pressure both from within the parliamentary Labour party and from the Government's own comprehensive spending review—and that is reflected in the mood of our service personnel. Sadly, the strategic defence review will probably come up with a requirement to do even more with even less.

Finally, I remind the House of the five tests by which I believe hon. Members should judge the strategic defence review when it is published: does it provide effective security and defence for the United Kingdom; does it succeed in meeting the United Kingdom's national and international obligations; will our armed forces be organised, manned and equipped to meet those obligations; has the strategic defence review taken into account the twin revolutions in political and military affairs; and will the financial resources be allocated to meet that remit?

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): We are extremely indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), who, in a wide-ranging speech, covered all the main areas of concern regarding the strategic defence review. I shall concentrate on two or three narrow issues.

I whole-heartedly welcome the strategic defence review: it will do the Ministry of Defence no harm to re-examine its fundamental practices. I also believe that it is worth while for the Ministry of Defence to make sure that it is operating cost-effectively at every stage. As for the principles which should underlie the review, I turn to the views enunciated by the former French chief of staff, General Ailleret, a few years ago. He enjoined France to embrace "défense à tous azimuts"—which I interpret to mean "multi-polar defence".

British defence has been largely Eurocentric since the beginning of the cold war—and understandably so. With the dissolution of the Warsaw pact and the multiplicity of risks and potential threats to our security and our interests around the world, that Eurocentric approach must change. We must also eliminate the old shibboleths which went with it. In a sense, those shibboleths were understandable and comprehensible.

Following world war two, we were committed to the Brussels treaty requirement to maintain a standing army of 55,000 men and a tactical air force in Germany. That requirement has been overtaken by events, and we now have only two main air bases and an armoured division in the federal republic. I urge Her Majesty's Government to re-examine our contribution in Germany. Our clear purpose should be to ensure that our armed forces possess mobility, flexibility and fire power to meet those wide-ranging threats and future potential commitments. I do not see that maintaining an armoured division and two air bases on German soil accords with those wider objectives.

The RAF is to withdraw its Harrier squadrons from RAF Laarbruch this year. I hope that they come back as soon as possible. The Tornado wing at RAF Brüggen is due to stay until 2002. For the life of me, I do not see why it cannot be returned to the United Kingdom forthwith. The headquarters has already gone back. We need to concentrate our forces in the most appropriate manner. It will be necessary to make space for those units and personnel in the United Kingdom, and this must be done.

The armoured division is a more difficult problem, especially as regards training areas, but increasingly the training facilities in Poland and Canada are being used. It is too high a price to pay for the maintenance of a three-star position as commander of the Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps that we should be committed for ever and aye to keeping an armoured division in Germany.

The French have withdrawn from the federal republic. The argument that we must be in the federal republic to maintain a United States commitment to western Europe does not stand up. There is defence in depth now in central Europe. Were Russia ever to become a military threat again, and the countries of eastern Europe joined NATO, we would have a collective security apparatus on the continent which did not require the maintenance of extremely costly British forces on German soil.

To pursue the three objectives of mobility, flexibility and fire power, I endorse also the efforts towards more joint operations. The idea of a joint helicopter support force seems entirely sensible. I can see no inhibition or fundamental problem. Likewise, the precedent has been well established and proved in the Gulf for joint Royal Air Force-Royal Navy air groups on Her Majesty's ships. This, too, is eminently sensible. I am sure that we will see more such developments in the defence review, and rightly so.

I hope that we will recognise the United Kingdom's special contribution to European defence in the maritime and air elements, and in air mobility and amphibiosity, rather more than in highly inflexible, static armoured forces. If there must be a balance, that is the way that we must go. It can only be good for the Royal Navy. I am pleased that HMS Ocean is shortly to enter service—an appropriate decision by the previous Conservative Administration to provide a landing platform for helicopters for Her Majesty's fleet.

Beyond that, we will need to replace the Invincible class. We have seen the benefits of maritime air power in the Gulf crisis. A force can be deployed relatively rapidly. It can be poised offshore. The political inhibitions to maritime air operations are minimal.

The difficult decision will be whether to replace the three Invincible class carriers with two 40,000-ton fleet carriers, or whether we go for smaller carriers of 20,000 tons or thereabouts. I would argue that it is better to have three smaller carriers than two big carriers. One will always be in refit, and we must be able to rotate the vessels, as we are doing now between Invincible and Illustrious, knowing that it is always possible to keep one on station.

I tend to favour the smaller carriers for the United Kingdom, but I question whether it will be necessary to have quite as many Horizon 2000 anti-aircraft frigates or destroyers as was previously envisaged. The best air defence of the fleet is, of course, the aircraft carrier. I imagine that the naval staff will examine closely whether Horizon 2000 makes as much sense now as it used to do in the days when the Soviet naval air arm and the Soviet air forces posed a real threat to the NATO navies in the north Atlantic.

As for the Royal Air Force and the need for power projection and the ability to intervene—whether to preserve peace, to fight wars, or to extricate our nationals or friendly nationals—central to this capability must be an integral heavy lift capacity, particularly if it will be necessary to deploy armoured forces rapidly. We need a spectrum of capabilities to meet every contingency.

If we were unable to provide the heavy lift, we would be dependent on the United States, whose political objectives and priorities might conceivably be different in some instances, and we would be too dependent on civil carriers. The C17 has all the characteristics required for the role—the ability to operate forward, the ability to be both a freighter and a troop transport, and more significantly, a tanker for air-to-air refuelling.

I recognise that the Ministry will have difficult decisions to make about the nature of future air power. We have seen in the Gulf that air power is decisive not just to win wars, as was the case in the Gulf war, but to prevent war, by an early application of political pressure. Therefore, for the front line of the Royal Air Force to be cut at this time would be a step backwards. The Jaguars are extremely cost-effective until the Eurofighter comes into service. They are just undergoing an update at relatively low cost which will enable them to maintain an effective capability well into the next century.

A joint strike fighter will be needed. As the House knows, we have seen how the FRS2s of the Royal Navy and the GR7s of the Royal Air Force are working well together aboard Her Majesty's ships. If we had a joint strike fighter—essentially a common air frame—for both roles, it would be a sensible procurement. It could be beneficial for British industry not only because the Americans are buying it, but because a host of European allies are likely to buy it—perhaps the northern four, which have the F16, and possibly also the Italians, the Portuguese and other air forces.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): My hon. Friend knows a great deal about the Royal Air Force. Does he have in mind the American version of the joint strike fighter, in which British money has already been invested?

Mr. Wilkinson: That is indeed the aircraft which I have in mind. My right hon. Friend speaks wisely about the funding that the Ministry of Defence has already put in. British contractors could benefit considerably from the programme.

I offer two concluding thoughts, as I promised to be brief. The first is the importance of sustainability, for which reserve forces are crucial. The Government must not make the mistake of allowing the reserves to be cut further as a consequence of the review. The reverse should be the case.

If regular manpower must be drawn down, we must use reserve manpower much more. That makes sense if we are using our own resources as a community in the most cost-effective way. It makes sense if we no longer have to deploy so many people to Germany. With the legislation now in place, it is a great step forward that the various categories of reservists, not least the reserves who operate as contractors for companies already working for the Ministry of Defence, can be subject to military discipline. I hope that the Government will take advantage of it.

Finally, we should not forget the importance of the control of space for future military operations, both for reconnaissance and signals intelligence, and for ensuring the defence of these islands against potential ballistic missile attack. We will have to intensify our efforts to provide a ballistic missile defence system for this country and for our allies on the continent, and I hope that efforts in this direction will not be nullified as a consequence of the review.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate. It is important that defence is discussed in the House. The debate has presented us with an ideal opportunity to discuss many of the issues about which we all have questions. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is with us.

I am worried slightly about the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk, whose knowledge about defence matters is second to none in the House. The hon. Gentleman goes on about defence reviews and expresses views on virtues and values along with other points of view on all matters of defence. The problem is that the hon. Gentleman did that also for the previous Government.

We are having to have a strategic defence review because of that Government's mistakes, and that is the problem. Major mistakes were made and they must be rectified. It is no use pretending that the hon. Gentleman was not involved when those mistakes were made. Certain Members were involved then; we are all involved now for the future. That is why we all wish to ensure that the strategic defence review works, and ensures that we have the right forces with the right capability to take us through the next 30 years. That is what we are talking about.

We must get things right because we cannot afford to make any more mistakes. I think that we can all agree that mistakes were made previously and that they were Treasury led. This time, we want the review to be led by the defence team. Smart procurement by a smart defence team will leave us with a smart defence force that is capable of moving around the world to ensure that a peace capability is implemented. That is why we are all here and that is what we all wish to see.

The previous Government lost out. There was no confidence on the part of the forces or among the defence industries. That is why so many Conservative Members lost their seats at the general election. As I said, we must ensure that we get things right this time.

As for the Eurofighter, the House was rightly united on what we believe will be the right aircraft for the Royal Air Force. [Interruption.] That is right. The initial decision was taken by the Conservatives and then they fudged it. The final decision was left to the Labour Government. We had to show commitment and place the orders with British Aerospace.

We all watched the "Panorama" programme. It was tragic to see ex-Members, who were members of the previous Government, questioning whether the right decision had been made or whether money had been wasted. I thought that the programme was obscene and scandalous. It did not fairly reflect the merits of an aircraft that we believe will be right.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The hon. Gentleman says that many Conservative candidates lost their seats at the election because of mistakes made in defence. Only on a few issues did the polls show the Conservatives to be leading Labour in the run-up to the general election. Well, there was just one issue, and that was defence.

Mr. Hoyle: I remind the hon. Gentleman of my constituency, Chorley, and of South Ribble and the Portsmouth and Blackpool seats. How many more constituencies does the hon. Gentleman want to be reminded of? It is easy to have a memory of convenience, but let us have a memory of fact in future.

I shall move on to talk about aircraft carriers. I do not believe that it would be right to have 20,000-ton vessels. They should be of 40,000 tons plus, because such vessels will present us with greater options. The issue involves options and costs. I see the re-emergence of the Royal Navy and the corps—the Royal Marines and the Royal Navy together will be the spearhead of any defence capability. I want to see vessels that are capable of taking a fixed-wing, one-strike aircraft. What better aircraft would be available than the Eurofighter? Let us have a Fleet Air Arm version of the Eurofighter, and let us ensure that we get the right carrier for the future.

We are talking of a mass in the form of an aircraft carrier that sits, as it were, near trouble spots. The carrier can sit beyond the horizon. We are not talking about aircraft that fly out and must return to a land base; the carrier can sit near the trouble spot. There are despots around the world and we must ensure that we have the right capability.

As for Iraq, we have deployed one carrier. What better solution would there be than to have a larger carrier to ensure that we have the right back-up with aeroplanes of the right capability. Those who voted for the Government on the Iraq issue can feel that they played their part in securing the peace that may emerge. That outcome did not derive from talks alone. The threat of defence that backed up the talks ensured peace for the time being. We do not know how long that peace will last, but those Members who supported the Government will be able to hold up their heads with pride at the end of the day. That is important.

The strategic defence review will be all-embracing. I have already touched on aircraft carriers, the Navy's ships generally and the re-emergence of the Royal Navy. There has been talk of HMS Ocean, and I accept that it is the result of a decision made by the previous Government. I am pleased that I shall be seeing HMS Ocean when it is commissioned. I am pleased to be with the Royal Marines, who have a major part to play. They have been on an exercise in Norway that was bigger than those held in previous years. That proves that the Government are willing to invest in the right troops—the right people generally—to ensure that a strong capability will continue.

We must consider British defence needs and United Kingdom manufacture. The C17 is a wonderful aircraft that is capable of specific actions where needed. However, it does not have a true capability, and that is the difficulty. A future large aircraft really can provide the options required by UK defence needs. The FLA is a variant aircraft—it can be a tanker and it can take and lift everything except the battle tank. We know, of course, that we need a mixed fleet of aircraft. I believe that the FLA can back up what is already in place.

I should like to see us investing in UK defence, thereby creating UK jobs and ensuring that UK technology, which will be delivered in the form of defence contracts, will be transferred to the civil sector. Defence is extremely important and we cannot introduce advanced technology into the civil sector unless we have a strong defence manufacturing base. I believe that we can retain that capability, and that is why British Aerospace is important, along with Royal Ordnance plc, Vickers and many other companies that can still build aircraft, arms and ships.

Our shipbuilding capability was virtually lost when the previous Government were in office. I believe, however, that we can rebuild that capability.

We are present in the Chamber because we believe in strong defence. I did not think it fair to take potshots at the Government, who are ensuring that they can rectify the mistakes made by the previous Government. That is why I am proud to speak in this debate.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): In a safe at the Ministry of Defence there will probably be found a copy of the first defence review of the past decade, which I wrote. Without wishing to emulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who takes every opportunity to claim authorship for, and enthusiasm concerning, the millennium dome, I wish to tell the House that, were I to place a copy of my review in the Library—which I probably could do because I do not think it is classified, as I wrote it—it would be shown that all the conclusions set out in it have been validated by what has happened since.

Seven years ago, I based the review on three assumptions. The first was that the cold war was over and that our defence policy need no longer be, to use the expression of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), Eurocentric. There is no longer any direct threat to the security of these islands and to the people who dwell therein. Secondly, the world remains a dangerous, deceitful and disagreeable environment in which nothing can be predicted with certainty. Thirdly, if the United Kingdom is to assert its influence and strength and reinforce its foreign policy, its strategy must be maritime.

There will be many hon. Members who are not present this morning, especially Labour Members, who will ask, "Why should the United Kingdom bother any longer? Its security is no longer threatened. We are a nation of only about 50 million people. We have perpetual constraints and bothers with our public spending. Surely this is a sector that we can abandon."

That would be an extremely dangerous decision, and one difficult to reverse. It would involve the final derogation of the United Kingdom from its role as a member of the United Nations Security Council. The UK would no longer be able to justify its seat in the G7 and on other international bodies that determine what will happen in an increasingly close and interdependent world. There would be certain circumstances—one cannot predict what they are—when United Kingdom citizens would be at the mercy of despots, just as we as a nation would be at the mercy of the super-powers in policy decisions. Our input into what is happening—so well illustrated by the way in which the Prime Minister and the present Government instantaneously reacted and deployed strength in the recent crisis—will no longer be feasible.

I fully accept that there are colossal budget restraints on the Department—my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) illustrated these and reinforced them with excerpts from the rumour mill in Whitehall. If the Department is to have a serious shot at attaining the change in emphasis that is necessary for the United Kingdom to sustain its international position over the next 20 or 30 years into the millennium, there will have to be a drastic shift in resources in service allocations. We will have to revert to the pattern of 100 years ago, when the Army was little more than a colonial gendarmerie, and our security and instrument of foreign policy was the Royal Navy. There will be immense resistance to this in the Department, as the Minister has probably already experienced. For far too long, soldiers had too prominent a say in what happened and in the decisions that were taken by the Ministry of Defence. The need to deploy and maintain a large force of infantry and armour on the continent of Europe was a hangover from the second world war, and it continued into the cold war. That is no longer the case. We can reduce to a small, elite force.

We listen with interest to the rumours about the air cavalry and to those about subsuming the Parachute Regiment into this new force. I spoke earlier about soldiers and their prejudices, and their malign influence in certain sectors of the Ministry of Defence. We all know that, for the past 40 years, the Army establishment has been determined to get even with the Parachute Regiment, to cut it down to size and, preferably, out altogether if it can. Although the idea of an air cavalry is attractive, let us hope that it is not simply used as a device to get rid of the Parachute Regiment and to subsume it into the mass infantry career structure. We do not know, but we watch.

Soldiers have to be few in number, well trained, well equipped, mobile, but should not take anything like as large a proportion of the defence budget as they do at present.

We must move towards—several hon. Members mentioned this—the certainty that a fixed-wing carrier will be the central weapons system of our armed forces over the next 50 years. It must be; there is no other way to project force and carry out the operation—illustrated so effectively, but, fortunately, not carried to the extreme—that we have seen in recent weeks.

A fixed-wing carrier or two—three would be excessive—can be bought for a relatively small sum, if one compares it with the colossal sum that is allocated to Eurofighter. I always listen to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) with great attention, but we are not of totally the same mind on Eurofighter. If the sum devoted to Eurofighter were cut in half, it would buy a couple of respectable fixed-wing carriers.

Carriers do not come on their own. There are immense ancillary costs: software, electronic counter-measures, and the support vessels that have to defend the carrier. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood said that a carrier's best defence is the carrier itself, but it is a vulnerable target. The Americans have found that, to support a carrier, one needs a considerable flotilla of ancillary vessels that carry missiles and have a counter-measure capability to ensure that it is not hit. If a carrier is lost—the House will recall that that was a primary apprehension during the Falklands conflict—the expedition is cut off at the knees.

There is one other factor of which the House should be aware when considering the strategic defence review: defence policy should be considered only as part of a geostrategic review, which has to have input from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office when considering our foreign policy. It should not be Foreign and Commonwealth Office led, but that Department must have input. The Ministry of Defence is the largest client of the manufacturing industry in this country. We must be clear about the industrial implications, not just in isolation but as they interact with the geostrategic considerations; the extent to which we shall be dependent on other suppliers, particularly foreign suppliers, or the United States; the extent to which we can take the risk of making things on our own; and the extent to which we can reassert our industrial independence, which we have neglected. All those things have to feed into a proper and round consideration of what the review should include. Only then can one start to calculate minimum force levels.

With the greatest respect to the Secretary of State, who, unfortunately, is not able to attend this interesting debate, there is scope for a commission, which the Prime Minister must chair, because only a Prime Minister can overrule the predatory, insatiable demands of the Treasury, as they will be arrayed. The Prime Minister has, as we have seen, acquired a taste for strutting the international stage and posturing as an international statesman and arbiter of the way in which our affairs are ordered—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): Look what he has just done.

Mr. Clark: Indeed; I have already applauded him, but perhaps that was before the Under-Secretary came into the Chamber. Unless the Prime Minister exercises his authority over the decisions and the counter-pressures that the Treasury will apply to our defence policy, the time will come—perhaps sooner than is comfortable for him—when he no longer has the muscle when he needs it to back up the posture that he is adopting.

11.57 am

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on being successful in securing the debate and on his speech this morning, but he was a little idle in his research. He failed to mention the miserable existence that service personnel and civilian employees have endured over the past 18 years, facing the consequences of successive Tory defence reviews that were misplaced, mishandled and disappointing, and dispiriting to the personnel involved. I represented my constituency in the 1980s, so I know from first-hand experience how demoralising were the successive reviews, which were never transparent in their conception and were pretty damning in their delivery. However, he gives us an opportunity—the importance of which is shown by the number of hon. Members who are present—to address once again the difficult questions of defence and the strategic review.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): The hon. Gentleman attacks the Conservative Government, despite our belief in strong defence, but is it not true that the Liberal Democrats were in favour of cutting defence by a third just before the deployment of our forces in the Gulf, so he is not really in a strong position to criticise the Conservative party?

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman makes his point, but those who were around at the time will consider the historical facts and discover that what the hon. Gentleman is saying is not only misplaced but downright mischievous because it is inaccurate.

I share hon. Members' concern that we have failed miserably to put before the House or, for that matter, the wider community, the rationale behind the foreign policy initiatives on which this defence review is based. It cannot be right for that to persist even now. Like other hon. Members, I had hoped for some appreciation in the House of the priorities. I am disappointed that that has not happened.

As considerable numbers of my constituents are serving in the Gulf, it would be wrong not to appreciate and applaud their work, and to ask the Minister to pass on good wishes and hopes for a speedy return to all the crews and personnel, men and women, serving in our fleet and on land in the Gulf. It would also be wrong to miss this opportunity to say that many families of the crew of the Invincible would be interested to know when she will return to the United Kingdom. I hope that there will be good news on the near horizon for them. I also thank my local newspaper The News for its work in pushing the story of the efforts of those people and keeping the crews and personnel down there informed of the good wishes of the people back here.

The Iraqi crisis has shown us two things. First, it has shown us that the United Nations still has a vital role to play. As a nation which took such an active part in the recent Iraqi crisis, we must use the strength that we now have to insist that the UN strengthens its position on such topics. Secondly, it raises the question of joint European defence. During the past few weeks, we have seen how difficult it is to get our European partners to agree on something as important as Iraq. We should seriously question on what they would agree.

Some of us were present at a recent North Atlantic Assembly briefing in Brussels when it was interesting to see the frustration on the faces of our American colleagues when all sorts of allegations were made about why they were in Iraq. More worrying, from a European point of view, was their riposte that they should not be pushed too hard or they would sort out the Bosnia situation by seriously considering whether Congress and the Senate wanted American forces to remain there. That was an ill-tempered threat, but it was directed at those European partners who were less than enthusiastic about why we were even considering taking action against Iraq. Once again, we missed the opportunity as a nation to use our leadership in Europe to bring our European colleagues on board. We set an example, but we were unable to lead our European colleagues to back us more enthusiastically. That is a disappointment that many share.

Like other hon. Members, I had hoped that we would have got to the bottom of where foreign policy issues were taking the defence review. Many of us who would be accused of being cynical would say that, because the Foreign Office initiatives have not been published, they have moved up the road from the Foreign Office to the Treasury. Before they come here, the Chancellor and his colleagues are running their beady eyes over them. As a result, the House is being denied the opportunity properly to evaluate the defence review in its true light.

We have been told time and again that the review would be an exercise in transparency which would involve people. Hon. Members have had the opportunity to be involved and I am sure that the Minister will tell us how many members of the public have joined in enthusiastically in one form or another, but the Government have failed to be straight and honest about what was driving it. Was it the Treasury's insistence on substantial cuts or a genuine attempt to allow foreign policy, for the first time, to be open enough to drive a defence review that would realistically address the defence ambitions of the British Government and the British people?

I support the views that have been expressed about the fixed-deck carriers. The country cannot afford three, but we shall need two. HMS Ocean is a major addition to Britain's fighting capabilities. However, I also agree with the points made by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) about the role of the Royal Navy and a strengthened Royal Marine corps, and their strategic responsibility in defending the foreign policy issues that Britain holds dear.

If we lose this opportunity, we shall fail miserably. People will not forgive the Government for denying them the real opportunity to bring together our defence and foreign policy objectives. It is unfair and unforgivable to insist that men and women in our armed forces should take on more and more tasks without the proper resources. It would be unforgivable if the Government were to repeat the awful mistakes that many experienced during the 1980s and the early part of this decade.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on his tenacity in securing the debate. He is right to have persisted since before Christmas. The Ministry of Defence currently has other things on its mind, but Ministers have repeatedly made it clear to the House that, with regard to the strategic defence review, the show must go on.

I thank my hon. Friends for their contributions. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) shared with us his deep knowledge and my right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) showed us his particular insight and his important vision of the way forward. It is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle)—whose heart is in the right place, even if he does have a tendency to rewrite history—and the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), with his particular responsibilities as a Member of Parliament representing Portsmouth.

Recent events in the middle east have given the Royal Navy a providential opportunity to demonstrate its strength in force projection. Not since the first world war has chemical and biological defence assumed such importance for British forces. All three services have reacted swiftly and efficiently at a time of international crisis, and we congratulate and thank them.

What lessons have the Government learnt, what conclusions will they draw and how will they inform the strategic defence review?

Defence is rarely the subject of political knockabout. It rarely attracts large numbers of hon. Members to Question Time and debates. However, today it is important to note that the Secretary of State has been here for part of the debate, the Minister for the Armed Forces is here and the Under-Secretary was here. No doubt, the Minister for Defence Procurement is watching on his television in another place.

I emphasise that Her Majesty's forces know that a comparatively small number of Members of both Houses have a deep knowledge of, and commitment to, Britain's defence, and that they can be relied upon to be persistent and tenacious in pursuing military matters. They also know that, at times of tension, both Houses of Parliament can be relied upon to swing behind them with generous cross-party support. Most service men and women would wish that defence was not a party political issue. Defence should stand astride the common ground between the parties.

After 18 years in opposition, Labour's understanding of defence issues was incomplete. It reformed its party's defence stance and the Labour Government's policy is now on trial. They pledged that they would have a defence review, but they did not know what to expect, and that is clear 10 months on. Labour chose the big bang approach, rejecting our philosophy of continuous review with occasional necessary reforms. They have not said, and we do not know—I doubt whether they know either—whether they will revert to the continuous review process or adopt the Australian and American pattern of a review every three or four years.

We were told that the SDR would be over in six months and that the uncertainty in the armed forces and the defence procurement industry would be worth putting up with. Apart from the Secretary of State, no one believes that the review is now foreign policy led. Clear as he was about the downward ratchet in defence spending—I hope that he took note of the wise words of the Chairman of the Defence Select Committee in last week's debate on Iraq—the Secretary of State has been consistently unclear about the nature of Foreign Office and Treasury involvement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk has already drawn attention to the lack of a clear statement on foreign policy baselines, as has the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South. The Secretary of State continues to expect us to believe that his speech at the Royal United Services Institute on 18 September last said it all. It said virtually nothing new—I read it again this morning. It will not do for him to pretend that we know about those baselines. They remain secret and out of date.

Both the early consultations and the establishment of the foreign policy baselines last August have receded so far into the past, and world events have moved forward so quickly, that serious doubt must be cast on the validity of both. We have also had a long period of silence from the Secretary of State. According to the Ministry of Defence, since he was appointed last year, he has made just four speeches on defence policy, only one of which was on the strategic defence review. He made two speeches on NATO and one on defence diplomacy, a concept originally introduced by the Conservative Government in their 1981 defence review White Paper. Will there be no more speeches from the Secretary of State until the SDR is safely out of the way?

Ministers now appear like rabbits caught in the Treasury's headlights. The military input will be complete by the end of March as promised. Defence Ministers will no doubt reach conclusions by the end of April. Then all that work will disappear into the black hole of the Treasury and the Cabinet Office. The comprehensive expenditure review will take time to resolve. We might be lucky and have a statement on the SDR by June, or it might slip to the last week of July—perhaps to the last day that Parliament sits before the recess. All that will give the Treasury an opportunity to push the whole exercise into the next public spending round, implying no real movement on the SDR until April 1999. Two years after the Government's election pledge, with the world a different place, the Government will hope that the Opposition will support the results of the review.

Defence Ministers should be aware that they are putting at risk cross-party support by their failure to listen and to answer the concerns expressed not just by Opposition Members but by Labour Members. I absolve the Minister for the Armed Forces from that accusation. We recognise that he is a tireless worker for the armed forces and that he can be relied on, with his grasp of detail and his patience and courtesy, which are much appreciated. However, I wish that he would have a word with the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary because routinely in debates, questions have been asked and points raised, which are apparently not heard and certainly not answered. Even in last week's debate on Iraq, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) made some good points and asked some straightforward questions but received no answers.

I mentioned the new significance of chemical and biological defence. The proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is a major threat to the peace and security of the global community. The previous Government recognised that and invested in substantial facilities to combat the threat. The time has come for further appraisal of active and passive defence against chemical and biological attack, both military and civilian.

It is our choice to stand by the United States. We must be as good as the United States. The 1999 US defence budget will add $1 billion to counter chemical and biological threats. How much new investment will the strategic defence review suggest for us? How much will the Treasury then allow us?

Similarly, we cannot afford to be left behind, following the revolution in military affairs that now informs so much defence planning. Since last May, the world has become less stable and more dangerous. British military forces are under increasing pressure and peace in Northern Ireland is more fragile. Abroad, Bosnia remains the top priority for Britain's and NATO's long-term commitment. In Bosnia, we must consider the need for a smaller but more permanent and established presence, and we need to overcome the current lack of a corporate memory. Escalating ethnic tensions in Kosovo could provide the next flashpoint in the Balkans.

Will the SDR require cuts in our contribution to NATO, material and financial? The "Partnership for Peace" process absorbs substantial resources, mostly to good effect, but there is little Mediterranean dialogue. NATO's troubled southern flank poses threats to Europe's political, economic and military stability. Further afield, we cannot ignore the potential for trouble over the Spratly Islands in the South China sea, nor events involving our dependencies in Commonwealth countries. More immediately, tensions in the middle east will require our constant vigilance and continuing military presence. Our military relationship with Turkey should have a higher priority.

Back home, the Green Papers on the Defence Diversification Agency and the future of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency are now three months late. Unclear of their priorities and befuddled by their vision of Europe, the Government want to maintain their special relationship with the USA while demanding that our defence industry merges our efficient world-class companies with some of the nationalised, subsidised, dinosaur industries elsewhere in Europe—answers by 31 March please, on one side of a postcard.

Above all, the performance of our forces depends on our people and their training, equipment and morale. If we are to recruit and retain good people, we must spend what it takes to achieve that. If we want their families to follow the flag, we must not skimp on housing, education, medical services and the quality of their lives.

Last July in Coventry, I attended a consultation seminar on the strategic defence review. The Secretary of State said that there should be no expectation of an increase in defence expenditure. He asked me whether I thought that there was a case for an increase and I am glad that I said yes. I say it again today. If we are to relate this nation's defence policy to the real world rather than to some diplomatic utopia, this is no time to contemplate further cuts. We should not rule out the case for increased defence spending, review or no review.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): So many questions have been asked and there is so little time to answer.

I doubly congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson): first, on obtaining this debate and on the wisdom that he brings to it; and, secondly, on having discovered a new smelting process for brass necks, which produces those of a quality, strength and thickness that have never previously been invented. He combined that with modesty: in his own modest way he failed to declare an interest, in all humility, as an architect of the Conservative Government's policy of the past 10 years.

Had the hon. Gentleman declared an interest as a special adviser to a previous Secretary of State for Defence, he would have had more difficulty convincing us that we must not cut defence spending, when he advised cutting defence expenditure by 30 per cent.; that we must not reduce personnel numbers, when he advised reducing them by 32 per cent.; or that we must produce a mission statement within six months, when he failed to do so in 18 years. I understand the hon. Gentleman's modesty. In a consensual fashion, I had not intended even to refer to the Conservative Government's record, but I thought that we should place in context some of the remarks that have been made.

Let me say from the outset that our commitment in opposition to conducting a strategic defence review, rather than a cost-driven exercise, was central to our determination to provide Britain with strong, capable and modern armed forces. That was our analysis of the need then, and it remains our goal now. Events have proved how right we were to make that decision, for three reasons. First, a policy-led review is the only way comprehensively to assess how our forces should be structured, equipped, trained and deployed to meet the challenges of the 21st century. Only that approach has the potential to afford the armed forces and the Government the coherence and clarity of purpose that they deserve.

Secondly, inherited shortfalls have led to inadequacies, some of which were identified during the strategic defence review. We were unable fully to appreciate them:

as the hon. Member for Mid–Norfolk correctly pointed out, the information was not at our disposal until we came into power.

Headline issues arising from the strategic defence review bear repetition. I allocate no blame, but we must face up to the fact that we cannot transport forces quickly enough or provide the necessary logistic support once they have deployed. Our medical services are thoroughly inadequate. Some parts of the forces cannot communicate effectively with other parts. We face a vicious circle of undermanning and overstretch, which feed on, and exacerbate, each other.

I am not being party political, but we have to admit that there are real problems before we can begin to solve them. It is the easiest thing in the world for politicians at the Dispatch Box to use rhetoric that gets more robust the weaker their arguments become, rather like the Jesuit who comes to the part of his sermon about which he has doubts and writes in the margin, "Shout louder." Surely the days are gone when the services are burdened with increasing inadequacies so that political leaders do not have to find the moral courage to face up to the hard choices. Those problems must be tackled to ensure that our armed forces can be deployed rapidly, flexibly and effectively.

Thirdly, undertaking the strategic defence review was the right decision. We owe it to the brave men and women who risk their lives on our behalf day in, day out—not only when they are in the headlines—to ensure that we have a coherent vision of the future use and structure of our armed forces. Paying further tribute to the men and women of our armed forces is timely. Last night, Kofi Annan, the United Nations Secretary-General, congratulated the Prime Minister on being "the perfect UN peacekeeper". That was not only a justification of the Prime Minister and of the House, and of our commitment to the UN; the accolade was also for the men and women who serve in our armed forces. I cannot convey how proud I am to be associated with them and their efforts day in, day out. It is the Government's duty to give them a coherent vision of the future that recognises their vital contribution. We owe it to them to ensure, through regular scrutiny, that the means at their disposal match their commitment to the tasks set for them by the Government. Only a truly strategic defence review will allow us to address those issues.

I shall quickly cover the main points arising from the debate. First, despite the banter that goes on in the House, our approach has, from the start, been to try to achieve consensus. To use an old cliché, I believe that Britain works best when we work together. Defence is too important to be a political football. I agree with the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) that, where possible, national security should be above party politics, which does not mean that there will not be any criticism and that the Opposition should not oppose. Our desire to achieve such a framework arises as much from the acknowledgement of our past mistakes as from our commitment to try to avoid them in future.

Whatever the criticisms, there has been unprecedented consultation during the review. Hon. Members have been involved, and more invitations are going out to members of all parties; seminars have been held; we have involved journalists, academic institutions and ex-military people as well as the Foreign Office and the Ministry of Defence; and industry and trade unions have also played a part. We have spent a great deal of time on the review: the message that comes back from the forces is that it is better to get it right than to rush it.

We have been particularly keen to listen to the troops. For the first time, a strategic defence review liaison team was established. The team has met thousands of service men and women outside the chain of command. As requested, it responded robustly and frankly, and told us exactly what has been said. There is good will among the troops and morale is high, but there is concern that our review may be the same as those undertaken by the previous Government, which were perceived to be Treasury led.

The hon. Gentleman would have given a fuller picture if he had said that concerns arise not because people are suspicious of what we are doing, but because of their experience under the previous Government. Therefore, we are making every attempt to show that the review is foreign policy led: it is based on a fundamental reassessment of our essential security policy and defence needs and was conducted in its early stages jointly by the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign Office.

We have outlined the conclusions that are emerging, but there is dispute over the extent to which the work should have been done earlier. First, our armed forces have inescapable national commitments. Military aid must be provided to the civil power in Northern Ireland: we hope for a lasting political settlement in the Province, but will not count our chickens before they have hatched. We are responsible for the internal and external security of our dependent territories.

In Europe, we must ensure European and British security by making a commensurate contribution to the maintenance of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, which was a manifesto pledge. The collapse of the Soviet Union has radically reduced the threat of all-out war in Europe, but it has given rise to a plethora of risks—nationalism, border disputes and ethnic tensions—that were suppressed by communism. We have wider global interests, but they do not extend equally and we are most likely to be involved in such problems in Europe, the Gulf and the Mediterranean, where our economic and security interests are most closely engaged.

Other global threats form part of our policy baseline. Recent events in the Gulf have brought home to us the risks from nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. Just as the citizen has rights and responsibilities, this country, as a national citizen in the global community, has rights. Our armed forces will defend them, our territories and interests, abroad and at home. We have responsibilities commensurate with our position at the United Nations and in NATO, and as a leading country in Europe, and we shall discharge them.

Mr. Keith Simpson: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Reid: No. I have only 14 minutes in which to respond to the debate.

Additionally, we have embarked on a defence diplomacy initiative, which means using the military assets necessary for the defence of our country in such a way as to lessen the likelihood of their being deployed in anger in war. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence co-operated on that sensible, relevant and modern policy framework with the Foreign Office. As is the case in every Department, the Treasury has been consulted. That is the normal business of government—but it does not mean that this review, like the rest, has been led by the Treasury, or by any arbitrary dictates of the Treasury. The starting point has been foreign policy.

Of course resources matter. We live in the real world. I have tried to deal with the main points in the limited time available, but let me make one final point. The cliché that people are our most precious resource is no less true because it is often uttered. People are at the centre of our strategic defence review. We are looking at a range of policies—not only because that is morally good, but because the third element of fighting power, morale, is the most underestimated. All the equipment and all the doctrine in the world mean nothing if we do not ensure that our people are properly protected and resourced. We are proud of what we have done in the Gulf, and will justify that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We must move to the next debate.

Special Needs Education (Croydon)

12.30 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): The House debated special educational needs as recently as December. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris)—who I am pleased to see is replying to today's debate—set out her proposals and priorities for special educational needs in the light of the Green Paper published in October 1997. She made it clear that the Government were not adopting a cost-cutting approach to SEN—a message that, regrettably, was not heard by Croydon council.

The Minister and others also acknowledged that life had not started on 1 May 1997, and we were grateful for the tribute that she paid to the last Government's work in developing what was a rather grey area. I myself pay tribute now to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who, as Minister of State in the Department, did much to address the issue.

I broadly welcome the Government's six principles, enshrined in the Green Paper, and their detailed approach to the subject. We are talking about some of the most vulnerable people in society, whose needs go far beyond the imagination of those with healthy children. No political ideology is involved; we all owe it to under-privileged children to give them the best education that our nation can provide.

An important principle established in the Green Paper is the need to work with parents. The Green Paper rightly says that parents of children with special educational needs face exceptional pressures, and the Government rightly say that they want to help parents cope with those pressures and to give them real opportunities to influence and contribute to their children's education. During the December debate, the Minister reminded us that partnership between home and school is crucial for all children.

By and large, special needs education in Croydon is, in the words of the weather men, fair to good—with one notable exception. We have two schools, Redgates and Priory, helping those with severe learning difficulties. The main thrust of the borough's provision of services for those with moderate learning difficulties comes from two schools, St. Nicholas in my constituency and Bensham Manor. Each school originally provided for the five-to-16 age range. They are excellent schools, and they catered respectively for the north and the south of the borough.

In a fairly controversial move that upset many parents, the two schools were reorganised so that St. Nicholas provided for the five-to-11s and Bensham Manor for the 12-to-16s. Unfortunately, that means that, on reaching the age of 12, children in the south of the borough must make a long journey to the north.

This is a highly relevant factor in Croydon's education service. Croydon is a large, wedge-shaped borough with crowded roads, which makes travel from south to north and into the heart of London very difficult. Services must be provided in the south for all age groups. Having been educated at St. Nicholas, in the leafy glades of the suburbs, children are obliged to undertake the journey through those crowded streets to a strange part of town with which neither they nor their parents are familiar. The north-south divide in Croydon is the real cause of many of the borough's problems.

Last summer, St. Nicholas was found to contain asbestos, and it has been necessary to relocate the school temporarily at the Heath Clark adult education centre. I understand that it will return in September, and that the building will then have been fully refurbished. I congratulate the council on its prompt response to a particularly difficult problem.

St. Giles school in Pampisford road is an inspiration to all who visit it, showing them what can be achieved. It contains facilities not only for those with physical mobility problems, but for those who are deaf and blind. I pay tribute to the staff of St. Giles. If the Minister ever wants to see a good example within easy range of her office, that is where she should go.

There were four day care centres for the under-fives, one of which was the Hazelglen special educational needs school—the only one in the south of the borough. In September 1997, Croydon council published a document entitled "Policy for Pupils with Special Educational Needs". It is well drawn up, and its principles largely coincide with those in the Green Paper. It builds on the work of the last Government and the last administration in Croydon.

Regrettably, the words of that document contrast markedly with the actions of the politicians on Croydon's Labour council. It was produced after the outrageous closure of the Hazelglen special educational needs school for the under-fives. That closure was in blatant disregard of the principles in Croydon council's code of conduct, and the six principles in the Green Paper. Today, I want to know the real reason why the school was closed. If the Minister cannot give me the reason, I shall call for an inquiry into why the closure took place in breach of the Government's stated principles that this is not a cost-cutting area and that parents will be involved.

In the 1994 London borough elections, the Labour group, in its manifesto, issued a number of pledges on education and on special educational needs in particular. Under the heading "Nurseries and Child Care", it stated:

"Labour will provide more nursery facilities to enable parents to find jobs".

Under "Nursery Education", it stated:

"An Education Officer will be given enhanced designated responsibility for the under-fives and will work with the Social Services Department, the Health Authority and the voluntary sector to develop an integrated borough approach to the needs of the very young".

Under the heading "Special Educational Needs", it stated:

"We will provide clearer and more consistent funding for the special educational needs of pupils".

Finally, under the heading "Services for people with learning disabilities", it stated:

"A Labour council will aim to provide a variety of day care centres".

It is clear as a bell that Labour was committed to maintaining and improving the system, and on that basis people voted for it. It was a clear pledge, and people expected Labour to deliver.

The Hazelglen centre provided SEN facilities for children under five. Typical of the children who went there were the children of Sioban and Tom Foster, who have cystic fibrosis. They needed physiotherapy, a special high-fat diet and extra vitamins and drugs. In addition, one of the children has cerebral palsy and hydrocephalus. They depended on the centre for the support that they needed. Others—the Kellys, the Finlays, the Traffords—also depended on Hazelglen, and relied on Labour's commitment, which they were entitled to view with optimism. Accordingly, their lives were shattered when on 5 February parents received a letter stating that the school was to close. It said:

"The decision to close the Centre is a financial one and is not connected in any way to the quality of service provided by the staff."

Offering parents a chance to meet the officials involved, the letter went on to say that, "for this reason", the officials

"will be at Hazelglen at 10.00 am on Thursday 6th February so that you can raise any issues directly."

That was just 24 hours after the announcement of the closure.

The closure was the end of the principle of working with parents. It undermined parents in a cruel and uncaring way. It was an absolute bombshell for parents who, having had their lives shattered on learning of their children's problems, were now being completely undermined.

In addition to dismay about the broken promises and short notice, there is concern about the way in which the closure was carried out. It seems that the manager of the centre was told about it three months before it happened, and was asked to keep his mouth shut. Accordingly, it was no surprise when the staff of the social services department wrote to members of the council's social services committee stating:

"As a caring Team committed to our work, we feel that the council's meetings and the length of time it has taken to inform us of proposals devalued the professional manner in which we work and operate the centre."

I could not have put it better myself. It is already apparent that not only the school's merits but educational needs were ignored, and that the matter was completely financial.

The Labour councillors behaved no better, slipping figures into a social services budget report. There was no statement or explanation, no debate, and not even social service minutes on the closure. Only the Conservative councillors are recorded as voting against the budget when the first inkling of the decision was revealed.

The parents of the children at Hazelglen could not understand that, while the school was being closed, £1 million was being spent on decorating Croydon's pavements with red bricks; £750,000 was being spent on producing a glossy magazine; £350,000 was being spent on a pavilion in South Norwood; and £61,000 was being spent on lasers to light up Croydon. Thousands of pounds were spent to buy mobile phones for Labour councillors. Against that, a mere £24,000 was saved by closing the Hazelglen day centre.

The illogicality becomes apparent when we note that some of the children are now being placed in private care that is paid for by the council. That makes a mockery of Labour's pledge in opposition and in government.

All was revealed when Mr. Tony Foster wrote to the Croydon Advertiser, a newspaper that has done much to disclose the scandal of Hazelglen. His letter states:

"My response comes in the context of being both a campaigner against this closure and as a local Labour Party member.

The truth of the matter is that Hazelglen is caught up in the internal politics of the Croydon Labour Party. The decision to close Hazelglen is therefore political and not financial. Hazelglen, unlike the other day care centres in the North of the borough, has suffered from budget cuts every year since Labour took office. The closure has been planned for years and is not the result of 'financial pressures' from this year's tight settlement.

Having realised the paucity of the financial argument Labour has resorted to claiming that Hazelglen is not as accessible as the other centres. This is despite of it being located on top of not one, but two BR stations (Sanderstead and Purley Oaks) and with local bus stops also. Incredible!

Hazelglen is, therefore, the nursery that is being closed for no reason and in this entire process the Labour council has shown contempt for the principles that the Labour party should stand for: democracy, social justice, decency and integrity. I believed that Labour was set up to fight injustice, not to cause it. Maybe, I was idealistic, but the disappointment is profound."

As I say, that letter was from a Labour party member.

Most amazing of all was the fudge and obfuscation of Labour councillors and Ministers. I took up the matter with Mr. Charlie Burling, who at that time was chairman of Croydon council's finance committee, and asked him to receive a delegation of parents. In a letter under the slogan "New Labour, New Life for Britain", he refused. His refusal to meet a delegation was to cover up the internal rows in the Labour party.

The bluster and cover-up continued. I wrote to the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, and his reply on House of Commons notepaper states:

"The closure of Hazelglen was authorised by the previous government".

I decided to take up the matter with his Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Yardley, who is replying to today's debate. In the debate on 5 December, I asked her to look into the matter, and she courteously agreed. She carefully relied on advice on the closure that was given to her by Croydon social services department, and in her letter she gave the following reasons, quoting Croydon:

"the centre was not best located for families in the West and South of the Borough; the average occupancy was lower at Hazelglen than at the other day care centres in the Borough; and the level of need in the areas covered by the centre was not as marked as in the south east and north of the Borough."

None of those reasons is true. Although I said that they were totally contrary to the explanation that was given by the council to the parents, which was that the decision was financial, the Minister wrote to me again stating:

"I understand from Croydon Social Services Department that the decision to close Hazelglen was based on the factors cited in my previous letter, but that this was prompted by the financial situation facing the Council."

The Minister's letter contains a slight shift of emphasis. It continues:

"You also say that the closure of Hazelglen means that there is now no special needs nursery education in the south of the Borough. Croydon Education Department have explained that all nursery classes in the borough are expected to support children with special education needs. I understand that specifically in the south of the Borough there are a total of 184 nursery places in schools receiving significant input from other agencies, a further 156 places in schools situated in areas of relative deprivation and a pilot project at an infant school which provides 104 places."

That information is simply not correct. First, the Minister should know that there is a big difference between nursery classes that focus only on educational needs, and day care, which is what many of the children at Hazelglen needed. Secondly, Croydon council's nursery expansion programme reveals that only 15 per cent. of any additional nursery places will go to the south of the borough.

According to a council report that I received only yesterday, the most generous interpretation is that there are only 65 special needs places in the southern part of London's largest borough. It is worrying that there is a complete absence of a good explanation for the closure. It was badly handled and upsetting, and stressful to all concerned. It was in breach of Labour's manifesto commitment, of Croydon's policy on special educational needs, and of the Green Paper principles; and it is a breach of faith with the parents and children of Hazelglen.

I shall give the Minister a final flavour of how the parents feel about this matter by reading a poem for Croydon Labour councillors. It reads:

"A teardrop trickles down my cheek,
Looking for a place to hide.
Why couldn't you be honest,
Not cheated us and lied?

I wonder if you mock us
When we're no longer there,
If you laugh we voted LABOUR
And we fell into your lair.

Did you ever really worry?
Or was it simply fun,
To pull the strings of people's lives
And watch the damage done?

We took you all for honest.
We thought you would be true.
A victim of your silly games,
Now what are we to do?

We feel the pain so deeply,
We only wish you knew,
Of all that we have suffered,
As a result of trusting you!"

That poem is signed "From the parents of Hazelglen". Is that what new Labour is all about?

12.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) on again managing to bring the needs of his constituents, especially for early years special education, to the House. He made an important contribution to our debate on the matter before Christmas and to the Green Paper, which I appreciated. I recognise his continuing concern, not only about SEN but for the children of his constituents.

I shall continue from where we left off in the previous debate on the matter, which took place just after we published our Green Paper on SEN, which, I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman, has resulted in more than 3,500 responses. That is a massive response, on a subject that has not had as much attention in the past as it deserved. Croydon was one of the local education authorities that responded. We look forward to analysing the detailed responses and taking the agenda forward.

I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns about SEN and about early identification and assessment. Whatever differences we may have in the rest of the debate, I know that we shall share concerns about those matters in the years ahead. Such issues unite the House, and I am happy to pay tribute to all those hon. Members who put them at the centre of their concerns.

I mentioned the importance of early identification and assessment and, in view of the passion with which the hon. Gentleman spoke about the closure of the nursery in his constituency, it is necessary to give the reasons for that importance.

I know that the hon. Gentleman will be concerned about early identification and assessment. He knows that, unless we get it right in those crucial early years, we stand little chance of getting it right elsewhere in the education system. Moreover, I agree with him that early identification is even more necessary for children with SEN than for any other identifiable group.

Although I would never pretend that early intervention and support will remove the need for support later in a child's school career, they accomplish three crucial objectives: first, they reduce the need for later support; secondly, they send a message that we have high expectations of all children, including those with SEN; and, thirdly—I know that the hon. Gentleman will be in accord with this objective—they establish at an early stage the vital relationship between parent and teacher and all the other professionals who work with children with SEN.

I share the hon. Gentleman's long-standing concerns about nursery provision for children with special educational needs in Croydon. As he said, we have corresponded—I think twice now, although he has corresponded also with the Secretary of State—about the closure of Hazelglen nursery.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, closure of the nursery is a matter for the Croydon local authority. As it is not a school, neither the Department for Education and Employment nor the Department of Health has any statutory powers to intervene. However—because of our shared concern about special needs—I am concerned if he feels that its closure has meant that the south of the borough, which he represents, will have no provision for nursery-age children with special educational needs.

I have spoken to Croydon—which will inevitably be one of the sources of information used by the Department. The comments made in this Adjournment debate also will be taken on board and investigated by the Department. Moreover, I shall happily reply to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes to continue our correspondence.

I have been told by Croydon that its policy is to ensure that all the nurseries it maintains offer places for children with special educational needs. Almost 450 places are available for nursery-age children in south Croydon. Specifically, the borough maintains four nursery schools that give priority to children with SEN and are resourced to do so. Two of those are in the south of the borough.

Additionally, nursery places are attached to two special schools, and 35 nurseries are attached to mainstream schools—15 of which are in the south of the borough. All those nurseries can and do offer places to children with special educational needs. Currently, 54 nursery-age children in Croydon are statemented, and all of them have nursery places.

I hope that that information will at least partly allay the hon. Gentleman's concerns. I should add that 65 children in the borough currently benefit from the portage system, which is a very valuable part of early years service.

I heard what the hon. Gentleman said about the special needs of SEN youngsters. I would not be happy if those needs were not being met specially within an early years institution. However, I should not be keen to make the judgment that those needs can be met only within a special educational needs nursery, although they have a very valuable role to play. I am sure that he will agree that nurseries that do not specialise in SEN children could, with support, offer a very good-quality service to those children. As the Green Paper indicated, such matching and variety of provision is the route that we want to pursue.

My information from Croydon is that it offers those two categories of service and specialised support. In Croydon, 43 per cent. of children with statements of special need are in special schools, whereas 57 per cent. are in maintained schools with either units or people to support statemented children. I think that such a varied, and I hope flexible, approach to children with statements of special educational needs shows the way forward.

Mr. Ottaway: Neither the letters from Croydon council nor these from the Minister to me gave those reasons for the closure. If those are the reasons, why were they not given? The truth is that they were not the reason why the school was closed.

Ms Morris: All I have attempted to do is state the provision that Croydon feels it is offering for special needs children. That is the pattern on which it has embarked in making nursery provision for all its statemented children.

I understand what the hon. Gentleman said about Hazelglen day centre. Any closure and any change is disturbing and distracting for parents and young children. As a constituency Member of Parliament, I realise that, every time a school is closed or threatened with closure, someone's life is affected. Such changes perhaps cause that person temporarily to have a more disjointed existence. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that we would never make progress if we set everything in stone.

Croydon's letters to me, and certainly my second letter to the hon. Gentleman, acknowledged that, on the basis of last year's financial settlement—not on the basis of the financial settlement that this Government have offered for next year, although I do not attempt to make political points—the financial situation was one of the factors that drove it to reassess the matter.

In my letters to the hon. Gentleman, I said also that the reassessment was prompted by the fact that "the centre was not best located for families in the West and South of the Borough", and that average occupancy was lower than in other day care centres. I wrote also that Croydon had said that

"the level of need in the areas covered by the centre was not as marked as in the south east and north of the Borough."

I would defend a local authority's right to replan its provision. Authorities must occasionally do that, because it is right for them to assess where they are at and where they want to go. Croydon maintains that Hazelglen is part of that redevelopment, and part of the necessary change in achieving its vision for meeting the needs of children with SEN and their parents in the borough of Croydon.

Croydon gave a commitment—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will tell me if it is not being met—to the users of Hazelglen day care centre that the children there would receive alternative services. I am told that that commitment has been honoured, and that many of those children are moving into nursery and reception classes. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will tell me if he feels that what Croydon has told me is not an accurate reflection of the situation there. However, I accept that a period of change is sometimes difficult to handle.

The hon. Gentleman gave the impression, both in his correspondence to me and in his speech today—it is important to get it straight now—that Hazelglen was a special needs nursery. Hazelglen was established not as a day care centre to meet the specific needs of special needs children and their parents, but to offer a wider service. That includes children with SEN and their parents, but it also includes other children and parents. It is right to establish that fact.

I am pleased also—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome it—that the Hazelglen site will be developed as a family resource centre. Croydon has an agreement with Barnardo's—a national children's organisation of very high repute—to implement that planning—

Mr. Ottaway: Maybe.

Ms Morris: I am told that it is a bit more than "maybe", and I hope that it comes to fruition. I very much hope that—if we were to return to this debate in a year or even less—the hon. Gentleman will be able to say that, "Yes; as ever, the period of change was difficult and challenging, but the new facility on the site is continuing to offer provision that meets the needs of families in my area."

Although I do not under-estimate for a minute the hon. Gentleman's concerns about children and parents at Hazelglen, I was pleased to hear his tribute to other providers—schools and units—in Croydon. In preparing for this debate, I inevitably became better versed in what is happening in Croydon. I was very pleased to note the match of provision—the special schools and units—provided by Croydon. St. Giles school, which he mentioned, is one of those in which a special unit for the hearing and visually impaired has been attached. That is very attractive.

For all that the hon. Gentleman has said about Hazelglen, he represents a constituency in a borough that has, over the years, provided for the needs of special needs children in an imaginative manner—which, as he said, he has supported. Although I do not want to put a time limit on it, I should like to accept his offer to visit St. Giles school—which he has offered to the House as an example of good practice. That is how we want to develop policy—by learning what works, seeing who has got it right and then letting the rest of the country know about it. I am sure that some of the changes taking place in Croydon with regard to early years provision and how to meet the special needs of certain youngsters will in time be the sort of good practice from which we can learn and which we can spread to the rest of the country.

Again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, South on keeping the needs of his constituents at the forefront of our mind. I also want the needs of this particular group of people to be met, and I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman's fears will be allayed in the near future.

Utilities (Foreign Ownership)

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): I must first thank Madam Speaker for selecting this debate. I also thank my hon. Friend the Minister for Science, Energy and Industry for being here to listen and respond to it. I am sure that my hon. Friend will expect me at some point to call for public ownership of the electricity utilities, and I will not disappoint him in that regard. I support public ownership and see it as the only answer in the long term to the problems in the utility companies.

American companies in particular have bought into the United Kingdom electricity market over the past three years. They now own about 60 per cent. of our electricity distribution and supply companies. The reasons why American companies want to move into Britain are clear. First, British companies represent cash mountains—the money can be siphoned off for use in other, sometimes fairly dubious activities, usually in north America. Secondly, the American firms are fairly fond of our pretty lax regulatory regime. Thirdly, they see Britain as a springboard to the European electricity market at some point in the future.

I should like to make it clear that I am not being a little Englander in criticising the activities of American energy companies, but to me it is as plain as a pikestaff that if the control and ownership of electricity utility companies is concentrated not in Britain but in institutions and individuals thousands of miles away in America, it will be that much more difficult to call those institutions and individuals and to account, to ensure that they act in the best interests of the people they employ and of those to whom they supply electricity.

The American ownership of UK companies that has been taking place over the past three years is merely the latest stage in a process that began in 1989 with the privatisation undertaken by the previous Government. The electricity industry was privatised at rock-bottom prices, and it is almost an exercise in showing how the idea of a sort of people's capitalism, which Baroness Thatcher, the former Prime Minister, evoked, has failed.

Seven million people bought shares in the electricity companies at knockdown prices. Today, only 2 million individuals own shares. The number is still falling and will probably continue to fall for the foreseeable future. Privatisation has not been a form of people's capitalism; in fact, it has meant huge job cuts, attacks on pay and conditions, such as sickness benefits, the greater outsourcing of work, with all that is attendant on that, and huge pay rises for the directors of the privatised companies.

The industry lost 66,000 jobs in nine years, which is about 45 per cent. of the work force. Eastern Electricity, which supplies my area and much of eastern England, has lost 3,000 jobs, while the pay bill for the directors has risen by something like £1.2 million or £1.3 million.

At the same time, the privatised companies have forced employees to bargain in ever smaller units rather than have national collective bargaining. Often the companies have refused to negotiate with full-time union officials, but negotiate directly with lay members to undermine the strength of the unions. That has meant that pay and conditions have been continually attacked through outsourcing. The inevitable consequence of outsourcing is that work goes to smaller companies that pay lower wages and offer inferior conditions.

The whole process has been and will be exacerbated by the arrival of the big companies with real market power. The Southern Company, for example, which bought SWEB, cut the work force and attacked sick pay entitlement. Incidentally, Southern has an absolutely appalling environmental record in the United States. The idea that our already weak regulatory regime will be able to protect our constituents against the ravages of big companies with market muscle is laughable at best.

Despite all the cuts, the regulator has reduced electricity prices to consumers in England and Wales by only 9 per cent. and in Scotland by only 7 per cent. Price cuts were going to be the one great advantage of privatisation. The idea was that the regulator would be able to reduce prices enormously. In fact, the reductions have been fairly insignificant, or peripheral to everything else that has happened.

At the same time, the regulator cannot even command the supply of electricity. The reality is that since privatisation, thousands of cash meters have been fitted in homes across the country. That means that the number of disconnections has dropped considerably—there are only a handful these days, whereas there used to be 100 or 200 a year. However, if someone cannot afford to feed the meter, he effectively cuts himself off. Therefore, there are still disconnections, although the figures belie that fact.

Eastern Electricity which, as I said, supplies my area, is currently the subject of what looks like a fairly vicious takeover battle between Pacificorp and Texas, two large United States firms. We are now in the absurd situation where jobs, security of supply and people's living standards in eastern England are subject to the whims of a takeover battle that is centred thousands of miles away among individuals and institutions that probably know absolutely nothing about eastern England, and still less about the people whom the company that they are looking to take over supplies or employs.

I have no doubt that both companies regard Eastern Electricity as the cash cow for their activities in north America. I note that Texas has been engaging in some fairly aggressive lobbying since it launched its takeover bid. It wrote to me asking whether I would like to meet the vice-chairman—I have to say that I am not particularly interested in doing so. I understand that it has written to other hon. Members, too.

Texas has a big problem with an old nuclear plant in north America, which it wants to decommission. That would be very expensive, and I am sure that the company intends to divert the cash from Eastern Electricity to America to pay for that decommissioning.

The new management of those companies talks continually about wanting "greater flexibility". The other great refrain is "human resources management". If ever a phrase was worthy of Joseph Goebbels, it is "human resources management". In fact, those phrases mean massive job cuts and the removal of any union or collective representation from the work force, so that the workers can be picked off and kicked when the time is right.

The British electricity industry is now effectively utterly at the mercy of market forces. I cannot see that position changing while we continue to allow the large companies to dominate the industry. There is another problem on the horizon—the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's multilateral agreement on investment, which means that companies will be able to sue Governments whose laws interfere with those companies' profits.

For example, if a company moved into Britain's electricity supply industry and wanted to burn orimulsion in one of its power stations—orimulsion is the dirtiest fuel on the planet—what would the Government do? The sensible thing, which I am sure that the Government would do, would be to tell the company that it was not allowed to burn it. However, under the OECD's MAI, the company could sue the Government because the prevention of the burning of orimulsion would potentially interfere with the company's profits. Such a case is currently under way in Canada under the North American Free Trade Agreement. The danger is that we are taking that very route.

To my mind, all those problems clearly establish the need for public ownership. The only way that we can make the electricity industry work on behalf of the public is for it to be publicly owned and publicly accountable. Clearly, that becomes increasingly difficult as more electricity companies are owned and run by organisations based in north America. Now is the time for us to move—we should think about taking the companies back into public ownership before the British electricity industry is entirely owned by companies based in north America.

People have often objected to public ownership on the basis of cost, but that argument does not hold water. When the power, coal, rail and steel industries were nationalised in the late 1940s, the Government paid for them in bonds, not cash. There was no huge outflow of money from the Treasury—the Government did not have it anyway—and the bonds were paid for year by year. We could repeat that and bring the electricity industry into some form of public ownership and public accountability, so that it could work for the public good in future generations.

1.10 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Cryer) on obtaining this Adjournment debate, and thank him for giving me the opportunity to add some brief points at what is an appropriate time for my constituents.

The key issue concerns the two American giants that are buying Energy Group plc, of which Eastern Electricity is a major component. Energy Group is valued at billions of pounds, despite the windfall levy, which we were told would cripple it. Far be it from me to suggest a further squeeze to the Chancellor, but the money might not come amiss and might help to alleviate some of the other problems that we face.

My interest stems from my constituents, who pay money loyally to Eastern Electricity. I, too, pay loyally, although I owe £43; if anyone from the company is present, I should say that the cheque is in the post.

I want to take up the issues that were expressed in early-day motion 710, such as whether the companies that are attempting the takeover have the relevant experience and competence. Massive profiteering is almost certain. I want consumer satisfaction to be met through the provision of cheaper electricity, not least to pensioners, of whom there are many in my constituency. I also want long-term investment to improve services; Eastern Electricity is to be congratulated on improving its services in Norwich, North after consulting me.

Safety and environmental issues are most important. I do not want nuclear power to act as a substitute for other sources in the attempt to ensure safe electricity production. How will the American companies meet the Government target of a 20 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions by 2010? Nuclear power is not an acceptable answer.

I hope that the Minister will say something about renewable components in the supply industry. Let us hear about energy efficiency, not share prices. Any Government worth their salt would take care of those factors before allowing such a takeover.

1.12 pm

The Minister for Science, Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Cryer) for securing a debate on these matters, and my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) for his remarks. Some of our debates on energy have not raised the wider questions, so I am grateful to my hon. Friends for the context in which they have set the debate. I appreciate the forthrightness and consistency of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch in calling for renationalisation. I respect his position, but I say at the outset, as he perhaps expected, that I do not agree with it, as I shall explain.

The previous Government's privatisation programme massively changed the shape of the industry. There are now 63 licensed electricity suppliers, some of which were not traditionally involved in the industry, such as catalogue companies, supermarkets and banks. The shape has changed since the days of the Central Electricity Generating Board, for which my father worked. The industry has been broken into fragments: generation—the range of fuel sources—the distribution and grid system, and the regional electricity suppliers have been separated.

The change and dynamism in the sector have been far greater than was anticipated. Buying back and piecing together the industry would not be as easy as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch suggests, and it is not one of the Government's priorities—it is not on our agenda. We want competition where possible, but regulation where necessary.

My hon. Friend referred to regulation of the industry, which I believe to be of vital significance not only to consumers but to the economy as a whole. Given the impact of the regulated utilities on our lives, work, homes, environment and public services, it is crucial that we ensure that the regulatory relationships are right.

We recognise, for example, that when a licensed utility, such as a regional electricity company, is acquired by another company, whether British or foreign, there may be vertical, horizontal or diagonal integration—water or gas companies buy electricity companies and regional electricity companies break away from the generators. Whatever the merger or takeover, it raises the key issue of regulation, on which we should focus. We want to ensure that any utility can be regulated after an acquisition as effectively as before. My hon. Friends are right to emphasise that consumers should not lose out.

In all mergers, all aspects of United Kingdom public interest, including safety, can be considered under the Fair Trading Act 1973. I want to move on and suggest that there is more for us to tackle. When the Government came to office, we said, on the basis of the preparatory work that we had carried out in opposition, that we were not happy with the regulation regime in place. We believed that the dynamism, the fragmentation and the maelstrom of change in energy markets meant that we had to get regulation right; we did not think that the current system was appropriate.

In opposition, we set up a consultative review of regulation, to determine whether we could get the shapes right to take us through into the brave new world of these changing markets. We said that, in government, we would review the system of utility regulation that we inherited, to set the new shapes that could provide a transparent and accountable regime for the industry in the 21st century.

Regulation used to be rather limited; it was focused on stimulating a market—I think that that was the expression—and introducing competition, and it existed mainly as price regulation. The classic economic definition was narrow; regulation mattered only in getting the price right. The price formula—retail prices index minus X—and driving prices down were emphasised.

We want new elements to come into play. I see regulation as a triangle. At the apex is an emphasis on prices—of course, prices are important; we want a reduction in prices rather than the profiteering that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch mentioned. The triangle has two other corners, however: social obligation and environmental responsibilities. We have a three-pronged approach to regulation, as opposed to a narrow focus on prices.

My hon. Friend mentioned disconnection and pre-payment meters. He was right to say that we did not have to wait for a review of utility regulation to tackle the question of pre-payment meters. In opposition, I shouted from the rooftops about the fact that people were disconnecting themselves because of pre-payment meters, which was why the real toll that they took was not known. People were dying from hypothermia because they did not have fuel to heat their homes in the winter; if they did not have money to put on the cash card, they could not clock up the meter and had to go without energy.

What are we doing now? Now that we are in government, we have already challenged the pre-payment meters and the fact that people who use them effectively subsidise those with direct debit accounts at the top end of the scale. That was a classic case of the poor subsidising the rich, rather than the other way round. We have asked the regulator to move in and ensure that that injustice is not perpetuated.

Social obligations form one corner of the triangle. Another is environmental responsibility. It means that we must match our targets for carbon dioxide emissions, as well as ensuring that the wider responsibilities to which my hon. Friend referred—in connection with safety as well as with the environment—are built into regulation.

That is precisely why we set up the utility regulation review announced last year by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The review is aimed at ensuring open, predictable regulation that is fair to everybody, promotes environmental objectives and sustainable development, and ensures that there are investment incentives.

Why are investment incentives important? I must tell my hon. Friend that they mean, for example, ensuring that companies have the people working for them and invest in keeping the system going. As he may know, there was a debate in January in which some of our hon. Friends asked about wires that had come down in the Norweb area, in Wales and elsewhere, over Christmas.

The question asked was: had those companies stripped and outsourced to such an extent that there were not enough people—that is, enough engineers—to keep the power lines up? The whole purpose of the system is that companies can be regulated under the price formula only if they invest and employ the right-sized work force for the job that needs to be done.

After the review of regulation, we shall produce a consultation document setting out our proposals, which I hope will appear in the near future. It will set out and sharpen our approach to regulation, and set it on a footing that will take us into the future.

Seven of the 12 regional electricity companies in England and Wales are now owned by American companies. That is the right figure for the present, but the Energy Group, which owns Eastern, is the subject of a takeover bid by a United States company. It is important to remind ourselves that it would not be the first time that Eastern has been acquired, because it was previously taken over by the Hanson group.

That merger was considered and cleared under the Fair Trading Act 1973 by the previous Administration, at which time the regulator made several modifications to the conditions of the licence to ring-fence Eastern's regulated electricity activities from the rest of the group.

The ring-fencing is important, because the changes were made to ensure that Eastern would continue to have access to adequate financial and management resources to fulfil its obligations as a public electricity supplier and to maintain standards and the quality of supply. Actions by the parent company that could have prevented that were prohibited. The ring-fencing was set up precisely to ensure that companies could not whisk the money straight across to America without falling under regulation. Otherwise, even price regulation could have been undermined.

The key, of course, is to ensure that regional electricity companies remain within the reach of the regulator. That is why we are examining the structure of the regulatory regime, to ensure that we can insist that that happens. At the time of the bid by Hanson, Eastern was required to trade at arm's length from other group companies, and if the licence conditions are breached, the Director General of Electricity Supply has statutory powers to take enforcement action. In the last resort, the licence could be revoked.

As my hon. Friend said, the key is to ensure that the companies remain within the reach of the regulator and abide by our structure and our arrangements covering price, social obligation and environmental responsibilities.

As for recent bids, in the short time available, I cannot go through the whole history of the bids for Eastern. I know that hon. Members are concerned that electricity companies must have particular duties and responsibilities that follow through from their role in ensuring secure supplies of electricity. Of course, that factor must be considered in any decision about mergers that the President of the Board of Trade has to take in connection with regional electricity company takeover bids.

[Mr. John Battle]

The director general has proposed that should Pacificorp's bid for the Energy Group proceed to acquisition, he will further strengthen the ring-fencing conditions by inserting additional safeguards against cross-default provisions. As hon. Members may be aware, the director general has published a consultation paper suggesting further modifications to the licences of the public electricity suppliers that have already been subject to takeovers. There is a proposal to require other public electricity suppliers in every case to seek and maintain investment-grade credit ratings, and to prohibit cross-default provisions in any borrowing agreement.

The paper also mentions ensuring that the investment plans are there, and that the people are working in the company to carry the work and the investment forward. That means checking actual investment against the plans and measuring the quality of the service that regional electricity companies provide for their customers. The director general would be able to revoke the licence if the requirements were not met.

Pacificorp has made a bid. I understand that a statement of interest by Nomura, which my hon. Friend raised in early-day motion 710, with my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, has now been withdrawn, and it is uncertain whether the American Texas Utilities is still interested. But it is clear from the press speculation that Pacificorp is still interested, and the question now is whether the shareholders will accept, so I cannot comment.

What we need to be sure of is that if a deal takes place, the assurances agreed between Pacificorp and the regulator on the licence conditions proposed are accepted and respected. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission had several important concerns about the merger originally proposed, but concluded that the licence conditions meant that the proposed merger would not operate against the public interest. None the less, it said that it wanted to stiffen the licence conditions to take that possibility on board.

Among other possible bids is one for the Energy Group by Texas. The company has announced that it is in talks with the Energy Group that may lead to a bid. Were there to be a bid that fell to be considered under the Fair Trading Act, it would have to be treated on its merits in the usual way. I am sure that my hon. Friend understands that I am not in a position to comment in detail on whether such a bid would be approved. The President of the Board of Trade would decide, in the light of the advice received from the Director General of Fair Trading and of the views of the electricity regulator, whether it should be referred to the MMC.

In formulating that advice, the regulator will take account of any representations received from parties to the merger or from any other third party. That is an important point. It is not only companies that can put in evidence; it is open to any third party to give evidence and say why it does not believe the deal to be in the public interest. That opportunity should be taken more often.

Nomura suggested at one time that it would be interested in a bid, but it seems that it has now stated publicly that it is no longer in talks. I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that it would be inappropriate for me to comment specifically on any particular bid.

As for the multilateral agreement on investment, to which my hon. Friend referred, there was a debate earlier this week, on 23 February, in which the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry spoke at length about it and spelt out the fact that it does not prevent sensible regulation of the environment. Decisions on whether to allow orimulsion or any other fuel to be used would not be affected by that agreement.

I must remind my hon. Friend that it was the present Administration who, when we came to office and were faced with the possibility of an orimulsion plant—in Pembroke, I believe—insisted on a public inquiry before the project could go ahead. I understand that as a result of that decision, the company pulled out of the proposal. So there is no orimulsion plant in Britain now, and I do not know of any current bid for one. Questions were asked at the time and we took the relevant action.

The MAI is not yet settled and there is still work to be done, but we shall press hard for an unambiguous reaffirmation in the agreement of commitments to sustainable development and to core labour standards; for close association of the MAI with the OECD guidelines for multinational enterprises, which are collective recommendations by all the OECD Governments to multinationals on good corporate behaviour; and for strong and binding provisions on not waiving environmental or labour standards to attract particular investments, which is one of the matters on which we shall take a strong line in negotiations. It was our Government who proposed the review of the MAI and its environmental policy, and we shall continue to press on those matters.

The debate has given us a welcome opportunity to hear my hon. Friend's views—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Security Service Files

1.30 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss this subject in the House. I am especially grateful to see the Home Secretary preparing to answer personally on this topic, which is increasingly close to his heart. I have written to the Labour Members in this House and to those in another place whom I propose to mention if time allows, and I am gratified to see that that is one way in which to ensure that the House is not too poorly attended for my oration.

I suggest that we take a trip back in our imaginations to 1945. Let us imagine that the outcome of the 1945 general election had been different and that, as widely expected, the Conservatives had won. Let us imagine that, shortly after that victory, one of their fairly senior figures—a Minister with perhaps not the most spotless reputation—had announced that he was determined that the Security Service, MI5, should destroy all the files on fellow-travellers with Oswald Mosley and the British Union of Fascists. There would have been an outcry—and rightly so—because it is not right for future historians to be denied the opportunity to see what the records say about what people in public life did before—and, I would contend, after—the war, in collusion with or in support of totalitarian, fascist or communist regimes.

How does that relate to today's debate? The answer is, quite simply, that on 22 September 1997, The Guardian published a story about the Minister without Portfolio, headed:

"Mandelson wants MI5 files pulped".

The article began:

"Peter Mandelson, Minister without Portfolio, yesterday called on MI5 to destroy all files on 'subversives' created during the cold war after receiving an apology from the head of the Security Service over the leaking of details from his own file."

It continued with Mr. Mandelson saying:

"'I was not a subversive or a threat to national security—I was a teenager holding ordinary leftwing views'.

He said MI5 should find the resources to 'weed out and destroy' such files, collected during the cold war, 'which are now entirely redundant'."

I was interested in his explanation of his period in the Young Communist League, because it had already been challenged in The Daily Telegraph of 27 August 1997. That article said:

"Mr. Mandelson conceded that, 'disgusted' with the Labour Government's support for the Vietnam war, he had briefly been a member of the Young Communist League in the early 1970s.

'It is true that, for a very short period between three and six months, I was a member of the Young Communist League.'

But former political associates of Mr. Mandelson who knew him at the time said he and some friends had actually set up a branch of the Young Communist League after falling out with the Young Socialists.

They also poured scorn on his reason for leaving the Labour Party, pointing out that Harold Wilson's support for the Vietnam war had come in the 1960s and that, by the early 1970s, the party was no longer in power."

I first raised this matter at the tail end of a speech in the defence debate on 28 October, when I pointed out that it smacked of George Orwell's "Nineteen Eighty-Four" in that the past was being airbrushed. It will be remembered that Orwell's Big Brother state used the slogan:

"Who controls the past controls the future: who controls the present controls the past."

I began once again to think that power had gone to Labour Ministers' heads. I therefore wrote to Stephen Lander, Director General of the Security Service, on 16 October—shortly before the defence debate—saying:

"I intend to raise this matter in the House of Commons as soon as Parliament returns later this month. So far as I can see, there is no question of inaccuracy in any of the information that was held on Mr. Mandelson's political activities as a member of the Young Communist League in the early 1970s. It is therefore quite deplorable and unacceptable that he should have made his reported demands.

I should be much obliged if you will take the trouble to reassure me that there is no intention on the part of your service to destroy files containing accurate information about Communists and their allies who were active in this country at the height of the Cold War—particularly at the behest of one of these formerly misguided individuals."

The Home Secretary replied on behalf of Mr. Lander in a letter dated 28 October—the same date as the defence debate, but received afterwards. He wrote:

"The policy of the Security Service is to retain only those records which it needs to carry out its statutory functions, or which are of historical importance. Files held by the Service are therefore reviewed against those criteria periodically as resources permit. There is no question of consigning whole categories of files for destruction without proper review."

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): The key question is the judgment of what is "of historical importance". The problem is that, almost invariably, that judgment is made by civil servants—although, laughably, Ministers may occasionally try to get something taken out to protect their political reputation. For a historian, the really obstructive thing is when civil servants, to defend their reputation as administrators or having made colossal errors of judgment, weed out or repress things that will reflect badly on them.

Dr. Lewis: My right hon. Friend is an extremely distinguished historian; I am a far less distinguished former military historian and it is precisely from the historian's point of view that I am approaching this matter.

The Home Secretary's letter to me finished:

"On the other hand, given the need to ensure that files are not retained unnecessarily the Service will not retain files which do not seem to merit retention on any of the grounds I have mentioned."

On 30 October 1997, 20 Members of Parliament tabled early-day motion 377, which

"notes the recent admission by the Minister without Portfolio, that he was active in the Young Communist League when MI5 opened a file on him in the early 1970s; regards as unacceptable his excuse that this amounted to the holding of ordinary left-wing views; deplores his reported demand that MI5 files on Cold War subversives should be destroyed; and urges the Director-General of the Security Service to resist partisan and self-serving political pressure from the Minister without Portfolio."

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): As the hon. Gentleman is one of the Opposition's conspiracy theorists, would it not be a good idea to tell us the full story? He is well versed in this matter. He was a spy in Newham Labour party; he was a fellow-traveller; he infiltrated deliberately to try to expose people in the Labour party; and then the Labour Member of Parliament, Reginald Prentice, crossed the Floor of the House and joined the Tory party. To be honest, the hon. Gentleman should tell us the full unvarnished truth about his own activities.

Dr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. If I have my way, my MI5 file—if one exists—will be there so that people can see whether or not what he says is true. That is the irony. Twenty years after my engaging in controversial political activities, my political opponents see fit to bring them up, but, less than that time after controversial political activities in which they engaged, they want to airbrush the record and destroy the evidence of what they did. I thank the hon. Gentleman for supporting my case.

I wrote on 4 November to the Home Secretary to say:

"I quite agree with the criteria set out in your letter. It is certainly of historical interest for future historians to know the extent to which people in British public life co-operated with, or espoused the cause of totalitarian, fascist or communist ideologies before or after the Second World War."

I asked the Home Secretary to be more specific about the assurances he was giving me and, on 8 December, he replied. He said:

"Files which are destroyed are those which are either no longer required by the Service to carry out its statutory functions or are judged not to be of historical importance or both. There can therefore be no danger of the indiscriminate destruction of files by the Security Service."

As an innocent and virginal Back Bencher, I was taken in by this. On 10 December, I wrote to the Home Secretary and said:

"I am grateful for your further letter about the danger of Cold War files being indiscriminately destroyed. I regard your response to my concern as being entirely satisfactory and I thank you for writing back in such a straightforward way."

As far as I was concerned, that was the end of the matter—poor fool that I am.

On 11 January, the front page of The Sunday Times said:

"MI5 orders end to spying on political activists."

The report said:

"The security service MI5 is to announce an end to spying on activists, radicals and insurgents. In a decisive break with its cold war past, it will destroy tens of thousands of files naming anti-nuclear campaigners, trade unionists and others whose organisations were once considered a threat to national security."

The Guardian, on 12 January, said:

"MI5 is speeding up the destruction of thousands of files on individuals it once considered subversive as part of an attempt to modernise".

Evidently, it is now the people's Security Service.

On 15 January, I tabled 12 written questions to ask about the criteria that would be adopted in retaining or disposing of files. Some of the questions were technical and some even went back to criteria used in 1945. I was extremely impressed by the fact that, within five days, I had my answers—although not quite all of my questions were answered. Ten were answered within five days, but a week went by and then another week, and I still received no answers to my remaining two questions.

In the short amount of time I have available—I wish to allow the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) to intervene—I shall refer to the two questions. I fear that I shall disappoint Labour Members whom I warned I might be naming, as I will not have time to do so. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame!"] I will be happy to do so after the debate. The two missing questions were these—one would not have thought that it would take three weeks to answer them. The first was:

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received in favour of the destruction of Security Service files from (a) Labour hon. Members, (b) Labour peers, (c) Ministers, (d) trade union officers and (e) journalists."

The second question was even easier.

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what representations he has received from the Minister without Portfolio for his MI5 file to be destroyed; and if it is to be destroyed."

One would have thought that these were easy questions to answer. However, it took almost three weeks before the Home Secretary came up with a reply—after I had telephoned his office to remind him I was still waiting. He said:

"If I receive any representations from individuals about the possible existence of Security Service files, my practice is to explain the approach of the Security Service to destroying files. It is not my practice to give information about any representations from hon. Members or Ministers or from the other sources listed any more than it would be for me to disclose whether the Service holds or has held files on any individuals."—[Official Report, 3 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 589.]

I would have thought that, if that were the Home Secretary's position, he could have told me so straight away.

I conclude with three questions. Does the Home Secretary accept that it is of legitimate interest to future historians to know which public figures in politics, trade unionism, business or the media consorted with fascists or communists before or after the second world war? Does he accept that it is important that, if files were improperly held, they should be kept so that the Security Service can be called to account in the future? Above all, does he accept that it is especially important for a Labour Government not to preside over the destruction of files that are likely to show some of their Ministers, hon. Members or supporters in a discreditable light?

1.43 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): I shall be brief, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) and to the Home Secretary for allowing me to intervene. This is a serious matter which I approach from a freedom of information point of view. MI5 is important and necessary, but I would suggest to the Home Secretary that a number of steps could be taken, in line with the Government's commitment to freedom of information, which would enable the matter to be progressed in a manner consistent with Government policy.

First, we do not know whether there is a file on the Home Secretary himself—an allegation that has been made. In a written answer on 4 December, he said:

"I have not asked to see, nor have I seen, any file which the Security Service may hold on me."—[Official Report, 4 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 297.]

In response to a later question, he indicated that there were circumstances in which MI5 was permitted to determine that files were not suitable for ministerial eyes—although the Home Secretary is responsible for MI5. There is a democratic deficit there. It is up to Parliament to ensure that procedures are put in place to ensure that MI5 is properly accountable.

There are a number of points that the Home Secretary could usefully pursue which will not endanger national security in any way, but which are consistent with the Government's approach to freedom of information. First, why are non-security matters dealt with by MI5 not subject to the Data Protection Act 1988—particularly matters in support of the police? Why is MI5 excluded from freedom of information legislation, when the test of substantial harm could be applied to its activities in the same way as it is applied to anything else? That may well mean that most of what is dealt with by MI5 does not come out, but some might—instead, we have a proposed blanket exemption. Why are the budgets for MI5, MI6 and GCHQ—the Government communications headquarters—shown not separately, but as one figure in the vote?

Why is the number of individuals on whom files are held not published? The Home Secretary has said that he is looking at that matter, and that no security problem is involved in publishing the number of files held on individuals. Why are telephone tap warrants not given out one per line, so we have an understanding of the number of telephone lines being tapped? At the moment, one warrant can cover an organisation such as the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, which may involve hundreds of people.

What steps have been taken to improve parliamentary scrutiny of MI5 and the security services? At the moment, insufficient information comes to Members of Parliament, and it is in the interests of the Government and the country that MI5 should be accountable and should be seen to be accountable. That will give more confidence in the Security Service than at present exists.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): The debate presents the House with a useful opportunity to discuss aspects of the accountability of the Security Service, and of myself as Home Secretary for that service.

Security Service investigations usually involve the painstaking collection of information about suspects—whether individuals or organisations—whom the service has reason to believe might present a threat to national security. The information must be recorded carefully and systematically if it is to be of any use in investigations. Consequently, the management of records is bound to be a natural consequence of the service's work.

Since 1989, the Security Service has operated under powers granted by Parliament contained in the Security Service Act. The service's practice of collecting information about people is not one that Parliament has treated lightly. The director general is under a statutory obligation to ensure that the service collects only information that it needs for the purposes laid down in the Security Service Acts of 1989 and 1996—to protect national security; to safeguard the economic well-being of the UK against threats posed from abroad; and, since 1996, to act in support of the law enforcement agencies in the prevention and detection of serious crime.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) refers to our commitment to freedom of information and to our commitment to greater openness. I am grateful to him for doing so, because we are indeed committed to that. That is reflected in the publication of the freedom of information White Paper, and will be reflected in the publication of the freedom of information Bill.

The hon. Member for Lewes asked me why the freedom of information Act will exclude the operation of the intelligence agencies. We all recognise, as have successive Administrations, that it is not possible to be open about everything. If we removed the ability of the Security Service to operate in secrecy, we would fatally undermine its capacity to defeat terrorists and spies, who themselves exploit the cover of secrecy. However, as I have told the hon. Gentleman, I believe that we should be prepared to be open about the things that we can reveal without harming the service's capabilities. The service shares that view, and in recent years a great deal of information that would previously have been kept secret has been revealed.

Early on, the hon. Member for Lewes asked me what was the oldest file still kept secret in the Home Office relating to the activities of the Security Service or its predecessors. It turned out that it was a file that dated from 1874. I had that file seriously examined and I agreed that it should be placed in the Public Record Office, following representations. I am grateful to him for that.

However, interestingly, I agreed that, as the file related to the Irish Secret Service, pre-dating the current Security Service, the names of the informants, which were on the file, should be kept secret. Although it is now well over 120 years since the events to which the file relates, given the folk memory in Northern Ireland, if those files were made available, some living individuals could be placed at risk. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Lewes for recognising that.

I believe, as does the service, that the idea of making more information available is right, and I commend the previous Prime Minister and my predecessors as Home Secretary for doing so following the 1989 Act. I am examining, therefore, whether and to what extent it is possible to give details of the number and categories of files held by the Security Service. That answers another question raised by the hon. Member for Lewes. I hope to be able to make an announcement on that subject before the summer recess.

I shall make some general points about the Security Service's file holdings as a whole—

Sir Raymond Whitney (Wycombe): Answer the question.

Mr. Straw: I am answering the question directly. The way in which the service manages its files is described in some detail in the Security Service commissioner's annual report for 1991. The commissioner observed that the procedure for opening a file was strictly controlled. Once a file is open, it is subject to a regime known as "traffic lighting". The reason for that description becomes apparent when I explain that all permanent files are initially given a "green" coding. While a file keeps its green coding, inquiries may be made about the subject of the file.

At the end of the green period, the coding changes to "amber". During the amber period, inquiries about the subject are prohibited, but any relevant information that the service receives about the subject may be added to the file. At the end of the designated amber period, the file is coded "red". During that period, the service may neither carry out inquiries into the subject nor add substantive information to the file.

Finally, after a period of red coding, the file is microfilmed, the hard copy is destroyed and the entry for the file in the service's central index is transferred from the live index to the research index. Access to the research index is limited, and I understand that it is seldom consulted. For example, it is not consulted in vetting checks.

It will be apparent from what I have said that only a proportion of the service's files are current, in the sense that inquiries may be made about the subject of the files. A substantial proportion of the files are closed. Inevitably, over the years, especially during the long, 40-year period of the cold war, many files were opened and, later, closed. It is worth repeating that no inquiries may be made on the service's closed files unless new intelligence justifies reopening the relevant files within the criteria that I described earlier.

I shall say a few words about one target of the Security Service investigations, which featured in some of the closed files and which was mentioned by the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis)—those involved in subversion. One of the Security Service's statutory functions is to protect national security from actions intended to overthrow or undermine democracy by political, industrial or violent means. That is what we mean by subversion today, and it is what we have always meant by it.

It happens that our parliamentary democracy is not currently threatened by the activities of subversive groups, but that was not always the case, and it was especially not the case during the cold war. It was concern about subversive activities which led the then Prime Minister, Clement Attlee, to announce the introduction of new vetting processes, designed to deny members of those groups access to sensitive information. That policy was endorsed by all subsequent Governments, and was most recently set out by the then Prime Minister, in a statement in December 1994.

The threat from subversion declined rapidly following the collapse of Soviet communism, and so did the service's work against that threat. The limited resources that the service currently devotes to its counter-subversion function are now focused on monitoring the position, so that it will be able to respond, should the threat resurface.

I shall deal with the central issue raised by the hon. Member for New Forest, East—the policy on the destruction of Security Service files. The Security Service has no wish to retain piles of records that no longer serve any useful purpose. On the contrary, it is the service's policy to keep only those records that it needs to keep, either to carry out its functions or to comply with its statutory obligations. Those include the obligation, which I accept fully, to retain records that are likely to be of historical interest.

As the hon. Member for New Forest, East mentioned, I set out in detail the criteria for keeping records that are regarded as of historical interest in a written answer that I gave him on 20 January 1998. Each file is examined individually and then considered on its merits as a whole as a file, but no collective decision is taken about categories of files.

The examination includes asking whether the file relates to a major investigation; whether questions were raised concerning important subversive figures, terrorists and spies; whether the file concerns individuals involved in important historical events or causes celebres in a security context; whether the file contains original papers of historical interest; whether the file documents major changes of Security Service policy, organisation and procedures; and whether the file is in some way a period piece, illustrating clearly Security Service attitudes or techniques of the time, and milestones in the service's history.

In 1992, following the end of the cold war, the service launched a review of its file holdings, and started to destroy documents that were no longer relevant to its requirements and did not need to be retained for statutory or historical reasons. As individual judgments are made about each file, the process is resource-intensive and has had to compete with the service's other pressing priorities, such as its work against terrorism. More recently, the work has been accelerated, and I hope to be able to inform Parliament before the summer recess of the progress that has been made.

It has to be for the professional judgment of the service itself to decide which files it can safely destroy and which must be retained for operational, statutory or historical reasons. I make it absolutely clear that the service does not, and will not, take decisions about which files to retain or destroy on the basis of representations from outside the service. It would be wrong to do so in respect of private individuals; it would be even more wrong to do so at the behest of hon. Members or, in particular, of Ministers.

Parliament deliberately inserted into the Security Service Act 1989 the safeguard that the service must take no action to further the interests of any political party. Therefore, I make it clear to the hon. Member for New Forest, East that there can be no question of the service retaining or destroying any of its records with a view to securing a party political advantage for any party or any individual, including the Government of the day.

I pay tribute to the men and women of the Security Service, who spend their lives working to protect the citizens of this country from the type of threat that emerged, for example, last year, during the trials of two ruthless terrorist gangs. That work by Security Service staff, whom I have been privileged, in my time as Home Secretary, to meet and get to know, goes on, by and large, out of the public eye. Every one of us has reason to be grateful for what they do on our behalf.

I shall continue to seek opportunities to shed a little more light on the work of the service, but I shall also continue to draw a clear distinction between information that may be disclosed and that which must be withheld in the interests of the effectiveness of the service. We would be failing in our duty to the public if we forced the service to operate—ineffectively—in the full glare of publicity.

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Bosnia-Herzegovina

1. Dr. Naysmith: What assistance her Department is providing to Bosnia–Herzegovina; and what plans she has to visit that country. [29610]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): My Department has provided more than £400 million of humanitarian and reconstruction assistance to Bosnia-Herzegovina since 1992. I visited Bosnia from 1 to 4 February to review progress.

Our priority now is to strengthen Mr. Dodik's new Government in Republika Srpska, given his public support for the Dayton agreement, and to support and encourage refugee return. I am pleased to announce today additional funding of £1 million immediately in budgetary support for the new Government in Republika Srpska and £1.1 million for refugee return and reconciliation work with the stabilisation force and other partners.

Dr. Naysmith: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does she agree that the election of the new Government is really good news, particularly with regard to the possible return of refugees and the effect that that may have on implementing the Dayton agreement?

Clare Short: I agree completely with my hon. Friend: this is a massive opportunity to make significant progress in Bosnia. The new Government in Republika Srpska support the Dayton agreement and want to encourage refugee return. If the international community can reinforce that agreement, if people in Republika Srpska can feel the benefits that will flow from the involvement of the World bank, the European Union and Britain, and if the Government do well in the September elections, there is a chance of real progress in returning refugees. We must seize that opportunity.

Mr. Faber: I welcome the right hon. Lady's announcement that further funds will be made available for Bosnia. Bosnia is one of many east European and central Asian countries that currently receive funding from the European Union under the PHARE and TACIS democracy programmes. Can the right hon. Lady confirm that the Commission is currently conducting an internal review of those programmes, the focus of which is to remove funding from the majority of countries that need it most, such as Bosnia, and to reallocate it almost exclusively to the first wave of applicant countries for EU membership—supposedly to assist their accession to the European Union? Is that not a blatant attempt at empire building by the Commission at the expense of the more deserving developing democracies, such as Bosnia? Will the right hon. Lady do everything she can to fight any such misuse of aid during Britain's presidency of the EU?

Clare Short: I agree that the European Union has had difficulty disbursing its funds in the past. The process has been terribly slow and the programmes have not been as effective as they should. There is now a differentiation between the programmes that will help the accession countries and those that will assist the remaining transition countries. I think that that distinction is sensible because the tasks are different. The task of helping the more advanced countries to adjust to the rules of the European Union is different from helping the less advanced countries, which face terrible problems with poverty and high crime levels and are still only half way to building market economies and democracies. We must differentiate our efforts, but we need to ensure that both European programmes operate more effectively and do not ignore either need.

Development Assistance

2. Mr. Baldry: If she will make a statement on the role of non-governmental organisations in the delivery of development assistance. [29611]

Clare Short: We have strong links with British NGOs which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, are involved in a wide range of tasks supporting development. We also have strong links with community groups and other NGOs in developing countries. We intend to launch a formal consultation on how those relationships can be updated to complement the strategy outlined in the Government's White Paper.

Mr. Baldry: Everyone will welcome NGOs' being more involved in the development of Government policy. Does the right hon. Lady agree that when one considers Britain's contribution to development overseas, it is not just a matter of how much we give by way of gross domestic product; into that account should be put the enormous work and effort of the UK NGOs, which make a considerable contribution to promoting development overseas? For example, the British Red Cross, which yesterday received a new charter direct from the Queen, has done work in northern Turkey with the Kurds and in Angola. Every day, thousands of UK volunteers are working in various parts of the world. Their contribution should never be forgotten when we are considering the contribution that Britain as a whole makes to trying to ensure a fairer world.

Clare Short: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It matters what we put in as a Government—how effectively we disburse our assistance—but the massive contribution of NGOs shows where the heart and the concerns of the British people lie. There is a long track record of engagement with and concern for people overseas, of support for development and in humanitarian disaster relief. We can be proud of the contribution of our NGOs and we should give them all honour and praise for the work that they have done over the years.

Mr. Dalyell: The House will recollect that at the end of his statement on Iraq yesterday, the Prime Minister referred to the role of NGOs. How does my right hon. Friend see NGOs bringing much-needed help to the people of Iraq, as opposed to the regime?

Clare Short: I have been talking with officials in my Department about how we can make a stronger contribution to bringing relief to the people of Iraq. The whole world is concerned at their suffering. We know that much of it is the responsibility of Saddam Hussein, but none the less we all feel for their suffering. My Department tells me that the number of NGOs working in Baghdad-ruled Iraq is limited; our capacity to disburse more funds is therefore limited, as there are relatively few people there. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that we will do everything we can to increase our bilateral assistance to all parts of Iraq and to ensure that, when the oil-for-food swap is increased, we shall do all we can to ensure that relief in the form of food and drugs gets through to the people.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: Further to the point raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and the Prime Minister's statement, can the right hon. Lady say which NGOs are involved with British citizens and what advice has been given to them in respect of their personal safety in Iraq?

Clare Short: I am sorry; I shall have to write to the right hon. Gentleman. That is foolish, because I was discussing with my officials that very matter and what more we can do, but I cannot authoritatively recall the names of the organisations. I do not believe that there are currently any worries about security, especially after Kofi Annan's great success in getting the Saddam Hussein regime to back down on inspections. I shall look into the question that the right hon. Gentleman raises and write to him.

Development Programmes

3. Mr. MacShane: What recent contacts she has had with the Trades Union Congress about the role of trade unions in development programmes. [29612]

Clare Short: One of my priorities is to secure respect for the International Labour Organisation's core labour standards throughout the world. That is key to ensuring that the fruits of globalisation are fairly distributed, otherwise capital moves around the world chasing cheaper and cheaper labour. My Department is in frequent contact with the TUC to help to achieve that. We are working together on plans for a conference on trade unions, development and human rights, which I hope will generate widespread interest among union members.

Mr. MacShane: I am grateful for that answer. My right hon. Friend has answered my supplementary, so with your permission, Madam Speaker, I shall sit down.

Madam Speaker: Very sensible, too.

Mr. Garnier: Sadly, the right hon. Lady's reply did not answer my question. Can she be more precise? We listened with interest to her answer, but can she give us a little more detail and set out with greater clarity what she meant?

Clare Short: I am always happy to speak at greater length. The hon. and learned Gentleman will know that more and more major British companies are interested in working with my Department, with NGOs and with the trade union movement to get agreement on codes of conduct for sourcing produce overseas in order to satisfy the pressures from the ethical consumer movements that are growing and strengthening across society. One of the agreements involving people of good will, including employers, trade unionists and NGOs, is that respect for core labour standards—basically, the right of labour to organise, to protect health and safety and not to accept environmental degradation—is one of the fundamental principles of ethical sourcing. We agree with that. We support the work of the International Labour Organisation and we are working with various companies that agree with the principle. I agree with those who hope that there will be a human rights clause in the World Trade Organisation, which would mean basic rights for people worldwide and that capital will not be driven into seeking ever cheaper labour, with all the instability and the race to the bottom on environmental standards that that can entail.

Land Mines

4. Mr. David Marshall: What assistance her Department is providing to reduce the number of active land mines throughout the world; and if she will make a statement. [29613]

10. Mr. Jim Murphy: If she will make a statement on progress on land mine clearance programmes. [29619]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): We were all delighted when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development signed the Ottawa convention on behalf of the United Kingdom Government. We are doubling our expenditure on de-mining and we are working for greater international co-operation and building up more local capability in order to speed up de-mining worldwide.

Mr. Marshall: My hon. Friend is well aware that the Inter-Parliamentary Union was the first international forum to debate anti-personnel land mines and that it continues to give this issue high priority. What specific plans do the Government have to speed up the clearance of land mines and to help the tragic victims of these horrific weapons?

Mr. Foulkes: I was glad to be present as a delegate when the IPU discussed these matters. I heard my hon. Friend's eloquent speech. I can assure him that we are giving substantial support through the Red Cross, the World Health Organisation and NGOs for victim support, as well as through our bilateral country programmes.

As for speeding up the clearance of land mines, as president of the European Council we are working for much greater co-ordination of our activities. We are having discussions with the Americans and the Japanese. We are also playing a leading role in developing new techniques for mine clearance.

Mr. Murphy: Is my hon. Friend able to confirm that the policy that the Government inherited would have left the world with land mines planted in it for more than 1,000 years? That is what would have happened if the clearance operation had not been speeded up.

Mozambique recently recovered from civil war but found itself much diminished in resources for education and health. What structures and plans do we have to ensure that the dangerous litter of land mines in Mozambique is cleared?

Mr. Foulkes: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There are land mines in Afghanistan, Angola, Bosnia, Cambodia—Egypt has mines from the second world war—the Falkland Islands, northern Iraq, Laos, Libya and, as my hon. Friend mentioned, Mozambique. There is a huge task to be undertaken. We need to do more, and we will do more in co-operation with other countries to try to remove this scourge, which affects women and children particularly, as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fabricant: I hope that the Minister will pay tribute to the previous Government, who helped to set up the Ottawa convention. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are possibly more than 100,000 unexploded land mines in Cambodia and other parts of south-east Asia? Will he tell the House what measures the British Government are taking in that region?

Mr. Foulkes: I can assure the House that we are active in Cambodia. We are supporting the mines advisory group and other groups working in Cambodia.

The initiative for the Ottawa convention came from the Canadians—from their Foreign Minister, Lloyd Axworthy. My right hon. Friend and her Cabinet colleagues, with others, rightly took up the initiative. I was pleased that it was my right hon. Friend, on behalf of the Government, who signed the convention.

Mr. Home Robertson: As my hon. Friend knows, I have done a bit of NGO work in Bosnia. The presence of mines is a genuine worry, especially for people with young families. What progress is being made on de-mining in Bosnia? What co-operation are our authorities receiving from the former warring factions on information about the whereabouts of mines?

Mr. Foulkes: I pay tribute to the work that my hon. Friend has done. I think that he has driven twice to Bosnia with humanitarian assistance, showing graphically how individuals are contributing to the effort there. I can assure him that we are working with the Japanese Government and our own Ministry of Defence. We are doing everything possible by mapping the position of mines and then de-mining as quickly as possible. I am grateful for his comments.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

5. Ms Drown: What measures she is taking to ensure that the needs and views of poorer developing countries are taken into account during the drafting of the multilateral agreement on investment. [29614]

Clare Short: My Department is working closely with the Department of Trade and Industry, which leads on the multilateral agreement on investment. We are determined to ensure that the agreement does not damage the interests of the poorest countries and are pressing hard for strong and binding provision prohibiting any lowering of environmental or labour standards in order to attract investment.

Ms Drown: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and congratulate the Government on the work that they are doing to ensure that environmental and labour standards are protected. Does she agree that a key element of development programmes is that a Government should be able to control and filter inward investment and that a developing country should be able to protect its domestic industries just as Britain should be able to protect hers?

Clare Short: With respect, I do not agree with my hon. Friend. Most developing countries, especially the least developed countries, need to attract more inward investment. It is not a question of protecting their own investment, which is limited; they desperately want to attract responsible, beneficial inward investment. The multilateral agreement on investment is meant to cover Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries. It is not meant to apply to developing countries. We are concerned to get accession terms that protect their interests should they seek to join and to get a model that will influence the World Trade Organisation's proposed agreement on investment—a model that will cover all countries. The least developed countries desperately need more, not less, inward investment if they are to develop and achieve sustained economic growth.

Mr. David Heath: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for her comments. Does she agree that we are in the latter stages of the negotiations and many people are still not convinced that there will be no adverse effect on developing countries and environmental standards, and that there are binding responsibilities on multinationals, as opposed simply to rights? Will she give a clear assurance that the Government will not sign the agreement—certainly not in April, which was the original target—until they are assured on all those issues?

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is no chance of that now. The American Administration have made it clear—[Interruption.] May I answer the hon. Gentleman's question? The American Administration have made it clear that there will not be a signature by April, so OECD Ministers have to decide whether to extend the time. The British Government have made it absolutely clear that we will not support the agreement unless there are binding provisions on labour and environmental standards. That is our position, and it is the position of many countries. Some of the campaigns about the agreement are misinformed. A regulated system that makes inward investment more secure and draws it in is in the interests of developing countries. There are possible benefits for the whole world in preventing country after country from competing with one other to attract inward investment by lowering environmental and labour standards. Those are now the top issues for the agreement and it will go through only if it secures what is beneficial.

Mr. Dafis: Is not the danger, though, that developing countries will be prepared to take that investment because they desperately need it, even though the conditions that the MAI negotiated between the OECD countries are not appropriate for them? Is not the whole process in difficulty because of the large number of exemptions that are being negotiated by some countries to protect their local economies? Is not it best to have a proper postponement—about a year—which is what the NGOs, through the World Development Movement, are asking for, so that we can have an acceptable process of developing agreements on investments and trade?

Madam Speaker: I said only a few days ago that hon. Members should ask only one question. There were about three there and a lot of comment.

Clare Short: The World Development Movement's campaign on the agreement is misinformed. It is essential to obtain binding agreements on labour standards and the environment and accession agreements that can protect the proper development interests of developing countries. The British Government are committed to those things and, if we obtain them, they will be wholly beneficial. The suggestion that it is Armageddon now is just wrong.

Mr. Alan Simpson: Is Britain pressing for the inclusion of a clause in the MAI which guarantees the right of developing nations still to impose domestic reinvestment obligations on multinational companies developing in their areas?

Clare Short: As I have already said, the agreement is meant to apply to OECD countries; it is not designed for developing countries. The principle in it is that inward investment should not be treated any worse than domestic investment, and that investment that has come in should not be taken over without proper compensation, for example. We are adding the labour and environmental clauses. I assure my hon. Friend that we are determined to protect environmental interests, labour conditions and the interests of developing countries, and I am confident that without that there will be no agreement.

Education Programmes

6. Mr. St. Aubyn: If she will make a statement on the role of non-governmental organisations in delivering education programmes. [29615]

Mr. Foulkes: The delivery of universal basic education, which is one of our major priorities, is primarily the responsibility of Governments. However, we welcome the involvement of NGOs in the education sector. They have an important role to play in empowering local people to demand quality provision. They are also particularly effective in the education of excluded children, such as child workers, and in adult literacy programmes.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Is the Minister aware that the Project Trust, a successful NGO which, during 30 years, has sent 4,000 school leavers on projects teaching overseas, recently expressed concern that the work of such bodies might be hampered by the increasing cost of a university education for students who might not be able to afford to offer this volunteer work during their gap year?

Mr. Foulkes: We do not fund the Project Trust, but we recognise that it is a worthwhile, character-building organisation. I understand that the hon. Gentleman went on one of its volunteer programmes, so he eloquently demonstrates what a success it is.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): Oh no he does not.

Mr. Foulkes: I must agree with my hon. Friend since it is his birthday today, on which I congratulate him.

We support voluntary service organisations such as International Voluntary Service and the Voluntary Service Overseas that send volunteers overseas. I was disappointed to see in The Observer on Sunday that there seems to be a downturn in the number of people volunteering to go overseas. We are now considering what can be done to encourage more people to volunteer to help in developing countries.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend might recall that Labour's policy document on overseas development, "A World of Difference", argued that development studies should be introduced, by one means or another, to the national curriculum. What developments in secondary education has my hon. Friend to report?

Mr. Foulkes: The development awareness working group has been set up. Everyone who was invited by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to serve on it has agreed to do so. The first meeting will be on 31 March. I look forward to chairing it and hearing all the recommendations, which I hope will take forward what was included in that report and in our manifesto.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that many NGOs that work with street children are particularly involved in their education. Will his Department make it easier for British-based NGOs to bid for project funding from his Department to increase the effectiveness of that excellent work?

Mr. Foulkes: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's particular interest in this area and assure him that NGOs, particularly those working and based in developing countries, can apply through our country programmes for assistance. We will give them sympathetic consideration. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: The House will come to order. It is too noisy and we can hardly hear each other.

Sudan

7. Mr. Hanson: What discussions she is undertaking with aid agencies regarding refugees in Sudan. [29616]

Clare Short: We are in frequent contact with UN agencies and our partners from non-governmental organisations working with internally displaced Sudanese and refugees in Sudan. Since April 1994, we have provided about £4.8 million bilaterally to support their work. We were the fourth largest donor of bilateral emergency assistance in 1997.

Mr. Hanson: Will my right hon. Friend pay tribute to the many people in my constituency and elsewhere who are now busily raising money for the aid agencies to spend in Sudan to help alleviate the distress of those refugees? Will she ensure that, as well as providing such excellent aid—she mentioned £4.8 million—she works with the Foreign Office to ensure a political solution by bringing the warring parties back to the table so that refugees can find their way back to their own homes?

Clare Short: I pay tribute to the generous people who collect money for and care about the suffering of the Sudanese people. I agree with my hon. Friend: the real answer for the people of Sudan is a political settlement and an end to the civil war that has resulted in so many refugees and internally displaced people. The destruction of the Sudanese economy is a tragedy for Sudan and that part of Africa. We must do all in our power to support a political settlement.

Caribbean

8. Mr. McAllion: What steps she is taking to promote development in the Caribbean. [29617]

Mr. Foulkes: Caribbean countries have been making great strides in recent years. Our White Paper distinguishes between the needs of the poorest countries, which require resource transfers to develop basic services, and middle-income countries—such as those in the Caribbean—which need access to technical assistance and know-how. We have had two consultations on this matter with Caribbean high commissioners and I had a useful and positive discussion with Caribbean Governments at the recent UK-Caribbean forum in Nassau in the Bahamas.

Mr. McAllion: Cuba is the most important island in the Caribbean—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. We can hardly hear the hon. Gentleman who is on his feet. I have already asked the House to come to order and it must now do so.

Mr. McAllion: I was saying that Cuba is the most important island in the Caribbean and I know of my hon. Friend's great interest in Cuba. Does he agree that the best way that Britain can help the embattled people of Cuba in their struggle against the illegal aggression of the United States of America is through constructive engagement by forming closer political ties and building better trading links with Cuba? To that end, will he undertake to become the first Minister to visit Cuba since the Labour Government were returned to power in 1997?

Mr. Foulkes: I would certainly like that opportunity at some time. We already support Cuba through the Department's small projects scheme and through our contribution to the European Community's humanitarian programme. We have been encouraging the Commonwealth Development Corporation to develop an investment programme in Cuba. I have met the Cuban ambassador and visiting Ministers from Cuba and discussed with colleagues in other Departments how we can further our co-operation with Cuba.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Does the Minister agree that, while new forms of development are urgently needed in many of the English-speaking islands in the Caribbean, any benefits that that development will bring will be overshadowed if the European Union, responding to pressure from Germany, is permitted to destroy the export of their agricultural products, particularly bananas and sugar?

Mr. Foulkes: I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would raise the issue of bananas and I was not disappointed. I assure him that we are doing everything we can to protect the interests of the Caribbean banana producers. I pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who went to St. Lucia to see for himself the banana producers' problems. When he then went to the Agriculture Council he was able to speak with first-hand knowledge. Like other Ministers, he has been fighting hard to protect banana producers' interests.

Endangered Species

9. Mr. Baker: What steps she is taking to ensure endangered species are not adversely affected by her Department's policies. [29618]

Clare Short: The White Paper emphasises the central place of the environment in our efforts to eliminate poverty and promote sustainable development. We are clear that the best way forward is to assist poor people to find sustainable livelihoods so that they can improve their lives and sustain natural resources. Every bilateral Department for International Development programme is subject to an environmental screening to ensure that it does not adversely affect endangered species, or the environment as a whole.

Mr. Baker: I agree with the Secretary of State, but may I draw to her attention the fact that there were 80,000 tigers in the world in 1900? Now there are fewer than 5,000, 3,000 of which are in India. Her Department could play a major role in ensuring the tiger's survival. Will she ensure that the global tiger forum is formally convened, and will she also investigate the detrimental impact of the joint forestry management programme with the Karnataka forest department in the western Ghats?

Clare Short: We all want to make sure that the tiger survives, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that my Department exists to work towards eliminating poverty, not just to protect endangered species. Our view is that, if the poor can live in a way that is good for them and sustains their natural environment, that is the way to look after the planet and its people.

The hon. Gentleman referred to forestry. We are working in many areas to give poor people who live near forests some sort of ownership of the future of those forests. That, and technical support, will allow them to sustain their own forests: we will protect the planet and the animals that live in the forest.

Montserrat

11. Mrs. May: When she plans to visit Montserrat to discuss aid to that country. [29620]

Clare Short: I have no plans to visit Montserrat. The hon. Lady may know that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has lead responsibility for the dependent territories and for co-ordinating the work of all Departments that assist Montserrat and the evacuees. I am therefore very pleased that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was able to visit Montserrat recently.

Mrs. May: Does the Secretary of State accept that her decision not to visit Montserrat could be seen by the islanders as a snub? Does she further accept that the Government have lessons to learn from their handling of the issue of Montserrat, not least whether the Department or the Foreign Office is leading? Will she commission a full, frank and impartial report on the lessons that the Government have to learn from their handling of the problems in Montserrat?

Clare Short: No, I do not accept that for a minute. In fact, a junior Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister and my own junior Minister have visited Montserrat three times between them. The Foreign Secretary has also visited Montserrat, whereas the Foreign Secretary in the previous Government did not. There are 2,800 people left living in Montserrat. My Department has spent £55 million on this complex emergency. We have responsibilities to poor and needy people all over the world. We have done much to improve the efficiency of the administration of Montserrat: we inherited from the previous Administration an inefficient system with many layers of decision making, but we have put much of that right.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1.[29640] Mr. Evans: If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 25 February.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. Later today, I shall have further such meetings.

Mr. Evans: Before Sunday's march of 250,000 people through London, will the Prime Minister come to Longridge in the Ribble Valley tomorrow night? I shall be lighting a beacon, one of thousands which will unite the whole United Kingdom and send a clear message on behalf of those who live in and love the countryside. They are fed up and have had enough of the Government's relentless attacks on them. They see their way of life being ruined and, with farming in crisis, the countryside is at risk. Will the Prime Minister tell country people how long and how loudly they need to shout before he will listen to them and give them the help that they need?

The Prime Minister: There is no campaign of greater hypocrisy than the countryside campaign launched by the Conservative party. When the hon. Gentleman lights his beacon tomorrow night, perhaps he will tell people that there are 30,000 more hectares of green belt under this Government. The farming industry is receiving £85 million more of help than under the last Conservative Government. The problems of farmers are immense, but their main problem is the BSE crisis created by the Conservative Government.

Mrs. Butler: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a House of Lords with more than 750 hereditary peers is indefensible in a modern democracy? Does he look forward to the support of all the other parties for the short sharp Bill to end those peers' voting rights?

The Prime Minister: I certainly look forward to the support of the Leader of the Opposition and the Conservative party for reform of the House of Lords. It is not entirely clear what is happening on the other side of the House, but Labour Members consider it quite wrong that hereditary peers should end up deciding the laws of the land.

Mr. Hague: When the Prime Minister cut lone parent benefit in December—we supported him—did he do so to save money, or because he believed in the principle that the benefits system should not discriminate against married couples?

The Prime Minister: We did not believe that the system should discriminate against married couples, but we believed that putting in extra money to help lone parents to get off benefit and into work—some £300 million more than the Conservatives put in—was the right way in which to spend the public's money.

Mr. Hague: After fighting so hard to bring about that cut in December, why did the Government let it be known this morning that they intend to more than compensate lone parents with hundreds of millions of pounds of extra benefit? Why is the Prime Minister now backsliding on his vow—the vow on which he has staked so much—to reduce welfare spending and tackle welfare dependency?

The Prime Minister: The short answer is that we are not backsliding, and that those stories are wrong.

Mr. Hague: It is no good the Prime Minister telling us not to believe what we read in the press, because we have come to learn that we are far more likely to read Government announcements in the press than to hear them on the Floor of the House of Commons. It is just like last week: we all know a U-turn when we see one.

Is it not the case that, faced with Back-Bench rebels and a grass-roots revolt at Labour party roadshows where people have thrown eggs at the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman's Government have begun to lose their nerve? When the Green Paper is finally published next month, will it at least contain clear targets for the reduction in welfare spending that he has long promised?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman formulated that question before he heard my answer, in which I said that the story was wrong. There is no U-turn; there will be no change in the regulations governing lone parent benefit. As for talking about U-turns, I think that, after his constitutional speech yesterday, the right hon. Gentleman is rather unwise to do so.

Mr. Hague: My speech laid out a clear set of principles—a concept unknown to the Prime Minister.

Let him answer my actual question: will the Green Paper, when it is published, contain clear targets for the reduction in welfare spending that he has long promised?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman will have to wait for the Green Paper on welfare, but the Government are already carrying out substantial welfare reform—not least in the welfare-to-work programme, a £3.5 billion programme to get our young people off benefit and into work. That programme has been opposed by the right hon. Gentleman and the Conservative party, although it has been welcomed by business and young people throughout Britain.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister says that we will have to wait for the Green Paper. We have been waiting a very long time for the Green Paper, which the right hon. Gentleman said would be published around the turn of the year. We do not know around the turn of which year he meant.

The Prime Minister has promised the country that he will reduce welfare spending. Today, on the lunchtime news that he always watches, his Back-Bench rebels have welcomed the news of his U-turn. The right hon. Gentleman knows that he can have the Opposition's support on this issue; so, on this issue, why does he not stop trying to govern the Labour party, and start governing the country?

The Prime Minister: That would have been a great finale if it had not been for my original answer, which was that there had been no U-turn. I am very sorry, but the only party that is serious about welfare reform is this party. The Conservative party had 18 years in which to reform welfare; instead, it left us with a situation in which poverty is up, more children are living in poverty, more pensioners are living in poverty and there are more workless households—yet spending is up. That is a record of failure that we will turn into success.

Ms Jenny Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware that two thirds of pensioners on income support are women who therefore live out their old age in poverty? As the previous Government did nothing to tackle that problem, can my right hon. Friend assure me that the Government's pension review will give a high priority to the needs of women?

The Prime Minister: We are particularly looking at how we help low-income families and pensioners on low incomes. My hon. Friend will know that, by cutting VAT on fuel, as we promised we would do, and did, and by the additional help this year and next with pensioners' heating bills—£50 for pensioner households on income support and £20 for pensioner households that are not—we are already making sure that we put the priorities of low-income pensioners first.

Mr. Beith: Although it is understandable that the Prime Minister will give a sharp response to the party that has been in charge of the countryside for the past 18 years, during which the problems have built up, does he recognise that the anxieties are serious and deep? Half the villages now have no schools; three quarters of them have no daily bus service; and services such as the health service and those for the elderly are threatened by cuts which started under the previous Government but which he has continued against the background of a crisis in the countryside's basic industry.

The Prime Minister: Let me first say where I agree very much with the right hon. Gentleman. In relation to the countryside, issues such as health, schools, crime and transport are every bit as important to people in the countryside as many of the things that the Conservative party continually raises. Since coming to power, we have put substantial additional resources via the new deal, the release of capital receipts and extra money for schools into rural areas. It will take time to turn around the mess that we inherited from the Conservative Government. In particular, we need to make sure that we hold firm to tight public spending to get rid of the big structural budget deficit which we inherited on 1 May.

Mr. Beith: Why does it always seem to be the rural areas to which the message is delivered that the cuts must be impacted on them? When it comes to the signal that the Government give to people in rural areas, how is it that the powers of the Rural Development Commission were given to the regional development agencies and the Government set up a social exclusion unit and said that it would deal only with urban problems? Many country people now feel very excluded.

The Prime Minister: That is simply wrong. We do not say that rural areas should be discriminated against. Indeed, that is why I say that the additional money on national health, in relation to schools and in respect of the new deal is going to rural areas as well as inner-city areas. It is essential for us to make sure that we do not lose the tight grip on public finances that is at the heart of removing the threat of boom and bust that we had so many times under the Conservatives, and to make sure that we have prudent, stable economic management for the long term. When we get the public finances sorted out, we can give to rural areas and others the help that they desperately need.

Mr. David Taylor: Is the Prime Minister aware that a warm welcome will be given to today's consultation paper on wider access to the open countryside, especially in areas such as North-West Leicestershire, where so much is closed to us? In view of our disappointing experience over the decades in establishing voluntary agreements, would he care to comment on the need to establish a statutory right of access?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear that, if voluntary means fail, we are prepared to legislate. It is also right that, if we can, by voluntary means, establish greater access to the countryside, we can obviously have that access far more quickly and far more easily. There is no intention whatever—this again has been subject to some misconstruction—to have people roaming through land that is cultivated or developed. The vast bulk of affected land is open countryside such as moorland to which people would like greater access. If it can be done by voluntary access, so much the better: if it cannot, we stand ready to legislate.

Q2.[29641] Mr. Wilkinson: Has the Prime Minister had time to read today's letters in The Times, particularly one five-paragraph letter from a justice of the peace, Mr. Wilding, who complains about financial constraints and reductions in qualified staff and courthouses, and another, a rather more dignified and discursive 16-paragraph letter from a learned and noble art connoisseur—the Lord Chancellor—about his state apartments? Which letter does the Prime Minister think that the British public believe better addresses the problems confronting the British legal system?

The Prime Minister: That was not a very wise intervention. The House of Lords Committee that approved the matter that the hon. Gentleman mentions included Conservative peers, who fully supported it.

Q3.[29642] Mr. MacShane: Has my right hon. Friend seen the remarkable survey by Income Data Services of many small and big business firms which shows that they are adjusting their wages to ensure that they will not be paying below a national minimum wage? Does he agree that the survey shows, first, that the business community is joining the Government in their drive to eliminate the low pay rates inherited from the previous Government, and, secondly, how out of touch the Conservative party is as it continues to defend poverty pay for the poorest of the land—which no business man is willing to support?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right: the survey is very interesting, and shows that companies are already trying to deal with the low pay of specific parts of their work force. The evidence is that companies are doing so without any ratcheting up of differentials—which was always the criticism made of a minimum wage. I believe that there is no future for Britain as a sweatshop economy, and that a minimum wage is part of any decent, civilised society. I note that the Conservative party has still not told us whether it would reverse the minimum wage legislation that we have introduced. Perhaps, at some point, Conservative Members will tell us.

Q4.[29643] Mr. Bercow: The Prime Minister will recall saying:

"I never try to tell people what to do for their own children."

Does he therefore agree that, if parents vote to keep the Royal Latin grammar school, in Buckingham, their children should be able to receive a grammar school education without further disruption or uncertainty for the duration of their careers at that school?

The Prime Minister: I do not know about the particular circumstances of the hon. Gentleman's school, although I should be perfectly happy to write to him about it. The rules that will apply to that school are the rules that will apply to any school. The rules have been clearly stated in the Government's proposals.

Q5.[29644] Mr. Pike: My right hon. Friend will know that many people are worrying about the benefits review. Will he take this opportunity to assure them that they are worrying unnecessarily, and that the Government's main objective in the benefits review is to tackle the failures of the current system and to ensure that we have a better and fairer system?

The Prime Minister: Yes, that is absolutely right. As I made it clear to disabled groups when I met them, we want to ensure that those who are disabled are given the help that they obviously need. The reason for reform is perfectly simple: as I said a moment ago, spending is up, but poverty is also up. There is a consensus in the country that the welfare system is not working. We have now to proceed to the principles of reform, which will be stated in the Green Paper which will be published shortly. We shall then move to the detailed proposals, each of which will be subject to proper discussion and debate. I think that that is the way to proceed with reform.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Prime Minister aware of the problems facing Back Benchers, probably mostly Labour, in coping with representations from groups of people—such as the university students who are outside the House today, the disabled and trade unions representing national savings—who claim categorically that they were shamefully misled during the general election and have since been sold down the river? Although we fully appreciate that there can sometimes be misunderstandings and that people sometimes do not read the small print, would it not strengthen our democracy if an independent body were established—perhaps by extending the powers of the ombudsman—to look into allegations of electoral fraud? Does the Prime Minister not appreciate that—irrespective of who is the Government—if we do not something about it, our democracy will be undermined?

The Prime Minister: First, on student finance, since we said specifically, as, indeed, did the Conservatives, that we would abide by the outcome of the Dearing committee report, I think that it is the richest possible hypocrisy for the Conservative party, having supported those proposals, now to denounce them.

As for electoral fraud, a judgment will be made at the general election. A judgment was made at the last election on the party that the hon. Gentleman supported, and that judgment was pretty resounding.

Q6.[29645] Mr. Mullin: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that all opinion polls show that the overwhelming majority of country dwellers are opposed to hunting with hounds? Has he also noticed that there is a considerable overlap between the so-called countryside alliance and the bloodsports wing of the Conservative party? Is he aware that many of those who will be attending next Sunday's demonstration will be there not by free will but because they are employed by landowners and fear for their tied cottages and tenancies? Will he bear those points in mind when considering what weight to give to representations made to him by this so-called countryside alliance?

The Prime Minister: Unlike the Conservative party, I certainly believe that love of fox hunting is not the same as love of the countryside.

Q7.[29646] Mr. Brady: Does the Prime Minister recall the pre-election pledge that he gave to my constituents that the future of their grammar schools would be decided by local parents? Will he take this opportunity to explain to my constituents why he is breaking that promise by allowing people living outside Altrincham and Sale to vote on the future of our schools?

The Prime Minister: Again, I am not aware of the situation to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but we have not broken any such promise in relation to that situation or any other.

Q8.[29647] Ms Keeble: Is the Prime Minister aware that most working families in my constituency live on just below average earnings? Is he also aware that the East Midlands legal services committee recently estimated that some 9,000 people in Northampton have serious debt problems? Will he set out the Government's strategy for providing support for working families so that people in my constituency can look forward to a financial future that is more secure than the time they had under the Tories?

The Prime Minister: We want to ensure that we provide greater help and support for working families. Of course, that is one of the issues that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will address in the Budget. In addition, one of the greatest causes of family poverty throughout the country is the absence of work in households where there should be work. That is precisely why the welfare-to-work programme is so important. It will for the first time give hundreds of thousands of people the chance to get decent skills, a decent education or a job with a private sector employer and allow them to bring a wage into a household that is at present dependent on benefits. I am sure that that is the single best way in which we can tackle poverty in this country.

Q9.[29648] Mr. Hayes: Is the Prime Minister currently, or has he ever been, personally associated with an offshore trust?

The Prime Minister: No.

Q10.[29649] Kate Hoey: Does the Prime Minister realise that, among the hundreds of thousands of people at the countryside march on Sunday, there will be many thousands from urban and inner-city areas who care passionately about the countryside? Does he agree that the Deputy Prime Minister's statement this week was greatly welcomed across the country by people who want to see the end of the divide between country and town? Does he share my view that, in view of the hugely divisive nature of hunting, perhaps now is the time to set up some form of independent inquiry—a kind of royal commission—to examine the issues dispassionately and without emotion, while recognising that there are hugely different views on either side of the argument and that people feel very strongly about it?

The Prime Minister: We do not have plans to establish such an inquiry, although of course the debate will go on and people will make their points and raise the issues that are relevant to it. In relation to the countryside and the points that my hon. Friend raises, it is important to point out that the Deputy Prime Minister's announcement means that the amount of brown-field building and green-belt land will increase. In relation to the real problems that are felt in the countryside, by farmers in particular, again, additional support is being given.

I hope that my hon. Friend would agree that it is unfortunate not only if townspeople are ever ignorant of what is happening in the countryside, but if people who live in the countryside—I speak as someone with a countryside constituency—believe that all townspeople are either ignorant of or dislike the countryside. That is not the case, and attempts to divide town and country are wrong and misguided.

Government Policies (Lichfield)

Q11.[29650] Mr. Fabricant: What assessment he has made of the effects of the Government's policies on the people of Lichfield.

The Prime Minister: In relation to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, I would say, for example, that unemployment has fallen since the general election; that the South Staffordshire health authority is receiving a real-terms increase of £4.3 million for next year, with £1.7 million this winter; and, of course, that the poorest pensioners have been helped with their heating bills. All three things will be of enormous benefit to people in his constituency—and I am happy to give him more particulars.

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for that helpful answer; I am sure that the whole House will welcome the unemployment rate of 2.8 per cent. Does he accept that some businesses in my area feel that they are at risk and, more important, that the 2.8 per cent. unemployment rate in Lichfield is at risk? There have been five interest rate rises, and the pound has a high value, which means that businesses are facing great difficulties in exporting. More worryingly, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has reported that the economy—of the whole nation, let alone Lichfield—could go into recession at the end of this year as a consequence. What heart can the right hon. Gentleman give the people of Lichfield, and those from other parts of the country, who voted Labour?

The Prime Minister: I will say exactly what I would tell the hon. Gentleman on the interest rate rises and the management of the economy. As I said earlier, we inherited two significant problems on 1 May in relation to economic management. First, inflation was back in the system, as the Conservative Government had refused to raise interest rates despite being advised to do so. Secondly, there was a large structural budget deficit.

We know what happened when we did not tackle those problems at the end of the 1980s: two years on, we ended up with boom and bust under the Conservatives, 15 per cent. interest rates for a year or more and the largest borrowing requirement that the country has ever known. It is precisely to avoid the dangers of that boom and bust that we have ensured that we have sorted out the public finances and put monetary policy on a sound footing for the long term.

I say to the businesses in Lichfield and elsewhere, and to people in the country, that those measures are tough and difficult, but they are right for the country's long-term future. We shall not shrink from making the long-term decisions necessary to build British economic strength.

Ministerial Visit

Q12.[29651] Sir Robert Smith: When he will next visit the north-east of Scotland.

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that I have no immediate plans to visit the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Sir Robert Smith: I am obviously sorry that the Prime Minister cannot see the delights of the north-east of Scotland, but I hope that he can tell me the Government's view of the importance of the oil industry to the economy of this country and the north-east of Scotland in particular. Will he send a message to the many small and medium businesses that contract to the industry and are building a very important export market that he wants the industry to thrive and grow, and that they should have the confidence to invest and expand?

The Prime Minister: I certainly want the industry to thrive and grow. The hon. Gentleman will remember that the last Labour Government started the oil industry and put it on its feet. Of course we want both the jobs and the benefits which investment in that industry brings.

Engagements

Q13.[29652] Mr. Syms: Will the Prime Minister now rule out, perhaps by a leak to The Guardian, cutting or taxing disability living allowance?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear that a review is under way. When the results of that review are published, we will make them available to the House.

Liz Blackman: Can my right hon. Friend confirm the fact that the Government have excellent relations with our European partners, including Germany? Will he join me in roundly condemning the offensive remarks made a few days ago by a Conservative Member?

The Prime Minister: We do have excellent relations with our European partners—[Interruption.] I am sorry that that is a cause for criticism by the Conservative party. I am delighted to see the Leader of the Opposition sitting next to the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I know that the shadow Secretary of State made the criticism that Chancellor Kohl should not be given the freedom of the City of London; perhaps it is time the Leader of the Opposition gave the shadow Secretary of State the freedom of the Conservative Back Benches.

Q14.[29653] Mr. Whittingdale: Has the right hon. Gentleman had time to study the petition delivered to 10 Downing street, signed by 7,914 of my constituents and calling for the maternity unit at St. Peter's hospital in Maldon to be kept open? Is he aware that the closure of maternity units in rural areas such as Maldon, Braintree, Clacton and Harwich flies in the face of the Government's policy set out in "Changing Childbirth"? Will he intervene to stop such closures, which will deny choice to thousands of mothers?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the reason for the present tight financial constraints is that we inherited them from the previous Government. What is more, we are putting in an extra £1.5 billion into the national health service. If the hon. Gentleman is going back and telling his constituents that, under a Conservative Government, things would be different, he is simply not telling them the truth—but then what would be new in that for the Tory party?

Mr. Derek Foster: Will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister join me in congratulating the world-class management and work force of Black and Decker in Spennymoor, which have secured an extra 350 jobs, although the original plan was for total closure of the plant, losing 1,200 jobs? Does he agree that the northern work force has a great deal to gain from lifelong learning strategies, and will he ensure that the Government give as much priority to lifelong learning as to the schools agenda?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted with the news about Black and Decker. I know that my right hon. Friend has worked hard to play his part in helping that investment to come there. Of course, Black and Decker used to be in my constituency.

What my right hon. Friend says about lifelong learning is absolutely correct. As part of the education and skills revolution which we need in this country, we must encourage adults to upgrade their skills and learn new skills throughout their working lives. The imaginative proposals announced today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, plus additional money to help people get the skills that they require, especially in new technology, will play a big part in boosting jobs and ensuring that Britain is on its way to achieving our aim, our vision, which is to have the best educated, best skilled work force in the western world.

Right to Roam (Consultation Document)

3.32 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in what circumstances a copy of a consultation document on the right to roam became available to the Ramblers Association before it was available to Members of Parliament, to whom else the document became available, and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): The House will be aware that we have published today our consultation document, "Access to the Open Countryside in England and Wales". I held meetings with four national organisations yesterday to outline the Government's thinking in broad terms. In view of the complexity and detail of the issues, I allowed each organisation to have a copy of the document to examine overnight. I emphasised that it was for personal use only and that the contents were not to be disclosed to anybody else.

The organisations concerned were the Country Landowners Association, the Moorland Association, the National Farmers Union and the Ramblers Association, all of which have been involved in extensive discussion with my Department on this issue.

I completely understand the hon. Gentleman's concern that non-governmental organisations should have had copies of the document before it was available to the House. I have discussed this matter with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and apologised to him. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will have hon. Members keep quiet when an important statement of this nature is being made to the House. I am sorry, Mr. Meacher.

Mr. Meacher: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister made it clear that he regarded what has happened as unacceptable, and I share that view. He accepted my wish to make a full and unreserved apology to the House, and that I now do.

Mr. Yeo: I welcome the fact that the Minister has made an unreserved apology, and I was interested to hear his explanation of the circumstances. The facts are these: a policy document was in preparation for months; the timing of its release was entirely under his control; and he chose to give it to four outside organisations a full day before it was available to Parliament—presumably in order to try to buy off criticism in advance.

Does the Minister accept that he should have made a statement about the policy here in the House, so that hon. Members, including those who, like myself, are opposed to his policy, could question him on it? Does he agree that this is further proof of how power has gone to the heads of Ministers? From the Prime Minister—who, characteristically, has not waited in the Chamber to hear this exchange—downwards, Ministers refuse to answer questions in the House, they decline to debate issues in the House, and they refuse even to meet hon. Members to discuss issues of concern to our constituents.

Spin doctors and soundbites may be what the Government depend on, but parliamentary debate is what democracy depends on. Parliamentary traditions have been centuries in the making. Men and women have given their lives for them, yet they are now being consigned to the gutter by the Labour Government. Does the Minister understand that his behaviour is an insult not only to the House of Commons, but to every one of the men and women who elected us?

Mr. Meacher rose—

Hon. Members: Resign.

Madam Speaker: Order. We need order in the House for these exchanges.

Mr. Meacher: I have already made it clear that I apologise to the House, and I have to say that, in that rant, the hon. Gentleman has completely overreached himself. The fact is that it is not a policy document; it is a consultation document. In addition, I have already answered a written parliamentary question today.

I should also point out that the previous Government routinely made major policy statements without any recourse to Parliament. One example was the basic pensions-plus document just before the election. It was leaked to the press overnight and published on 5 March at a Government press conference in Downing street, and Ministers refused to make a statement in the Commons. If there is a desire on the part of the House to have a further debate on this document, we shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on doing the honourable thing and coming directly to the House to make his apology? Will he simply confirm that it has long been the practice of Governments to release not only consultation documents, but policy documents on an embargoed basis to interested organisations and the press—including that lot opposite, when they were in government?

Mr. Meacher: I have made my position clear on that. It is certainly the case that the previous Government on many occasions did exactly what my hon. Friend has said. If I am to be condemned, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) and other persons on the Opposition Front Bench should also apologise to the House.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): Given, as the Minister said in his statement, that it was perfectly proper that the request for the private notice question should have been made and then granted by you, Madam Speaker, does he acknowledge that most of us will probably think of the common-sense advice our parents tend to give us when we are growing up—that there are occasions when one should apologise, but there are also occasions when one should, with grace, accept an apology? This afternoon is a good example of that.

Going back to a question by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) during Prime Minister's questions, could not this issue and other countryside concerns be addressed by a royal commission, which would enable all the groups to make their input more openly? It would certainly enable the House to consider and reflect on any legislation which may come forward in due course. It would also give the parliamentary Conservative party the chance to make a more considered response to the document than it managed this afternoon.

Mr. Meacher: I am most grateful for the hon. Gentleman's opening remarks, with which I fully agree. The whole point of a consultation period is that there should be open and genuine consultation of all the relevant parties. I expect the Country Landowners Association, the Moorland Association, the National Farmers Union and the Ramblers Association to discuss the matters fully. They will certainly be listened to with great care before we come to our decision.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Following some of the requests from the Opposition in the past few weeks as they have launched a campaign against members of the Government for making statements outside this House, I decided to do some research in advance of this statement. Is my right hon. Friend aware that I have already counted 41 occasions during the 18 years of Tory government when requests were made for statements, but the Tory Government had made them on the media? That is 41, and still counting.

Mr. Meacher: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said. He is a diligent Member of this House, and is well known for his research. The hon. Member for South Suffolk may, in due course, rather regret raising this point.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): The whole House will have noted with approval the handsome apology made by the Minister. Although what he did was wrong, his coming to the House has been the right thing to do. Does he agree that the House should establish a rule whereby Ministers and Departments are forbidden under convention and by code of practice to put such documents before other people before they put them before the House?

Mr. Meacher: I listened with great interest to the hon. Gentleman, and I am grateful for his earlier comments. His proposal could be considered, but it is a matter for the House as a whole.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The Minister has come to the House with a total and unreserved apology, and the House should accept it. Would you, Madam Speaker, protect the integrity of this House and give guidance to Government—of whichever party—about this practice, and express your view that it should be deplored?

Mr. Meacher: That is a matter for you, Madam Speaker, rather than for me.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): While we welcome the unreserved apology from the Minister, did we not hear him on "Today" this morning, discussing this matter? He said that, unless landowners entered voluntary agreements, there would be legislation. We heard today that there would be full and open consultation of a genuine nature. Which is the truth? Is the former Government policy? If it is, is it not remarkably like bullying?

Mr. Meacher: The two matters are entirely consistent. I would expect someone with the legal and logical mind of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to be able to see that.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am concerned that the instance of disrespect for the House that we have just heard is not isolated. When the primary school class sizes money was announced, the information was given to Labour Members the day before other hon. Members, together with a press release for them to send out, and a suggestion that they go to a primary school in their constituency to get the credit for that spending of public money. Do you share my view that that is not in order, and not an appropriate way for the House to proceed?

Madam Speaker: It is a party political matter. It is nothing to do with the Speaker of this House.

International Bribery and Corruption

3.44 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to create offences of international bribery and corruption; and for connected purposes.

The Bill would make it a criminal offence for a United Kingdom resident or a United Kingdom company to bribe, or attempt to bribe, a public official in another country. It is a serious crime to bribe someone in the United Kingdom, but it may surprise some hon. Members to know that, under British law, it is perfectly legal to bribe someone abroad. It is a case of one law for the United Kingdom and another for the rest of the world.

Not only is bribery legal, as long as the act of bribery takes place offshore, but in some instances it is still a tax-deductible activity. A year ago, I introduced to the House the Overseas Development Co-operation Bill, which sought to target more of our British aid on poor people in poor countries, and to end the scandalous misuse of aid as a sweetener for arms sales, such as that which took place in the case of the Pergau dam.

Now those principles have been reflected in the Department for International Development White Paper, "Eliminating World Poverty: A Challenge for the 21st Century", and, since the 1997 general election, both the European Union and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, with support from our Labour Government, have adopted conventions against international bribery. This Bill seeks to incorporate those conventions into UK law.

There is a comforting but fictitious belief that bribery is not a serious problem in Britain—that only in the third world is it a way of life. Well, it takes two to tango. The British business man who pays a 20 per cent. commission without asking too clearly where the money goes, is as guilty as the third-world politician or general who pockets the money.

Bribery is a global problem. Only four years ago, Gordon Foxley, a Ministry of Defence civil servant in this country, was gaoled for accepting £1.3 million in bribes.

There is rapid inflation in the currency of bribery. Last year's Mr. Five Per Cent. is this year's Mr. Fifteen Per Cent. or Mr. Twenty-five Per Cent.

In the past, British business has been fairly relaxed about bribery, but no longer. Adair Turner, on behalf of the Confederation of British Industry, told the Los Angeles Times:

"Most British companies support the OECD goals."

He also said:

"Corruption's become a big issue because it just costs business so much these days."

However, the consequences of international bribery are most serious in developing countries. Corruption can go right to the top. Two former Presidents of the Republic of Korea have been prosecuted and indicted for bribery. A President of Brazil has been impeached on corruption charges.

The sums of money are enormous. In the 1980s, Zaire's foreign debt rose to $5 billion, but the personal wealth of President Mobutu, the country's President, exceeded $4 billion. What was true of Mobutu was true of Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines or Emperor Bokassa of the Central African Republic.

The problem in some developing countries is not a shortage of capital but the fact that the capital is owned by a tiny elite and held offshore. That money ends up being invested in European and north American property markets and stock markets, instead of in the economic development of those Presidents' own countries.

Bribes—I mean big bribes—are always paid in hard currency, usually directly to an offshore bank account, which robs the developing country of the foreign exchange it needs to promote its development.

The cost of bribes falls primarily on the poor. When a corrupt contractor from this or some other rich country pays a 15 per cent. bribe, he adds that to the price of his contract. His power station or irrigation scheme will cost more, and the little people—those who buy the electricity or the water to irrigate their crops—will pay the price of that bribe. Bribery is a direct transfer of money from the poor to the rich.

According to the EC representative in Kenya, the French contractor who was awarded the contract to build the Turkwel gorge dam—there was no international competition for the project—charged 2.4 times the cost of a comparable dam and power station on the Tana river in Kenya. The Kenyan officials charged with monitoring the contract did not complain because they gained, in the words of the EC official, "high personal advantage".

When bribery takes root, people start buying things that they do not need. Last year, the chief of naval staff in Pakistan resigned amid allegations of bribery in connection with a £580 million purchase of submarines. To Pakistan's credit, the Government have since launched an "Accountability, Accountability, Accountability" campaign—I am glad to see that the rhetoric of new Labour has a global application—designed to root out corruption, and some 85 officials have already been suspended. The Pakistan President estimates that corruption in that country costs the Government 2 billion rupees a day. Many other developing countries—such as Botswana, Uganda and South Africa—take the problem of bribery very seriously.

The International Monetary Fund, which has been the unwitting financier of many big bribes in the past, is now taking a tough line. A "not for public use" document produced in September last year states:

"Conditionality will be attached to . . . safeguard the use of Fund resources."

That may explain why the IMF decided last week not to restore loans to Kenya, because of continuing concerns about the failure of Daniel arap Moi's Government to stamp out corruption.

In 1977, the United States took the lead in combating corruption when President Carter's Administration secured the passage of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. It is still the only legislation in the world that makes international bribery an offence. The Act has worked well. It has been used, and it has led to convictions and prison sentences. It has changed the culture of American business.

My Bill seeks to do the same in this country. It is needed because it will be good for business in this country. It is needed because it will be good for international development, and, above all, because it is morally right to put it on the statute book. Politics without morality is the first step towards corruption.

3.52 pm

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): I congratulate the hon. Member for City of York (Mr. Bayley) on presenting his Bill with such passion and force. However, I oppose the Bill, because I think that it is fundamentally naive, and that it is wrong to introduce such legislation at this time.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development is endeavouring to find a package of best practice with which to address the problem of bribery around the world. The European Union is also examining that problem at present. However, the House must consider several questions before agreeing to the Bill.

How do we define bribery? If a United Kingdom contractor pays commission to an agent, which is common practice in third-world countries, and that agent passes on some of the commission to those who must decide whether they will purchase the services offered by that contractor, does that constitute a bribe—even though it is once, twice or thrice removed? Would we make it illegal for those companies to give commission? If a company finds that, in order even to be considered for a contract abroad, it must make a percentage contribution to the corporation advertising the contract, would that company also be committing an offence?

It is not by accident that it is not illegal for bribery to be paid to overseas companies from the United Kingdom. If the hon. Gentleman's Bill were enacted, it would probably rule many British companies out of applying for contracts abroad, which would simply fall into the hands of French, German, Japanese, American and other competitors in those countries. What consideration has the hon. Gentleman given to the jobs that would be lost in this country if his Bill became law?

The question of bribery is almost like the question of unilateral nuclear disarmament. Everyone would like the world to disarm itself of nuclear weapons, but Britain and now the Government have resolutely decided that to do so unilaterally would be wrong. I argue that, if the hon. Gentleman's Bill were passed into law, it would be wrong. It would lose valuable jobs, especially in high-tech areas in the sunrise industries in this country.

Although the hon. Gentleman presented his Bill with passion, it reflected an underlying naivety about the way in which business is done in this country and around the world. I say to the hon. Gentleman: wait. His dreams for a bribeless world may well come about. As I said, the European Union is examining the issue, as is the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. As the hon. Gentleman correctly pointed out, the White House is examining the problem. If the Bill is passed now, it will cost jobs in this country. For that reason, I oppose it.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hugh Bayley, Mr. Gerald Kaufman, Mrs. Maria Fyfe, Mr. Peter L. Pike, Ms Diane Abbott, Mr. Charles Clarke, Dr. Phyllis Starkey, Dr. Ashok Kumar, Helen Jackson, Mr. Malcolm Wicks and Ms Rosie Winterton.

INTERNATIONAL BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION

Mr. Hugh Bayley accordingly presented a Bill to create offences of international bribery and corruption; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 128].

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Clause 118

EXTENSION OF FUNCTIONS

3.58 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I beg to move amendment No. 374, in page 56, leave out lines 9 to 13.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 493, in page 56, leave out lines 10 and 11.

No. 523, in page 56, line 11, at end insert—

'(aa) in paragraph (a), for "or any" substitute "and every", and'.

No. 519, in page 56, line 13, at end insert—

'(d) after paragraph (d) insert—

"(f) to promote social equity in Wales.".'.

No. 540, in page 56, line 26, at end insert—

'(e) after paragraph (i) insert—

(j) to encourage the development of exports from Wales.'.

Mr. Davies: The amendment focuses on two aspects. First, there is the insertion into section 1(2)(a) of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975 of "and social" after the word "economic". For the future, if the clause is accepted as it is drafted, one of the purposes of the Welsh Development Agency—it has to operate through its purposes—will be not merely the furtherance of economic development throughout Wales but the furtherance of economic and social development. That being so, the WDA will take upon itself the purpose of social development as well as and in addition to its present purpose of economic development.

The second focus of the amendment is on the replacement—if the clause becomes law—of the word "industrial" with "business" and "businesses" in relation to the purposes of the WDA. When it comes to the agency's functions, "industrial" is replaced by "business". I wish to consider the definition of "business", which is contained in paragraph 2 of schedule 10 to the Bill. The definition of "business" is important in relation to the replacement of "industrial" with "business".

I shall deal first with the importance of the words "social" and "social development", as I have explained, after "economic development". We are faced with a major change in the function and the purpose of the WDA. It may seem to be a small matter, but it presents a major change.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in one of his memorable soundbites during the referendum campaign, referred to an "economic powerhouse". Perhaps that was the most memorable phrase of all. The WDA was to be, rightly, after devolution, an economic powerhouse. It was a ringing phrase that sounded well.

[Mr. Davies]

However, when we read the clause, we see that the WDA will not be an economic powerhouse. Instead, it will be a "economic and social powerhouse". To my ear, that is not such a ringing phrase as "economic powerhouse". I am not even sure whether a body can be a social powerhouse, but perhaps that is possible. It is clear that something has happened on the journey from the devolution and referendum campaign to this awful drafting of proposed legislation, which always concentrates the mind.

We now have an economic and social powerhouse—in other words, a change or addition to the functions of the WDA. The insertion of those few words—this may seem pedantic—changes the nature of the WDA. I always thought—some of us were in the House of Commons and in government when the WDA was established—that under old Labour, which was very old-fashioned about these things, it was brought into being as a wealth-producing agency or an agency to promote wealth production.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it was a previous Labour Government who introduced the Development Board for Rural Wales, which has social functions? In fact, those social functions stood rural Wales in good stead, and we would have been sore put if we did not have them.

Mr. Davies: I shall refer at length to the debates that took place in the Welsh Grand Committee. These were not on the words "social function" but on the exact words that are to be inserted into the proposed legislation. Again, it was old Labour intervening in the economy.

The Welsh Development Agency was supposed to promote wealth creation. If the changes are carried out, the WDA will have a mixed role. To an extent it will have a contradictory role, not only in wealth creation but in social function or social facilities. There could be problems along that path.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) is right. I take him back to the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, which applies, until it is done away with, to a small but important part of Wales, Powys, Meirionnydd and Cardiganshire—or Ceredigion—and has been extended, perhaps, to parts of Carmarthenshire. I am not sure. The words "social development" are plain for all to see in that Act. They were taken originally from the Highlands and Islands development board legislation. I do not keep up with Scottish affairs, so do not know what happened to that board. It has probably gone, but whether it exists is immaterial.

There is no definition of "social development" in the Bill, and there is none in the 1976 Act. I do not complain about that; it is not an easy phrase to define. I do not know about the Highlands and Islands development board, as I have not checked. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that there was interesting discussion in Standing Committee K on the meaning of "social development". I refer to the Standing Committee debate in 1976, when these matters were debated, and to what was said by my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary—who represented Flint, East at the time but who now represents Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). At the time, amendments were tabled to change the wording from "social development" to "social needs". My hon. Friend resisted, saying:

"I must resist the amendments and I will explain why. The amended wording could be construed as restricting in some way the activities that the board might support".

These are the important words:

"The board should be able to provide facilities"— social development facilities—

"in the form of additional physical amenities such as halls"—

I take it that he meant village halls—

"and playing fields, and that explains why the Government are right and the Opposition are wrong. The board should be able to support the activities undertaken in those halls by voluntary bodies"— indeed, voluntary associations appeared throughout the debate—

"if they contribute to the growth and development of the area and enrich its culture."

My hon. Friend continued:

"There is no reason why the wording of the Bill should be restricted in a way which would throw doubt on whether the board could assist social activity."

We are approaching some kind of definition, or at least a description. Social development means, quite properly—I have nothing against it—helping village halls and voluntary associations, and assisting in what is called social activity. My hon. Friend said that the definition of the words was taken from the legislation governing the Highlands and Islands development board.

My hon. Friend continued:

"A check on any possible and reasonable exercise by the board of the powers"—

there was an argument that the words were too wide and that there should be some kind of check—

"to support social development is not to be found in the legal definition of the powers"— there was no legal definition—

"but rather in the need for the consent which the board"—

the Development Board for Rural Wales—

"must obtain from the Secretary of State"— that is, my right hon. Friend until the Bill becomes law and the orders are made—

"and the Treasury for any assistance offered".—[Official Report, Standing Committee K, 22 July 1976; c. 82-83.]

Will my hon. Friend the present Under-Secretary of State deal with that specific point? Where will the checks apply in future? My hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State properly referred to such checks. He said that there was no check in the legal definition—the courts might check that, and I shall return to that in a moment—but that rather there was a check in the need for the consent of the Secretary of State and the Treasury.

What will be the position when the Bill becomes law and we have an assembly? Will the check, if there is to be one, be transferred from the Secretary of State to the assembly, and will Treasury consent still be required? Will there be no check at all, or will the assembly be some kind of check? That is a subsidiary question, as to how any check will operate on moneys paid for social development, which would include social activity, village halls and voluntary bodies and associations.

On 28 July 1976, my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary mentioned assistance to rural councils and voluntary service councils—I am not sure what that means. He referred to assistance to the Council of Social Service for Wales. I am not sure whether that still exists. Again quite properly, he referred to assistance to the Welsh Committee—I am not sure what that refers to either—and then to young farmers' clubs. They do a wonderful job in rural Wales. I do not decry any of that at all. But my hon. Friend, who was describing what was meant by "social development", was saying that assistance to young farmers' clubs fell within that phrase, although he seemed to imply that the requirement of the consent of the Secretary of State and the Treasury would be a check.

My hon. Friend then referred to the splendid Association of Welsh Weavers. I am not sure whether that still exists. Perhaps the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire has a Welsh weavers association in his constituency. I hope that he does. I hope that it still exists. If it does, it is surely a worthy body. I am trying to explain what Ministers in the previous Labour Government who introduced the phrase "social development", which is now being taken out of the Development of Rural Wales Act and put into this Bill, understood by that phrase.

"'social development' is the wider term"—

wider than social needs—

"and includes what is suggested as community development."—[Official Report, Standing Committee K, 28 July 1976; c. 196.]

There had been speeches by the then hon. Member for Merioneth about the importance, perhaps rightly, of community development. According to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, community development was encompassed by the phrase "social development".

Mr. Livsey: The right hon. Gentleman will agree that the social development work carried out by the Development Board for Rural Wales has been extremely beneficial, and if it is incorporated in the Bill, it will benefit other parts of rural Wales. For example, the development of the Brecon jazz festival and the Hay festival of literature would not have occurred without the DBRW's social development powers. It has created a lot of employment and interest in the locality.

4.15 pm

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman is right. The only comment with which I take issue is that incorporation in the Bill would enable those benefits to continue to go to rural Wales. Of course, they would, but the point that I am making is that it would enable the benefits to go everywhere in Wales: to Rhymney or Llanelli—if the hon. Gentleman can have a jazz festival in Brecon, I presume that we shall get the same benefits as his constituents now get.

It would have been perfectly possible for the draftsman to incorporate the phrase in the Bill and confine it to the areas covered by the DBRW. It could have been said that social development should apply to a part of Wales, which could be defined as Powys, Ceredigion and Meirionnydd—the same areas covered by the development board. The hon. Gentleman made a good point. Indeed, he made the point for me. We are extending a measure that was properly conceived for a small but important area of rural Wales to the whole of Wales: Cardiff, Newport—

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I appreciate that Caernarfon was not included and that now it will be. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is delighted about that.

Mr. Wigley: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, during the DBRW's 20 years' existence, several areas of Wales, particularly Dinefwr, Preseli, Glyndwr and Dwyfor, which are just as rural as areas in mid-Wales, argued strongly that they needed the powers that were available to the DBRW, but were not available under the WDA? This change at least meets that agenda.

Mr. Davies: Indeed. Many areas would have liked to be encompassed within the 1976 legislation, and now they will be. Urban areas are now encompassed within the measure, including the middle of some of our towns. Tredegar, Ebbw Vale, Merthyr and Port Talbot will all now be able to ask the Welsh Development Agency for assistance for their village halls, jazz festivals or drama festivals, because those are all functions that fall within the phrase "social development".

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I have been listening closely to my right hon. Friend's argument. I hope that he will forgive me for characterising certain parts of it as overly legalistic. Will he accept two points: first, that those concerned with the regeneration of communities appreciate that there is an artificial distinction to be drawn between economic and social development; and, secondly, that the main focus of the enhanced WDA will be economic development? It will be important for the new agency to be enabled to carry out incidental and ancillary functions, including social development in all areas, and remain intra vires, to use a legal term.

Mr. Davies: I am sorry if I am being legalistic, but there is nothing incidental about the phrase "social development". I suppose that it could have been made incidental when the Bill was drafted. Although my hon. Friend might not like to read those legal words, if he bends his mind to it, he might see that "social" is put on the same plain as "economic". It is not incidental in any way. Indeed, interventions by Liberal Democrat and Plaid Cymru Members—is the party still called Plaid Cymru?—show how much they value payments to young farmers' clubs, jazz festivals and village halls, which will now become available, if the funds exist, to anyone in Wales. My hon. Friend may think that a good thing, but this is a major change in the function and purpose of the WDA. When it was established under poor old Labour, it was concerned solely with wealth creation. Now it is moving into the social field.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does not the right hon. Gentleman agree that changes could have been made to the WDA in the past, had it been thought necessary to include social development in its remit? There is social deprivation in Swansea, Neath, Port Talbot and parts of Cardiff. If the changes are made, they will get in line along with the rural areas and argue for their fair share of the cake.

Mr. Davies: That is the point. I would not blame them for doing so. I take exception to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) chiding me for being legalistic. I am not being legalistic: dozens of voluntary associations will queue up with their tin cans outside the WDA and outside the assembly, because the proposal is a charter for voluntary associations. I do not know how many there are in Wales, but there are many. I tabled a question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, asking him to list them. He did not know how many there were, but said that he would put a list in the Library. It has not arrived yet—I do not criticise him for that—but the list will be very long.

The Welsh are good at voluntary associations, and we have never had problems with social development—we are marvellous at it. Our problem has been with wealth creation. It is no good my hon. Friend chiding me for being legalistic. The Welsh economy is not the strongest in the United Kingdom. It may suffer considerable problems over the next year or two as a result of factors outside its control.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): Monetary union.

Mr. Davies: I do not even include that. Other, global factors could cause problems.

The Welsh economy needs wealth creation. Conservative Members may argue that the WDA was interventionist and old Labour, which believed that Governments should help with wealth creation. Such views are unfashionable these days, but that was the agency's purpose. We all agree with social development, but it is dangerous to mix it with wealth creation. That is my first point about the change to providing for social development.

I do not know where the money will come from. My hon. Friend the Minister might tell me that the WDA budget will be expanded, but if its purposes and functions increase and the sum of money provided stays the same, something will have to be cut, I do not know what. There will be considerable pressures on the WDA, from voluntary associations, for example. The WDA will be responsible to a democratic assembly, not to the Secretary of State, who will not have the economic powers that he holds at the moment.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Welsh Development Agency will still depend on the Secretary of State in one respect, that is, the extent of its borrowing powers?

Mr. Davies: That may or may not be the case, but the budget will be determined by the assembly. We shall have an Athenian-type assembly that will want to obtain as much money as it can. If it can tell the WDA that its functions include building village halls, it will do so. There will be considerable pressure to cut back on economic development, as we shall all be pressing the WDA for money for social development.

It may be said that that is only incidental, and that there will be judicial reviews. I am sorry to talk about lawyers again. Sadly, local authorities are becoming fairly accustomed to people saying—understandably—"You have powers to help dyslexic children, or to provide speech therapy. You are not exercising those powers properly." They take local authorities to court on those grounds, but the courts usually say that, if there is no money, authorities cannot provide such facilities. That might well be the case with the WDA, but there will be pressure through the courts and the political system. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to think again. It is perfectly possible to confine social development to the areas to which it is currently confined.

The other aspect that concerns me—in fact, the two aspects must be considered together—is the replacement of the word "industrial" with the word "business". I shall not be "old Labour" on this occasion, and say that we must keep the word "industrial". There is no great magic in a definition of the word, which has been used for centuries in Britain and France to cover all sorts of activity. I do not object to the change from "industrial" to "business"; indeed, I can see that it makes sense in the world we live in. What worries me is the extraordinary definition of "business" in schedule 10.

Paragraph 10(2) gives that definition. I welcome the fact that there is a definition, for a change, and I suppose that "business" is not an easy word to define. The draftsman starts perfectly sensibly, saying that "business"

"includes any industrial, commercial or professional activities".

I do not object to that. Solicitors and accountants in Cardiff who will receive large fees from the WDA will now be able to obtain other forms of assistance from it. I do not object to "professional activities" in the modern world: wealth can be created through them.

The definition continues, however, with the words—in brackets—

"whether or not with a view to profit".

The draftsman clearly felt that a business is normally carried out with a view to profit, whether or not it achieves that profit—but not, it seems, in the new WDA. Profit does not really matter. It seems that someone engaging in a professional activity without a view to profit can now obtain money from the WDA. That is a strange and unnecessary extension of the functions and purposes of the agency.

I have asked myself what sort of organisation would conduct a business without a view to profit. I hate to mention it, but I suppose that the Welsh Rugby Union could be said to be conducting a business nowadays. It has sponsorship and money; it is engaged in business activities, but certainly not with a view to profit, on or off the rugby field. Some organisations could describe themselves as businesses, but without a view to profit.

Why on earth do we need that provision, given the purposes and effect of the WDA? The WDA is there to foster wealth creation. I am sorry if this is another "old Labour" view of the world, but what the Welsh economy needs is profit, and lots of it. Let us tax it by all means, but let us have it. We have very little of it; that is the problem.

Mr. Wigley: My constituency contains a village co-operative called Antur Waunfawr, which is not geared to making profits. It employs people with learning difficulties who would not otherwise obtain work, and it supplies commercial goods. Surely that body could legitimately be aided by the WDA.

Mr. Davies: That is a legitimate body, but my question is whether it should be mixed in with a body such as the WDA, whose ostensible purpose is to create wealth from a profit base in the Welsh economy. I understand that that is an old-fashioned view, but perhaps the legislation is a kind of third way—capitalism with a human face. The Welsh economy needs commerce, industry and professionals, all of them producing profit. There is always a place for the sort of community activity that the right hon. Gentleman mentions, and it is good to see it, but as I say, I question the sense of mixing it in with an economic powerhouse, which is what the WDA was supposed to be, although it will not be any more.

4.30 pm

Not only does the schedule mention activities that are carried on without a view to profit, but it refers to

"the activities of any government department or any local or other public authority".

The whole range of government, including quangos, public authorities, non-governmental bodies, voluntary bodies and those that do not make profits are included. Everything is to be thrown at the WDA. Local authorities will be able to ask the WDA for money. Even Departments will be able to do that. The idea is bizarre. Will the Treasury ask for some of its money back? All those bodies will be like bees at the honeypot of the Welsh Development Agency, poor thing. Apparently it will be entirely different from what it was before.

Perhaps the WDA's budget will be doubled, and that is fine, but I question the effect of what is proposed. Despite the criticisms of some of my hon. Friends, the WDA has been a successful interventionist body and has helped to create real wealth in Wales. We need more of that, but perfectly enlightened social activities are to be mixed in, and that is dangerous. I hope that the Minister will deal with those issues, which I hope will not be a by-product of the DBRW and WDA merger. That is not necessary, and the matter could have been ring-fenced in the legislation. I hope that the Minister will explain that matter, which is important for our constituents.

Mr. Evans: I should like to speak to our amendment No. 493 in this group, and I welcome the opportunity to focus on the extension of the Welsh Development Agency's functions, the possible impact on Wales and the potential for the greater devolution of the social role. I enjoyed the speech by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). He said that he thought that the WDA would be an economic and social powerhouse. For a second, I thought he said that it would be an economic and socialist powerhouse. However, I understand that we are all new Labour now, so that could not possibly be the case.

The WDA, which was set up in 1976 by a previous Labour Government, is one of the great success stories of Wales. In a recent debate, the Attorney-General said that he had had the privilege of setting up three bodies in Wales that had survived 18 years of Tory rule. He said that they had survived because the Conservative party could not think of anything better. That was a tribute to the Attorney-General, although it came from himself. It seems that the new Labour Government can think of something better.

The WDA has been built on by successive Secretaries of State for Wales, but there is a fear that the proposed changes may endanger its success. Its remit has been prescribed and the Development Board for Rural Wales has taken over a similar, but more targeted role for areas such as Ceredigion, Meirionnydd, parts of Powys and swathes of rural Wales. That will end with the fusion of the Land Authority for Wales into one super-quango.

We should not underestimate the real success story of the Welsh Development Agency. I think that the right hon. Member for Llanelli fears that the proposed changes will jeopardise the wealth creation focus of the WDA, which, in the 1980s, played such an important role in helping to restructure the traditional industries of coal, slate and steel in parts of Wales, especially steel in Llanwern and Port Talbot.

The Welsh Development Agency also met the task of land reclamation with gusto. I am sure that it would have tackled the task with even more gusto if it had had a larger budget. The WDA also worked on town developments, which were praised by the right hon. Member for Llanelli.

The Welsh Development Agency has helped to transform Wales, which has loosened its grip on its industrial past to become the enterprise centre of Europe. We fear that that role may be jeopardised by changes that will occur under the assembly.

I congratulate the chairman and the entire team of the Welsh Development Agency on its success. We can tell how good the agency has been by the fact that it is being copied not only in other parts of Europe, but across England. The new challenge will be posed by regional development agencies in England—which will receive the help and advice of secondees from the WDA, which is another enormous compliment to their skill.

Another fear is that the Welsh assembly and its 60 politicians may become overly intrusive in the agency's daily affairs. I seek assurances from the Secretary of State—

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies) indicated dissent.

Mr. Evans: I see him shaking his head. I am partly reassured by that, but perhaps, later in the debate, we shall receive a bit more—verbal—reassurance that that will not be the case. I am sure that he has taken heed of the fears expressed by the Confederation of British Industry about the lack of a clear demarcation between the assembly's strategic role and the performance of the WDA's daily functions.

This group of amendments seems to propose assigning many extra tasks to the Welsh Development Agency. Some hon. Members have been critical of the agency, saying that it did not pay due regard to areas outside the M4 and A55 corridors, which have acted as investment magnets. However, if we get the changes to the agency wrong and those areas no longer attract the same investment levels—for example, 20 per cent. of all inward investment into Britain has been in Wales—and if those changes divert the agency from its core responsibility, damage will be done not only to the areas along the M4 and the A55, but to other areas that had planned on gaining some of the extra social development funding. Those areas will be badly let down, particularly if new investment does not materialise.

If we get the changes wrong, the social deprivation that will be caused in parts of Wales—north, south, east and west—will be absolutely enormous, and the tin can that the right hon. Member for Llanelli mentioned in his speech will most certainly find its way to the agency, to the Welsh assembly and to local authorities. We must fully consider the exact consequences of what we are asking of the WDA.

The steer that was given to the WDA—asking it to concentrate on areas away from the M4 and the A55—was absolutely right. The 1996–97 figures show that of £2.2 billion of indigenous and inward investment and 18,400 new and safeguarded jobs, 6,200 of those jobs were safeguarded or created outside the eastern M4 and the A55 corridors. That is absolutely right, and it is exactly what we wanted. The same is true of the Development Board for Rural Wales. We wanted to ensure that more of its money and job creation activities went to a wider area within rural Wales, and that was starting to happen.

New regional development agencies are being created. Despite the concordats that we have heard so much about, we are still unsure about what will happen to Wales's success story when Wales has to compete with those RDAs and with Scotland. Who will be the umpire?

Other problems that will confront not only Wales, but other parts of the United Kingdom are the minimum wage, Europe and farming. Farming is a particular problem for rural Wales, and the WDA will have to pick up the pieces of the crisis that has hit Welsh farming. However, it is not only farmers who are being hit, but the small rural businesses such as tractor suppliers, builders and many others which have grown up around farming. They will now have to look to the WDA. Many small towns and villages will also have to ask the WDA for extra assistance. The greatest social development assistance that can be given to any community is to ensure that there is proper, sustainable work. Without that, there will be severe problems.

Businesses have been hit by five interest rate rises since 1 May. They are probably already working on tight margins and have now seen their borrowings increase and their charges go up. Those which were already marginal may have gone bankrupt.

We have to re-examine the whole subject of Europe if there is to be any re-evaluation, as we understand there is, of the way in which regional aid will be doled out strictly according to the unemployment figures. In many parts of Wales, the unemployment figures are looking good, but we are still told that the gross domestic product of communities in Wales is low compared to many other areas, especially areas in Europe.

We could find ourselves in the absurd situation of seeing areas such as Catalonia attract regional aid that would be taken from areas such as Wales. That would mean a £1 billion hole which the WDA would be asked to fill. We seek some assurances from the Secretary of State in that regard, although I expect that he is battling hard to ensure that any changes in Europe will not disadvantage the parts of Wales that have benefited greatly from regional aid.

I am sure that there is a reason for the way in which social development assistance was targeted on certain rural areas, and a reason why the work was not given to the WDA. If the three bodies to which I have referred are to be merged, we must ensure that social development assistance continues to be given to the parts of rural Wales that need it. The right hon. Member for Llanelli suggested that one way in which to do that would be to include in the Bill more specific references to social development areas. Another way might be to involve local authorities.

As the Minister knows, I was a county councillor in West Glamorgan for six years, and one of my joys during that time was to sit on one of the grant committees. The right hon. Member for Llanelli wondered how many voluntary bodies there are in Wales—I can tell him that there are a great many. They used to ask our committee for support month after month, and we used to dole out money for various bodies. Mention was made of the young farmers, but we gave money to the cubs, boys bands and others. All organisations have a voluntary body to assist them, especially those involving young, disadvantaged and disabled people. We used to go through our budget, which was small in relation to our other budgets, doling out what money we had to assist those good causes.

In the spirit of devolution—and in anticipation of the development of the partnership council—more power could be devolved from the new super-quango WDA to local authorities, particularly if resources are to be limited. Money could then be allocated to the areas that currently enjoy social development status.

I hope that the Minister will closely examine the role of the 22 local authorities, which know their own areas well. If the Government do not carefully reconsider their proposals, they will throw out the baby with the bath water. The WDA's capacity to create wealth could be jeopardised; it will have to fill up the holes created by the other problems that will arise. Social development money will be given to Swansea, Port Talbot and Neath, for example, where there are areas of deprivation that will require money. The WDA will spend so much of its time looking after them that it may ignore rural areas of deprivation.

4.45 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): All of us who were at the birth of the Welsh Development Agency will naturally wish to scrutinise any recasting or revamping of its role such as is proposed in the clause. That is partly because we feel a sense of parenthood, but mostly because we believe that the agency has a fundamental role to play in the regeneration of the community. Having read the clause and discussed the amendments, I ask a simple question: will the changes create an enhanced WDA that is capable of doing more and better for communities such as the one I serve?

The clause recasts the agency by amalgamating it with other organisations. It also goes further, however, and I hope that the Minister will say whether the redefining of the agency's role and objectives is consequential on the amalgamation, or whether the agency is expected to play a different, wider and more significant role in the context of a Welsh assembly.

I hope that this does not sound like counter-bidding or, indeed, immodesty, but I think that even the Attorney-General, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), would concede that I was the inventor of the Land Authority for Wales. As a Minister, I devised the idea and took it through Cabinet Committees. I was able to put the Community Land Act 1975 on to the statute book only after a mammoth session in Standing Committee—the record has only recently been broken—in which we sat from 10.30 am until lunchtime the next day to push the Welsh clauses through. By that time, I was already a Minister in the Foreign Office, so I found myself in a curious position.

As a result, I have always had a fond feeling for the Land Authority for Wales, especially as it was also an early example of the Welsh Office striking out on its own in legislative terms. I do not know how many hon. Members recall the Community Land Act, but in England, the powers were vested in local authorities, so we had contentious debates with Welsh local authorities about the establishment of the Land Authority for Wales.

We managed to establish the authority, and I think that it has served a practical and useful purpose. It is one of the great survivors. The rest of the Community Land Act has all but disappeared, but the land authority has survived. Therefore, I feel some sort of fondness for the organisation.

I make no complaint about the fact that the authority is now to be incorporated into the revised and revamped Welsh Development Agency—except to say that we should not oversell the change. The land authority was doing a perfectly good and effective job on its own terms, and it was one of the rare quangos that did not cost the state anything. It was a wealth-creating, profit-making quango in that one respect.

The land authority is to be incorporated into the Welsh Development Agency, but it could usefully have continued to serve its purpose outside the agency—although I have no reason to believe that it will not do so within the agency.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I hate to carry on reminiscing, but while we are talking about the profitability of the Land Authority for Wales, may I ask my hon. Friend whether he was the Welsh Office Minister who came to me, when I was a Treasury Minister, asking for additional legislation to exempt the authority from taxation on its profits?

Mr. Rowlands: I was not, but I certainly would have been party to the attempt. I think that it was Baroness White.

Mr. Davies: The answer was no.

Mr. Rowlands: The Land Authority for Wales represents a modest practical success story, and I am sure that that should be able to continue under the aegis of the new Welsh Development Agency in the context of the assembly. All I ask of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench is that they do not exaggerate the significance of the change. The authority is already carrying out its function, and will simply continue to do so in its revised form.

We have, however, heard many exaggerated claims for the new, revamped Welsh Development Agency. I read one recently, and in the context of the clause and the amendments tabled to it, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to what extent it is correct. I refer to the belief that the combination of a new assembly and an economic powerhouse will somehow create a new political momentum for a Welsh energy policy. I have heard that proposition debated in the context both of the assembly and of the proposed changes to the WDA.

When the provisions were recast, was it intended that in all the changes in the functions of the new, or rather revised, WDA, there would be any new kind of power or responsibility for devising, encouraging or developing a Welsh energy policy? Is that consequential upon the changes? I cannot see that it is.

I am sorry to say that the context in which I most recently read the claim that the changes would lead to a new momentum for a Welsh energy policy came from those who want massively to extend opencast coaling throughout south Wales. I have my doubts, therefore, about whether such a development is really consequential on the changes that we are making.

The key to that side of the policy is what will happen with consents for power stations. Will the power to give consents be vested in the assembly, or will it remain with the Department of Trade and Industry? Will the changes in the clause and the rest of the Bill, including the existence of the assembly, make any difference to who consents to power stations? If there is one instrument that could enable one to, or prevent one from, devising an energy policy, it is the power to give power station consents.

What I am about to say will be in a sort of shorthand form, because I do not really mean it in a pejorative sense. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) was right to ask seriously whether the changes proposed in the clause would dilute or deepen the role of the Welsh Development Agency. As my right hon. Friend asked, will we be setting up even more competitive pressures on its budget, both inside and outside the agency? Those pressures are already there in powerful and significant form, even on the traditional functions that we all agree are central to the agency, but which have become Cinderellas in the context of its changing role, even in its existing form.

I am thinking especially of the agency's derelict land function. My right hon. Friend will know how, when we were in opposition, we had to apply continuous pressure to ensure that the WDA's budget for the derelict land programme was safeguarded and maintained in the face of all the other pressures. Will not the new, enhanced economic powerhouse WDA lead to even greater competitive pressures? Both my right hon. Friend and I have felt that the derelict land programme has become something of a Cinderella programme as the WDA's policy, programmes and budgets have evolved. Will it not continue to be a Cinderella and have to compete with other Cinderellas?

That question is serious. I have a vivid illustration: the Deep Navigation site is tied into millennium money, and we have been begging the WDA to come up with its share of the money. We have often thought that we had got the money, but then question marks have been placed against whether the WDA will budget for it. Even at this late hour, the question mark persists and I hope that it will be erased soon. That is an example of the set of pressures that already exist within the agency, but will not those pressures multiply within the new, revised agency, with the result that the agency's role in the regeneration of communities such as the one I represent will be diluted and not enhanced? That is a serious question, which requires an answer.

In some ways, I suspect that the redefining of the functions and role of the agency contained in the clause reflects the changes in society and in the Welsh economy—

The Chairman: Order. I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's speech and he appears to be in danger of making a clause stand part speech. The amendments to the clause are very particularly grouped, and the hon. Gentleman appears to be ranging over them in a way that takes him outside the group that we are discussing.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sorry, Sir Alan. I had not intended to do that. I think that one will find that most of my remarks refer to the alteration in the wording, whereby the word "social" is added and the word "industrial" is changed to "business". I intended to illustrate that in the point that I was about to make when you, understandably, intervened to ensure that I stayed on the straight and narrow.

My point is this: does not redefining the word "business" and excluding the word "industrial", as my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli suggests, extend the WDA's role into an area in which the WDA has thus far steadfastly refused to become involved? I do not know whether other colleagues have received representations on this subject, but companies that repair motor vehicles or garages have thought that they could benefit from the WDA. Does the redefining of the role from industrial to business mean that the WDA will now incorporate activities in the service sector, in which it had previously refused to become involved? That is relevant to the amendments, Sir Alan, and relevant to the points that I have put to Ministers.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Will my hon. Friend accept that there is a real need in Wales to invest in the service sector and the research and development sector? In that respect, why does he not welcome the broader scope of functions of the new enhanced agency in that it encompasses not only industry in the old-fashioned sense, but business in the wider sense?

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend anticipates my final observations on the amendments, because I intend to address the argument concerning the industrial sector versus the service sector, as well as the indigenous versus inward investment argument, which has raged through some of the discussion that the clause has engendered outside the House of Commons.

I said earlier that the wording of the clause reflected changes in society that have already taken place. When preparing for the mighty efforts that we are going to make in respect of the new deal, I found that a portrait of the Merthyr Tydfil county borough now shows that the proportion of total employment supplied by the industrial manufacturing sector has fallen to 26 per cent.—that statistic coming from the heart of a great industrial manufacturing base. The service sector has been growing as a proportion of the total. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the changes, and to the fact that we must accommodate them.

We should not rest the regeneration of local economies primarily on the shifting sands of the service sector. The thing that makes our communities distinctive from service sector communities is our manufacturing role, tradition and skills. I challenge the assumption that one has not only to accept that the WDA should change its role, but to want it to change its role. I do not want it to change its role in one fundamental respect. I would like the WDA to continue to see itself fundamentally as an agency to regenerate the manufacturing sector. The agency can do that in two ways. It can support indigenous local industry—where that exists—and it can encourage major inward investment. I was interested to see the figures for new jobs created in Blaenau Gwent recently, where Tesco and Festival Shopping Ebbw Vale created 300 jobs each. That reflects the incredible changes that are taking place.

5 pm

In my area, Halla—despite its problems—is trying to regenerate and rebuild the manufacturing sector by inward investment, as are US CAN, Candy and the St. Merryn Meat company. These inward investments were achieved by a powerful partnership: the Secretary of State for Wales with a regional selective assistance budget and executive functions working with the WDA. While I do not oppose the fundamental role that the new economic powerhouse will have—especially in the development of indigenous industry—I am queasy about breaking up that powerful partnership.

My real worry about the WDA is not that it will not fulfil the tasks it has been given, but that the role it has played in inward investment—which has played a fundamental part in the regeneration of economies such as mine—will be damaged. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends can give me the reassurance I seek.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) referred to the fact that he was in at the birth of the WDA. I almost claim the right to have been in at the conception because, in 1970, Professor Phil Williams and I were trying to draft a plan to create such an agency. I am aware that there were many before that who also had ideas.

The WDA was opposed by the then Conservative Opposition when it was created. The Conservatives have seen the light since then, and they understand that bodies such as the WDA can play, and have played, a significant part in development. The creation of the WDA was fought tooth and nail by the Conservatives, who opposed it on Second and Third Reading. The Conservatives learned from experience—as, no doubt, they will learn from a similar experience regarding the National Assembly for Wales in due course. It may take a little longer, given the present generation, but time will tell.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that when there is strong debate in this place on issues such as the WDA, perhaps because there is opposition and people focus on the clauses, it produces good legislation which stands the test of time?

Mr. Wigley: In that case, the Conservatives should not have voted against Third Reading. However, I take the point. The WDA has played a significant role in Wales. I am not one of those who knock the WDA. There are shortcomings, and there is not a single body that has not make mistakes at some time. By and large, the overall benefits to Wales have been massive.

I shall now discuss amendment No. 374, in the names of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, and amendments Nos. 523, 519 and 540, which we tabled. Although there is a need for a social dimension in the Bill, I understand the arguments made by the right hon. Member for Llanelli and the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. I believe that the primary role of the Welsh Development Agency, in its new form as in its old, must be the economic regeneration of Wales. It must be about creating job opportunities throughout Wales.

Some aspects of the work of the Development Board for Rural Wales have had a social edge—we heard some examples earlier. I could quote examples such as the provision of television masts, with which the DBRW was able to help in the rural counties of mid-Wales, but for which there was no facility outside that area, so other areas could not benefit. Obviously, if the work of the DBRW is now to be included in the overall work of the new powerhouse agency, there needs to be some function to continue such provisions, in the areas where they are appropriate.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli that it is fundamental to get the economic emphasis right. What will happen if the focus of the Welsh Development Agency is shifted entirely to trying to respond to initiatives that are not strictly economic? Unless there is work for the communities living in the old towns and villages of the slate-quarrying areas of my county of Gwynedd, as in the old coal mining areas of the valleys of Glamorgan and Gwent and in east Dyfed, we shall have depopulation, an aging population and all the social and economic problems that flow from that. Therefore, the organisation must do a positive job in providing the economic base that sustains social and cultural life and the other aspects of life in those areas.

This has been a useful debate, in which valuable arguments have been made from the Conservative Front Bench. I am glad that among Conservative Members there appears to be a change of emphasis and approach to this issue. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition is giving a lead in rethinking his policy on devolution. If so, I welcome it.

I hope that when the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), replies to the debate, he will put to rest the issue of the balance between the agency's social and economic responsibilities. I hope he will tell us that the Welsh Development Agency will have primarily an economic role, and that the social role will facilitate the economic role but not take over from it. It is a question of getting the balance right.

I shall now speak to the amendments standing in my name and those of my hon. Friends. Amendment No. 523 inserts, instead of the words "or any", the words "and every". That may seem a very simple amendment. It refers to the need for economic regeneration to occur in all parts of Wales, not just in the pockets of Wales that have benefited so much recently. I shall not bore the Committee by repeating our arguments about unbalanced development in Wales. I summarise by saying that, until fairly recently, during the period of Conservative government, the Welsh Office had a strategy that accepted that 80 per cent. of new jobs coming to Wales by way of inward investment went to two small pockets—one around the M4 corridor in south-east Wales and one around the Wrexham-Deeside area in north-east Wales.

I grant that, in March 1997, a month before the general election was called, the Conservative Government had a change of mind—a deathbed conversion—and changed that distribution to 50:50. I believe that the incoming Government have changed the distribution a little more, but the pockets of severe unemployment in Wales are to a large extent outside those two catchment areas.

Development needs to take place so that there are economic opportunities and job opportunities within reasonable travelling distance of every part of Wales. I am not saying that it is possible to have equal development in every town and village—obviously, that would be nonsense—but it is reasonable to expect that there should be a fair range of job opportunities within travelling distance.

In areas such as south-west Wales, in Pembrokeshire and other parts of the old county of Dyfed, in north-west Wales—in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones)—and in other pockets, there are severe on-going levels of unemployment. The strategy is not yet meeting that challenge. Perhaps the Minister will announce some good news for some of those areas. I hope that there will be a change of emphasis in that direction.

We are seeking to alter the wording in the Bill so that the new powerhouse agency will know from the start that it is not a matter of ensuring that the overall figures for Wales look all right and forgetting the pattern throughout Wales. The agency has a responsibility towards every part of Wales—not just those lucky corners that have done so well recently. Amendment No. 519 would "promote social equity in Wales."

In undertaking its economic responsibilities, the agency must guard against the gulf that can grow between areas of severe social and economic deprivation and those that are doing very well thank you. As I have said, we must strike a balance.

Amendment No. 540 is timely. It deals with encouraging the development of Welsh exports and the interface between the Welsh Development Agency and the rest of the world. I am very much aware of the press reports this week about that issue. Yesterday's edition of the Financial Times referred to the apparent need for the Welsh Development Agency to cut expenditure and overseas staff. The report said that the agency is facing a £3 million cut in administrative costs. The Financial Times states:

"After staff costs, the area being targeted for savings is expected to be the 11 overseas offices, where the agency is believed to be considering using Invest in Britain Bureaux".

Mr. Letwin: On a point of order, Sir Alan. I may have misunderstood, but I thought that the timetabling prevented discussion at this stage of amendments that relate to lines beyond line 11. The right hon. Gentleman is discussing amendment No. 540, which relates to line 26.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) may not realise it, but he is questioning my selection of amendments. The fact is that the amendments are perfectly in order if I have selected them in this way.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful, Sir Alan. I think that the Minister wishes to contribute.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. I take this opportunity to deny specifically the Financial Times report. There is no truth whatsoever in the claim that the WDA intends to close its overseas operations, which have played an important role in encouraging investment to Wales under both this and the previous Administration.

Mr. Wigley: I am very glad to hear that. On Monday morning, I met Brian Willott, the chief executive of the Welsh Development Agency, to discuss the implications of the cut—I had heard rumours of them before the story appeared in the Financial Times. Mr. Willott was concerned about having to cut costs by £3 million. I assume that the Minister does not refute the idea that there will be a £3 million cut—it is simply a matter of where it will hit.

Mr. Hain: I do not refute the fact that the Government have asked the three quangos that will join to form the new powerhouse under the WDA to make administrative savings. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that we must have an efficient operation. There must be scope for savings among three bodies that performed similar functions, many of which were duplicated.

Mr. Wigley: I am sure that there will be scope for savings—the question is whether it will come from the overheads at the headquarters of those bodies in Cardiff and elsewhere or whether it will come from the administrative budget and undermine the WDA's activities at the sharp end. That matter concerns the agency and hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies. We want the agency to build on its established track record.

We are aware of the on-going attack on the ability of the Welsh Development Agency to attract overseas investment to Wales. There is constant sniping from certain people outside Wales whose agenda seems to be to pull down the work of the Welsh Development Agency. I realise that Wales has benefited: we have received 20 per cent. of inward investment to the United Kingdom, which is more than "our share". However, we certainly needed it. If there is a feeling in north-east England that Wales is doing particularly well, surely that area should rise to our level rather than trying to pull Wales down. This structure is helping to deliver the goods in Wales. If there are lessons to be learned about attracting inward investment to the north-east or the north-west, I wish those areas the best of luck. However, the Welsh Development Agency must not be shackled.

5.15 pm

I have read and heard of the rumblings in the Department of Trade and Industry, which—even before the advent of the new Welsh Development Agency—is trying to tie up the new super-body and establish a hold over it. That would be a severe disservice to Wales. I ask Welsh Office Ministers to provide some assurances in that regard when they respond to the discussion.

I have tabled parliamentary questions about exports. Encouraging exports is the flip side of attracting inward investment. The creation of the interface and the networks and the generation of faith in the economy that provides the exports can be significant factors in identifying and helping to develop overseas investment in Wales. Manufacturing opportunities in Wales or in other parts of the United Kingdom may be identified and products may be exported to the country of origin or to other parts of the world.

Mr. Evans: The WDA is already doing that to a great extent through "Source Wales". Those activities would be damaged if the WDA pulled back any of its people from abroad, particularly from countries such as Japan. The WDA is doing a good job, but there is a fear that indigenous Welsh companies will suffer.

Mr. Wigley: We must develop the "Source Wales" approach. There is immense untapped potential. Much good work has been done, but there is scope for more. Components imported from Japan, Taiwan and the far east that are used by companies such as LG and ACER could be made in Wales—or at least nearer the source. That would benefit the economy of the United Kingdom in general and of Wales in particular. That area must be developed. Proactive work must be undertaken in countries such as Japan, South Korea and Taiwan to achieve our objectives.

I hope that the WDA office in Tokyo is receiving the full, proactive support of our embassies and other United Kingdom organisations. We must not see the sort of infighting that sometimes occurs—the petty jealousies, the empire building and the desire to take credit for any achievements. It is true that the Welsh Development Agency has done some tremendous work, but it would be hamstrung if it were not working as part of a team. I seek the Minister's assurance that the team approach will continue and that the WDA will receive support from all United Kingdom representative bodies, whether they are embassies, the Invest in Britain Bureau or the DTI.

I received an interesting answer from the Scottish Office when I asked a question about the statutory provisions that enable it and its agencies to help firms located in Scotland to develop export markets overseas. The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office replied:

"My Department, through Scottish Trade International, a joint organisation between The Scottish Office and Scottish Enterprise, assists the delivery to Scottish-based companies of support from the Government's Overseas Trade Service, funded by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. In addition, Scottish companies benefit from export advice and assistance from Scottish Enterprise on the basis of section 1(a) of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990 and from export advice now funded by my own Department under the Industrial Development Act 1982."—[Official Report, 10 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 147.]

In other words, the Scottish Office has a positive, proactive role which will transfer to the Scottish Parliament to develop overseas trade. That is clearly beneficial.

I asked a similar question of the Welsh Office and the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath, replied on 10 February. He stated:

"Section 1 of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975 provides the necessary statutory powers for the activities of the Agency. The Agency has a number of initiatives and schemes which assist companies in Wales to develop overseas business opportunities."—[Official Report, 10 February 1998; Vol. 306, c. 156.]

The Minister said that he would arrange for me to have a letter from the chief executive of the agency and for a copy to be put in the Library. Such a letter has not come, nor has it reached the Library, but no doubt it will arrive some time.

From comparing those two answers, I get the strong impression that the role of the Scottish Office has been considerably more advanced than the role of the Welsh Office in developing that trade aspect, and that that is beneficial to Scotland's attempt to attract inward investment. The best of luck to Scotland—I do not begrudge it. The Scottish Office is going out and doing the job. On three occasions during the past two years, I happened to be in places overseas where Scottish Office Ministers had just been, trying to draw in investment. That has helped to create the networks that Scotland needs to attract inward investment.

We need that same proactive approach. Bodies such as the Department of Trade and Industry and Invest in Britain must understand that our agenda is to achieve as advanced a model as the one from which Scotland benefits, not to be reined in because of the agenda that the DTI seems to have.

If the Welsh Development Agency and its successor body are to do the job that we need, they will need resources. I hope that the Under-Secretary will respond to the points made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and the right hon. Member for Llanelli about the need for resources to deliver the objectives.

In recent months, we have seen the danger of large-scale projects such as LG, which of course is valuable and worth having in its own right, swallowing up the available resources; resources are not available for other parts of Wales where, by now, there is an even greater need for economic stimulation and job creation. If the new body is to have a chance of attacking the agenda that awaits it, it needs those resources. I hope that some assurance will be given that, although we read in the Financial Times about cuts in resources, adequate resources will be made available.

Finally, as this is our debate about the WDA, I hope that there will be some clarification of the appointment of people who will take over the responsibilities in the new super-body, and what will happen with regard to the senior jobs in the new structure. There is great uncertainty in all the bodies. People in post want to know where they stand. Will they be appointed by existing bodies, or can the appointments be made only after the new body has come into existence? I realise that that is tangential to the debate, but it all comes together in our amendments. We need a structure in place to develop exports and promote balanced development throughout Wales.

The Chairman: Order. I remind the Committee that this is not the only debate about the Welsh Development Agency. There are several groups of amendments that relate to it.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Taken as a whole, the amendments in this group relate to the question of how social, as well as economic, the Welsh Development Agency cum economic powerhouse should be, after the merger with the Land Authority for Wales and the Development Board for Rural Wales.

I shall not reminisce about the period in the mid-1970s, almost a quarter of a century ago, when the three agencies were set up under the previous Labour Government, because obviously I was not there, unlike my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), but I recall the period. The curious fact about our debate today about a three-way merger and the terms on which it should take place is that that was also true at the setting up of the WDA.

The WDA was a merger of the derelict land unit, the Welsh Industrial Estates Corporation, which built the factories, and the Development Corporation for Wales, which was the punter-hunter for the body that marketed Wales in England and the rest of the world. It tried to draw companies in to occupy the factories that would be built by the Welsh Industrial Estates Corporation, sometimes on cleared land that used to be covered in slag heaps from the coal mines.

In that three-way merger, probably the same consideration of priorities took place that we are undertaking in debating the amendments. We should not expect the functions of a body on day one of a merger to remain the same over the next quarter of a century. Clearly, the priorities will change. When the original merger took place, one of the main priorities back then would have been to clear the slag heaps. It was not all that long after the Aberfan disaster, and people were still conscious of it from eight years previously.

People saw that as a high priority for two reasons: first, it released land; and, secondly, it improved the environment and made the environment in the valleys of north-east Wales and especially in industrial south Wales more attractive to industrialists. Accordingly, factories were built on the cleared land, and the parts that could not be made flat enough on which to build factories were landscaped.

Rather than discussing how social the Welsh Development Agency cum economic powerhouse should be, at that time we would have been discussing how environmental it should be, and to what extent it should be allowed to dilute—

Mr. Denzil Davies: That is made perfectly clear in the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975. One of the four purposes set out in the Act is "to further the improvement of the environment in Wales".

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

That means clearing the slag heaps. Another purpose is "to further the economic development of Wales".

Mr. Morgan: That is precisely my point. The question was how environmental the WDA should be. The question now is whether the social aspect dilutes that function. That was the point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. In other words, if functions are added to an economic development agency, is its focus diluted?

There was great criticism of the environmental aspects of the early WDA. [Interruption.] My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli denies that, but I can tell him that it is true. I wrote an article on the subject. My right hon. Friend is not the whole of the human race and he may not remember that, so he should not rush to denials too quickly. He may not remember my article in the Western Mail, but that is his problem, not mine.

The issue is the same: is the focus of an economic development agency diluted when functions are added to it? Is it better for the agency to concentrate solely on economic agencies, and for other agencies to specialise in other functions? Are merged functions a good idea, because they would help along the general process of improving the wealth and prosperity of the Welsh nation? Should that be done by several agencies, or by a merger of three agencies, as we did when we set up the WDA in the mid-1970s and as we are doing now?

The issue is complicated by the fact that one of the predecessor agencies had a social function. For the DBRW, the main problem was not unemployment, but depopulation. Unemployment was quite low, but the young people would not stay because they had none of the facilities of town life. The DBRW thought that, with more social development, people would not mind staying in the area. People did not want to stay on the farms and little villages.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that exactly the same problem persists, particularly in areas such as mid-Wales, and that that is one of the most powerful arguments for the proposals in hand?

Mr. Morgan: I think that the hon. Gentleman is confirming what I thought about the basis of "social". If the word is put into the Bill, will there be a dilution throughout Wales in both rural and urban areas? That point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli. Such a dilution would put pressure on the social side of the budget. If the word is not inserted—I think that that is what the Tory amendment seeks to achieve, although I did not hear the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) arguing this—and social development does not feature at all, it cannot be applied in mid-Wales, let alone urban Wales. It seems that that is the meaning of the Tory amendment. The hon. Gentleman may not wish to advance that argument but it seems that that is the meaning of the amendment.

5.30 pm

Mr. Evans: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was listening carefully enough. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) suggested that we could either demarcate the rural areas that now receive social development aid to ensure that they, and only they, continue to receive it, rather than places such as Swansea, Port Talbot or Neath, which would have arguments to advance for social development, or devolve down to the local authorities. Both suggestions could be carefully considered.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. Gentleman is saying that he was speaking in defence of the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli. I was saying that the hon. Gentleman was not speaking to the Conservative amendment, which would remove the ability of the economic powerhouse or super-agency even to continue what the three predecessor agencies are now able to do, especially the Development Board for Rural Wales, in promoting social development in mid-Wales.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with whether the addition of the words "and social" will allow the merged agency to continue what the DBRW does now in mid-Wales and with whether the intention is to extend the social development function to rural areas of Wales that are not in mid-Wales. Finally, is it intended that there should be social development in any part of Wales, be it urban, non-mid-Wales rural or a continuation of the area of mid-Wales?

Mr. Denzil Davies: There is no question of intent; we are dealing with what the legislation will provide. Social development will cover the whole of Wales. It will not be restricted to Powys or rural areas generally. It is not a matter of intent. Perhaps my hon. Friend will read the proposed legislation.

Mr. Morgan: I do not know why my right hon. Friend thinks that I do not understand that. Perhaps the issue is whether ministerial replies have any purpose. I am saying that ministerial replies have a function in the proceedings of the House of Commons. That being so, there is some purpose in asking the Minister to explain what the clause is intended to mean in terms of the operation and budgeting of the agency and what the merged agency will be told to do, for as long as he has any influence over it. My hon. Friend will be aware of the influence of judicial reviews in grey areas. We know that what Ministers say at the Dispatch Box counts in grey areas. That is why I am asking the Minister to perform the usual function that Ministers undertake when they reply to debates in Parliament.

It is obvious from the way in which the Bill is structured that we are terminating, through the legislative structure of the Bill, the DBRW and the Land Authority for Wales. We are making the WDA the taking-over body, legislatively, of the other two agencies to which I referred. This may be a merger in the minds of Ministers, but legislatively there will be a takeover. That is clear from the structure of the Bill.

The issue is whether we should try to buy off the possible opposition of those who work in or are served by, in the case of mid-Wales, the DBRW, including those who have a particular interest in urban regeneration and land development, by saying, "Do not worry. As we are making the WDA the superior agency, we shall try to curry some favour with you by doing something for you in the wording of what will be an Act—for example, adding the words 'and social'—so that it is clear that the DBRW will have a continuing influence even though its legal being has been terminated."

The same process is occurring with staffing levels. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already said that the chairman of the WDA will be the successor chairman, and that the chief executive will be the successor chief executive. Including the words "and social" could be seen as the quid pro quo for these two processes. Even this is being said, "The WDA can take over the other two bodies and we shall be the superior body, but we shall draw back from some of the activities of the WDA that the DBRW never undertook, including inward investment from abroad by having offices abroad." The international division of the WDA feels very much under threat precisely because of that quid pro quo.

We have the words "and social"; a parallel in terms of the staffing structure is that the WDA gets the chairman and the chief executive. At the same time, the DBRW-type attitude that business services are important while inward investment is not so important will be reflected in the staffing structure. That is an alarming prospect. The parallel structure to what is proposed in the amendments will gnaw away at the international division and the overseas representation of the WDA.

The WDA is already the smallest of the bodies that serve the British Isles through overseas representation. The development authority for Northern Ireland has 57 people working abroad. The Locate in Scotland office has 37, the Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board has 33 while the WDA has 25 from 1 April. Perhaps these words are being used, "We know that the WDA will have the chairman and the chief executive, but do not worry. There will be a lot of DBRW and LAW influence below that level. We are showing you that by shrinking the international division. The DBRW was never so involved in mid-Wales because the WDA always acted for you. The styling of the agency is to withdraw from some of the overseas markets and no longer to have a presence abroad." That would be a tragedy.

The parallel that can be drawn from the amendments is a structure that will work away at staffing levels. Given the staffing structure being devised in the merged arrangements and the announcement that was made a few days ago about the chairman and the chief executive, we shall have not an economic powerhouse but an economic power mouse. There will no longer be the ability to draw in firms from abroad. The pass will have been sold. In effect, it will be said, "The WDA can have the top jobs, but after that we shall start drawing in the horns of the old WDA function because it was expensive. There were offices in Seoul, Tokyo, north America and elsewhere. If we pull out of that, the Invest in Britain Bureau in London will be very happy, as will the Department of Trade and Industry. We shall pull out of all that."

That having been done, the WDA will not be an entirely dominated organisation in future, because it will not involve excessive resources and savings of £3 million will be achieved, at least partly by pulling out from some of the admittedly expensive offices abroad. However, if the WDA is already the smallest of the big four organisations that represent the parts of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales—and is already operating at a level that barely amounts to a critical mass in most of the key markets for inward investment, there will be difficulties. If there were a cut while trying to maintain a share, which the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was talking about—cutting a body with only 25 staff abroad to 15, for example—the agency would not be viable. There would then be pressure from the IBB to wind the whole thing up because it would not be worth running.

Mr. Livsey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman to allow me to intervene, because it seems that I shall not be able to make a speech during the debate. I apologise for being absent earlier. Some Territorial Army units in my constituency are under threat and I had to leave the Chamber on that account.

The news yesterday was that the international division of the WDA might be cut by four people while the DBRW might be cut by 60. If that is true, the social development and business connect functions of the DBRW are under threat. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that these cuts will not take place as a result of amalgamating and restructuring the WDA into a powerhouse.

Mr. Morgan: If what the hon. Gentleman is saying is true, we want to know from the Minister from where the savings of £3 million will come. Will each part share the cuts and misery proportionately so that ex-DBRW parts are subject to a cut, along with the WDA and its international division? Will it be proportional? The suspicion is that the international division will be subject to the biggest cut and may, as a result, fall below the level of a critical mass in overseas matters.

Mr. Letwin: I shall be brief, as time is pressing. My speech flows from the remarks, as has often been the case during the Bill's consideration in Committee, of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). I draw the Committee's attention to a constitutional question that arises as a result of the definition of social development.

I remind the Committee that there is something procedurally odd about what is going on in this clause, as clause 29(1) gives the Welsh assembly enormous powers to redefine, as the Secretary of State has eloquently described on other occasions, the role of the Welsh Development Agency, and, indeed, to terminate its functions entirely, if I am not mistaken. It is therefore odd that the Government have chosen to extend the WDA's role by statute of the House rather than allow the assembly to make that decision, as the assembly will be allowed to do in relation to the continuance or restriction of the WDA's function. We must therefore look at what importance will be attached to the change in the WDA's function.

Like the right hon. Gentleman, I have looked at different sources for a definition of "social development". The European literature, which will be extremely important guidance to United Kingdom courts in determining this, has a much wider definition than that suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. The transfer of functions order lists all the classes of activity that could be classed as economic.

When one sees the classes of activity that will be transferred to the assembly, it could be argued—if time permitted, I would do so—that each and every one of the remaining non-economic functions could be classed as social development. There is at least a risk—perhaps a severe one—that the WDA, if it so chose, could gradually establish a right to intervene in every area of government in which the assembly will also have a right to intervene.

[Mr. Letwin]

Section 1(6) of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975 states what the agency's powers are in relation to its scope. It says:

"The Agency shall have power to do anything"—

a remarkable statement—

"whether in Wales or elsewhere, which is calculated to facilitate the discharge of their functions . . . or is incidental or conducive to their discharge."

That is the widest definition that could be given of the powers that a body could have, given to it by statute. If the scope of power given to it by statute broadly approximates that given to the Welsh assembly, there will be two bodies in Wales—one will be reformed; the other established—both of which appear to have, within roughly the same scope, broadly unlimited powers to do broadly anything, so long as they do it procedurally in the right manner.

We must then look at where the money flows. We have, I fear, a confused picture. Perhaps the Minister can reassure us that I have misunderstood the position. I believe that, although the assembly will be responsible for the current expenditure of the WDA, under section 18(3) of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975, which does not appear to contain an order-making power that is being transferred under the transfer of functions order, the Treasury and the Secretary of State will determine the total expenditure of the WDA, because it falls to them to determine its aggregate level of external financing.

Looking some years ahead, to an assembly that is dominated by a political party or parties different from those that dominate the House and constitute the Government of the United Kingdom, we see the classic recipe for constitutional tension: an agency which can do everything which, broadly speaking, the assembly can do; which has the widest powers in relation to that scope; which is funded, at least in part, directly from the Government of the United Kingdom; and which can set itself up in opposition to the Welsh assembly.

The assembly will, of course, in part be the agency's paymaster. What a fertile field in which constitutional problems can arise, for example, if the Secretary of State of the day or the Treasury seek to use the WDA as a means of directing funding through the external financing limit powers, against the interests of its nominal paymaster—its current expenditure paymaster—and the body that is meant to be in charge of it.

I am not trying to argue that all these problems will arise at once; I am trying to argue that, by inserting the word "social", with its wide connotations—I doubt that whatever the Minister says at the end of the debate will much influence the judges in this matter—the Government will have created the ability for the two bodies to be in tension in a way that the Government, or their successors, will come to regret.

5.45 pm

Mr. Hain: I am sorry to have to reply to the debate at this point. I realise that I might have stopped some of my hon. Friends from speaking, for which I apologise.

Amendments Nos. 374 and 493 would mean that the social development powers of the Development Board for Rural Wales were lost with the abolition of the board. That is the important point. The White Paper "A Voice for Wales" set out the Government's plan to consolidate the functions of the DBRW and the Land Authority for Wales into the WDA, to provide a unified and comprehensive range of services for the whole of Wales. Indeed, that is done at local authority level, where regeneration plans reflect a comprehensive approach, involving economic, social and environmental development.

In the past, the DBRW has made effective use of its social powers to contribute to the development of rural communities, complementing the role of local authorities—for example, a £25,000 project in Ceredigion to convert a warehouse into a sports centre. Other instances include support for jazz and music festivals, opera performances and youth clubs.

The Bill clearly establishes the powers of the new agency to be a full and effective partner in economic and social development schemes all over Wales. Obviously, the way in which this power is used in the future will be subject to the wishes and guidance of the assembly, but these amendments would deny any prospect of progress in that direction.

I shall respond specifically to the typical probing and forensic points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). He raised legitimate points, in contrast to the somewhat legalistic points of the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). I would not for a moment accuse the hon. Gentleman of misunderstanding the Bill, but he missed its point entirely and sought to confuse it in an argument—one that is fundamental to the Conservatives' opposition to the Bill—about tension between Westminster, which sets the funds for the assembly, and the assembly, which would control the new WDA powerhouse agency.

The social activities envisaged are pretty small-scale. I gave examples a moment ago. They would not threaten the overwhelming industrial and economic focus for the activities of the powerhouse. The new WDA will, of course, be accountable to the assembly. Its programmes, including social development, will therefore be subject to scrutiny by the assembly under section 1(14) of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975. No Treasury consent will be required. If there were any question about the activity of the powerhouse veering too much, say, in a social direction, the assembly would be able to call it to account. It would scrutinise that and deal with any problems that arose.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli and my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asked about the definition of the term "industrial" and the balance between business and industry. We propose to substitute the term "business" or "businesses" for "industry" or "industrial", which is used in the Welsh Development Agency Act. We have made that change simply to use a more up-to-date expression which better captures the nature of the modern Welsh economy.

I note that my right hon. Friend accepted that that change was fine, but he made some specific points, to which I shall come later. The change does not imply that the term "industry" provides too narrow a definition of the type of body that could be supported under the Welsh Development Agency Act or any other legislation.

With regard to my right hon. Friend's point about profit, the definition in the Bill, in particular in paragraph 10 of schedule 10, is really to ensure that there is no attempt to exclude, for example, co-operatives. The intention was to make the WDA's remit as wide as possible. Other examples might be a business conducted by a charitable trust on a break-even basis, or a village shop run by a local community. Therefore, there is not a great deal to be concerned about, although my right hon. Friend was right to press us on that.

Mr. Evans: Why does the definition of "business" also include public bodies? Does not that mean that even the Welsh Office could apply for grants for, for example, business efficiency? Why is the definition so broad as to include public bodies?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman should read the Bill carefully.

Mr. Jenkin: Answer the question.

Mr. Hain: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to do so, I shall answer the question.

The definition in schedule 10 is clear. It rightly gives the new WDA extremely wide powers. Unlike the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), we do not want to shackle it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about service. I agree that the heart of any successful economic strategy for revitalising the Welsh economy must focus on manufacturing and industry. That has been terribly neglected in the past couple of decades—a point on which we have often agreed, and I continue to do so. I think that my hon. Friend claims that the birth of manufacturing took place in Dowlais, and he may have a point there.

It is important that service industries are included. For example, a call centre might well be classed as a service business rather than a manufacturing industry, self-evidently. I agree that manufacturing must be given priority, both in terms of inward investment and indigenous investment, which has particularly been neglected in the past 18 years.

Mr. Rowlands: In the past, when motor vehicle repair businesses or garages applied for some support from the WDA, it said that that was not a service sector which it should support. In the changes that have been made, would it now be included in the responsibilities of the WDA?

Mr. Hain: It is quite possible that it would be. The broad remit for the powerhouse would reflect that. It is an attempt not to shackle it, but to empower it, so that it can conduct the necessary economic support activity.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) raised some pertinent points, for which I thank him. I emphasise that the balance must be in favour of economic, industrial and business activity. We have set specific targets to shift investment westward. It is difficult, but we are determined to continue with that.

As to the wish to make it a function of the agency to promote social equity in Wales, I remind the Committee that, for the first time, the Bill empowers the agency to address social development. Social equity is better achieved by a cohesive partnership between public and private bodies involved in service provision. That means not just the agency but the assembly, local authorities, the voluntary sector and many other bodies. I am sure that the social development powers of the Development Board for Rural Wales, which the Bill will transfer to the agency, will help it to contribute to the effort. Amendments Nos. 374 and 493 would prevent that transfer.

Mr. Letwin: If the Minister is admitting that social equity could be included within social development, can he name any activity that would devolve to the Welsh assembly which might not be considered as falling within the remit of the WDA?

Mr. Denzil Davies: Not many.

Mr. Hain: That is probably true. We intend to create a powerful agency.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley made an important and legitimate point—for a change—about whether the assembly would be meddling in the WDA's activities. The answer is no. The assembly will set clear targets for the new powerhouse. It will monitor it and hold it accountable for delivering the strategy which it determines as an assembly. But decisions on day-to-day matters, such as inward investment and the level of grants in attracting inward investment, would be made by the powerhouse, not by some Committee of the assembly.

I am aware of the interest of the right hon. Member for Caernarfon in the comparative arrangements for export promotion and development in Scotland and Wales. He made some important points. I am pleased to reassure him that the existing WDA legislation provides the necessary powers for it to undertake export promotion activities, so his amendment is not necessary.

At the moment, the Welsh Office is the main provider of export and advice services throughout Wales, while the services provided by the WDA are often sector specific. Other bodies, such as the chambers of commerce, training and enterprise councils and export associations, have been working with the Welsh Office to review and improve services to help small and medium enterprises in Wales to export more. We will bear the right hon. Gentleman's points in mind.

I also listened with care to the right hon. Gentleman's points about the WDA's vital international role, and his Scottish point, which we note with interest. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that there will be no Whitehall veto over his powers in respect of financial arrangements and so on, and therefore over the assembly's powers with regard to inward investment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked whether there would be a Welsh energy policy. The power to give consents for power station development will still reside with the Department of Trade and Industry, but the WDA will obviously have an interest, as it has at the moment in promoting the power station development at Baglan.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry, but I have only a couple of minutes left.

[Mr. Hain]

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) that I deny emphatically that there is any attempt to run down the international activity of the WDA. I owe my hon. Friend a letter on that point, and I shall write to him addressing the points that he raised.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked for the resignations of all 27 members of the three quangos which are to be merged to form the economic powerhouse for Wales—the WDA, the DBRW and the Land Authority for Wales. They will stand down this autumn, when the new body is created and a new body is appointed. We shall shortly advertise those appointments, and, in addition to new candidates, I have no doubt that many of the existing members who have given dedicated service to Wales will wish to put their names forward.

We are determined that all other board members of the new powerhouse will be appointed in the same fair and open way as the chair of S4C. The new board will not be open to accusations of cronyism; nor will any other appointments made in the new Wales. People are looking to Wales to give a lead in establishing new, more open and accountable ways of managing public bodies and the Government are giving the lead. We are making a clean break from the old, scandal-ridden quango state, and I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends not to press the amendments.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend the Minister made it clear that the Government have no intention of shackling the WDA, and that the purpose of the changes was not to do so. There will thus be a considerable extension of the WDA's powers.

I realise that I will not get an answer now, but may I ask my hon. Friend rhetorically whether the money will still be shackled? If the powers are to be unshackled, will the moneys be similar in quantum to the current powers?

Mr. Hain rose—

Mr. Davies: I am sorry, but I shall not give way to my hon. Friend. I have one minute, and I intend to use it. I am sure that he wants me to withdraw the amendment when the time comes.

Let us have extra powers for social development, but let us also have the extra money that goes with it.

Mr. Hain indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is nodding, so I presume that the Secretary of State will go to the Treasury and say that we want more powers.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

6 pm

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I beg to move amendment No. 517, in page 56, line 11, leave out from 'Wales' to first 'and' and insert

'leave out "economic" and insert "sustainable economic, environmental".'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Barry Jones): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 518, in page 56, line 13, at end insert—

'(c) after paragraph (d) insert—

"(e) to promote the environmental sustainability of economic activity in Wales; and".'.

No. 522, in page 56, line 26, at end insert—

'(3A) After subsection (4) there shall be inserted—

"(4A) In allocating its resources and setting its priorities, the Agency shall have regard to the need for sustainable economic development throughout the whole of Wales.".'.

Government new clause 38—Sustainable development.

New clause 18—Principle of sustainable development—

'(1) The Assembly shall make appropriate arrangements with a view to securing that its functions are exercised with due regard to the principle that there should be economic and social development which is environmentally sustainable.

(2) The arrangements referred to in subsection (1) shall include an annual review of the implications for Wales of any relevant quantitative targets for the United Kingdom set by Parliament or by Ministers of the Crown.

(3) After each financial year of the Assembly, the Assembly shall publish a report containing—

(a) a statement of the arrangements made in pursuance of subsection (2) which had effect during the financial year, and

(b) an assessment of how effective those arrangements were in promoting sustainable development.'.

New clause 37—WDA board member to have responsibility for sustainable development—

'.—Section 2 of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975 shall be amended by inserting the following subsection—

"(3A) One member of the Agency shall be responsible for monitoring progress on the sustainable development aspects of the Agency's work.".'.

Mr. Dafis: I welcome the opportunity to debate at last, after several attempts, sustainable development. There is hardly a more important topic in considering a national future for Wales and the roles of the national assembly and the new development agency.

Some of the amendments and new clauses in this group apply to the assembly and others apply to the development agency, but none applies to both. We welcome the Government's long-awaited new clause 38, which applies to the assembly but not to the development agency. Inserting that new clause in the Bill may mean that our national assembly will be the first national legislative body to have a statutory duty to consider sustainable development. That is welcome and, if it is taken seriously, it could be highly significant for the future of Wales. We strongly believe that both the assembly and the development agency should be subject to such a duty, and I shall explain why later.

Amendment No. 517 inserts the words, "sustainable economic, environmental" in place of the word "economic" in relation to the WDA's functions. Amendment No. 518 would add the words:

"to promote the environmental sustainability of economic activity in Wales" in line 13. Amendment No. 522 refers to the need to allocate resources and set priorities for the agency, and says that those

"shall have regard to the need for sustainable economic development throughout the whole of Wales."

The concept of the "whole of Wales" has already been discussed and I am sure that it will be discussed under the next group of amendments when we consider rural policy.

New clause 37, which I like to think is ingenious, would require one member of the agency's board to be responsible for monitoring the progress of the sustainable development aspect of the agency's role. Just as some organisations have a sustainable development unit, it would be useful to have one person on the board with the job of monitoring progress.

New clause 18 concerns the assembly and would have a similar effect to the Government's new clause. By the way, a small error appears in new clause 18, subsection (3)(a), in which reference should be made to subsection (1) rather than subsection (2).

Sustainable development is not just environmental protection, important though that is. It is certainly not just preservation, which has its place. Nor is it about keeping matters as they are. It is about making improvements in efficiency, prosperity and people's quality of life in a way that sustains and strengthens the natural environment and social equity. The concept of social equity was discussed briefly under the last group of amendments. I shall not spend too much time on it, but it might be worth bearing in mind the development advocated by David Adamson of the university of Glamorgan as part of the process of economic regeneration. He advocates taking hold of an area where there is social deprivation, helping the people to acquire skills, empowering them to use fashionable terms, and bringing about economic regeneration from the bottom up as well as from the top down. That example of using an agency's powers for social purposes is functional in relation to economic development. It is also an aspect of sustainable development.

Thus, sustainable development means integrating—that is the important word—environmental and social equity considerations into all aspects of policy. Implementing sustainable development means identifying and then actively pursuing opportunities for development that bring those three elements together. It is not possible for the Welsh Development Agency or the assembly to pursue only sustainable development. We live in a world where a great deal of development is unsustainable. That may come to an end at some stage, but if one is committed to sustainable development, one is always looking out for opportunities that bring those three elements together. It is not always easy, but the scope is great and it will become greater as policies change at all levels: global, European, British and Welsh.

I am confident that the national assembly will meet as sustainable development rises to the top of the political and economic agenda. Achieving the transition to sustainable development will be the dominant theme of the new century. We are all caught up in that global process to a greater or lesser extent. The latest phase is the Kyoto agreement on greenhouse gas emissions. The process extends from the global to the local level through the Agenda 21 process.

We have a serious opportunity to put Wales at the forefront of that transition to sustainable development, just as Wales was at the forefront of the transition to industrialism 200 years ago, when our resources of energy were a crucial consideration. The assembly therefore has every reason to adopt sustainable development as a central theme for Wales. Until now, there has been a significant failure in Welsh Office policy in that regard. In 1993, the Government published their first sustainable development strategy and established an advisory panel on sustainable development, chaired by Sir Crispin Tickell. It established a useful round table, which has been meeting regularly and proposing policy recommendations. Both those bodies have done useful work.

On the day in February when that launch occurred, the Scottish Office, when Ian Lang was Secretary of State for Scotland, set up an advisory panel on sustainable development and a sustainable development unit within the Scottish Office. I am told that both do useful work within the Scottish Office. That did not happen in Wales. The then Secretary of State for Wales refused to do that, and opportunities have been lost as a result. No working group was set up and the previous Administration rejected my request in a debate in this House, and requests from others, to establish such a process. We have had nothing of that seriousness in Wales.

Consultations on the Government's new sustainable development strategy document, "Opportunities for Change", which was published a fortnight ago, will be completed by the end of the year. That process must be used to develop a distinctive Welsh agenda on this subject: it should not be an appendix or a pale imitation of what is happening in England or throughout the United Kingdom.

If the Government have ideas that are ready for implementation and that will put Wales at the forefront, the assembly will hit the ground running when it meets in the summer of next year. A distinctive agenda could be part of the brand image of Wales and establish Wales's reputation in Europe and the world. How will the Secretary of State use the consultation process for such purposes?

The energy sector is relevant to sustainable development. Wales has major sustainable and renewable energy resources. The Government are committed to generating 10 per cent. of electricity from renewable resources by 2010. That would enable us to develop diversity and security of supply at competitive prices.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I am following closely the hon. Gentleman's argument about energy and sustainable development. Does he agree that nuclear power stations do not transgress the principles of sustainable development?

Mr. Dafis: No, I do not. Some people suggest that nuclear energy enables us to meet CO_2 emission targets because carbon is not used. However, it is unsustainable because of problems with decommissioning nuclear power stations and disposing of wastes. There is a debate on the issue. My view is that substituting nuclear for fossil fuel-based energy is not sustainable, but other options are.

Sustainable or renewable energy involves a dispersed and decentralised pattern of production and offers significant wealth creation and job opportunities in rural areas. Many of those opportunities are frustrated by the nature of the debate on renewable energy in Wales. The assembly and the agency should ensure that we have a more sophisticated understanding and a more intelligent debate. Wales could take a lead. The debate is not just about renewable energy. Offshore oil and gas resources will not be subject to decisions of the assembly, but it should influence the way and degree to which they are exploited.

[Mr. Dafis]

Environmental technology—pollution control, emission measurement, end-of-pipe technologies and alternative clean production systems—is an expanding industrial sector that is set to overtake the chemical industry at the global level by the end of this century. The WDA should target this key sector for inward investment. There will be important opportunities in forestry and agriculture and the Secretary of State's initiative on the all-Wales agri-environmental scheme will be helpful.

Sustainable tourism—which is the right sort—and links with economic activities such as farming should be encouraged, and sustainable agricultural areas and woodlands could be a focus for tourism. Sustainability is a pervasive theme that will be terribly important in the planning process. The planning process should actively facilitate rather than frustrate renewable energy projects. Sustainability should be prominent across the curriculum at all levels of education and a key factor in research. Organisations such as the Institute for Grassland and Environmental Research are involved and universities in particular are doing good work and could do more.

Mr. Rowlands: Wind farms are contentious in certain communities. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the right to object should be reduced to make planning more positive and proactive? What is he suggesting in that respect?

Mr. Dafis: I am suggesting that the planning process should be part of an all-Wales strategy. There should be targets for electricity produced from wind power, and that might lead to a search for, and designation of, appropriate sites. I do not favour removing the right to object—that would be dictatorial—but the planning process can be used positively. Planners must understand the significance of a scheme when they make their decision. I believe that many planners are not sufficiently well informed.

Mr. Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that acrimony arises in local communities over issues such as wind farms precisely because of the absence of a sustainable energy development strategy? If there were such a strategy, perhaps wind farms would not be built piecemeal and communities would not be upset.

Mr. Dafis: I do not want to get into a protracted argument about wind farms.

The Temporary Chairman: Please do not.

Mr. Dafis: If we are to have a sustainable development strategy for Wales, we must also have a sustainable energy strategy.

The assembly will have transport responsibilities. Wales needs an integrated transport policy to reduce road traffic. As the Government are committed to achieving a reduction in road traffic, how will the assembly develop such a policy? The Welsh road and rail network was conceived outside Wales. It is peripheral to the English network—no wonder we have poor north-south links. A sustainable communications policy must contain the right mix of transport modes—road, rail and air—which the Welsh Office has been promoting recently.

Getting investment priorities right will be difficult because the assembly will no more be responsible for rail than is the Secretary of State. There is a clear case for further devolution. The assembly will have to co-operate closely with the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising, the franchising authority. Opraf should be in that list of bodies, set out in schedule 4, that the assembly can require to attend its meetings. I hope that the Minister will consider tabling an amendment to bring that about. The successor body to Opraf—the strategic railway authority—will subsume the franchising functions.

Electronics play a crucial role in communication policy, enabling communication without physical movement, rendering distance irrelevant and reducing the need for road traffic.

Sustainable development is about opportunities, and opportunities for all parts of Wales. It is about industrial areas just as much as rural areas. We shall discuss rural policy later, but it is worth noting that Professor Gareth Wyn Jones, an expert on the subject, suggests that "a comprehensive strategy for the sustainable use of renewable natural resources in rural Wales could create about 10,000 new jobs".

Given the multiplier effect, the professor reckons that as many as 14,000 jobs could be created.

That is just one reason why I consider it essential for sustainable development to be a duty for the new WDA, not just for the assembly. A revamped WDA will, after all, be up and running before the assembly meets, and sustainable development should be one of its key considerations from the outset—it has not been one in the past. The agency needs to build a sustainable development culture. It needs to get its head around the philosophy and the principles of sustainable development, and it needs to develop expertise.

The Welsh Development Agency Act 1975, which the Bill amends, refers to the environment, but the wording shows that the agency's environmental functions are seen separately from its other functions. It has tended to interpret the Act's provisions in aesthetic rather than deep sustainability terms. After all, the Act predates Brundtland, Rio and the process that has resulted from all that.

I understand that sustainable development is to be a duty of the English regional development agencies. That is in the Bill, and I want to know why the same does not apply to the WDA. May I also ask whether the Secretary of State has received any representations from the WDA opposing the duty of sustainable development? It should be at the heart of the agency's responsibilities, not at the fringe. It should not be an add-on, as it has tended to be in the past. The agency should be able to explore the environmental implications of development at an early stage, in order to avoid many of the damaging, costly conflicts that can develop during the process of pursuing a particular kind of development.

The subject is linked to the question of land use planning. I hope that the Secretary of State can assure us that the assembly will have the power to produce strategic planning guidance for Wales, which would help the agency—for instance, in relation to the location of inward investment projects. It would be stimulated, or indeed required, to locate inward investment projects, and other development projects, on previously developed land—what the Deputy Prime Minister now calls recycled land; it used to be called brown-field sites. In that way, we could integrate land use in industrial development. The use of such areas, rather than green-field sites, should be preferred, if not exclusive.

We have a major opportunity to make sustainable development a defining theme for Wales and its assembly. I hope that I have shown how important it is that the WDA, as well as the assembly, has a duty to bring about such development.

Would the Secretary of State consider strengthening the wording of new clause 38 at a later stage? It uses the word "promoted", but it has been suggested to me that we should instead refer to the "achievement" of sustainable development, as other legislation does. For example, the Environment Agency has a responsibility to bring about—or aim to bring about—the achievement of sustainable development. It is a small point, but that duty should be seen as really important, and there should be no way of avoiding its implications. However, I admit that some of our amendments also refer to "promoting".

I look forward to hearing from the Secretary of State, and from other hon. Members.

Mr. Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): I intend to make only a short speech, based on my personal experience of the area that I come from in north Wales.

I welcome new clause 38, which recognises the importance of sustainable development. If the Welsh assembly adopts a strong sustainable development policy, we shall lead the way in the United Kingdom on the issue. Sustainable development is important in all areas of Wales, but especially in areas that depend on the environment for employment. In my constituency, the towns of Rhyl and Prestatyn developed, grew and prospered because of their location and their seaside environment. As well as its coastal environment, however, my constituency is blessed with an area of outstanding natural beauty, which straddles the Clwydian range and sweeps down into the vales of Clwyd and Elwyn.

Unsustainable economic development has had a devastating effect on all parts of Wales. The whole north Wales coast has suffered from environmental degradation caused by past Governments, councils and industries that have used the environment as a cheap means of disposal. There has been a knock-on effect for subsequent generations—including this one—and on today's environment and economy.

Let me give an example drawn from my own constituency in the 1960s. Rhyl urban district council decided to use a 60-acre salt marsh on the River Clwyd—one of only three north-facing rivers in north Wales—as a rubbish dump. It was seen as a cheap option. Domestic and industrial waste was taken across north Wales and dumped on that haven for wildlife. No record was kept of the rubbish that was dumped there over a 20 or 25-year period, and no one knows to this day what was dumped. It is a chemical time bomb. The rubbish was piled 40 ft high, and bulldozed over with a metre of topsoil. The land is now so polluted that it cannot be used for housing or industrial purposes. Methane is bled out of the rubbish tip by valves, and rain water washes out leachates into the surrounding mud banks and into the Irish sea. The land has been polluted for over a generation, and will probably be polluted for many generations to come.

That is just one example. I could give many others. There is the dumping of sewage into rivers and the Irish sea; the dumping of radioactive waste from Sellafield into the Irish sea; chemical and industrial dumping along the River Mersey; the dumping of armaments, including chemical weapons, into the Irish sea over the past 50 years; and the cleansing of ships' tanks in Liverpool bay. A Welsh assembly armed with a sustainable development policy will drastically reduce the possibilities of such environmental degradation in the future.

I am pleased that the implementation of the new clause will not be delegated to a committee or an individual. I am glad that the sustainable development policy will be monitored and updated regularly, and I am also glad that the assembly will consult appropriate bodies before making, remaking or revising the scheme. I hope that the assembly will consult widely and listen carefully to the expert advice that it is given, in order to draw up a policy that will learn the lessons of the past and serve this and future generations.

Mr. Evans: I support new clause 38. I hope that the Secretary of State will not fall off his seat when he hears me say that. [Laughter.] Even I do not believe what I am saying. I think that the new clause is a sensible way of approaching an issue that is vital not only to all of us, but to future generations. That is what sustainable development is all about. It involves thinking about present and future generations.

Everybody is "green" nowadays and it will be interesting to see whether the Secretary of State chooses a green-field site, or recycles city hall or the guild hall in Swansea for the assembly. I understand that there will shortly be an announcement about how green he intends to be on its siting. I am told that Ministers are giving up cars and walking. As Gwydyr house is not far from here, I expect that the Secretary of State is doing that. Perhaps his car follows him carrying his red box or perhaps he carries it himself.

Mr. Dafis: The hon. Gentleman speaks about the assembly building. I hope that he and the Secretary of State agree that it presents an opportunity for energy efficiency. It may produce some of its electricity by means of new technology such as photovoltaics, and it is important that it should be accessible by public transport.

6.30 pm

Mr. Evans: I am sure that if the hot air from the Chamber was recycled, it would heat the Palace of Westminster and some other buildings. The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, and if the Secretary of State chooses a green-field site for the development, it will be necessary to examine the project at the planning stage. That is the best way to ensure energy efficiency, and I hope that that will be taken into account.

We are building on Agenda 21 and the second Earth summit, which was preceded by the Rio summit in 1992. New clause 38(6) refers to a yearly account to show exactly how the assembly has implemented its proposals, and that will enable people to measure how seriously the assembly takes sustainability. I hope that the partnership council's discussions with local authorities will give direction and a fresh impetus to an all-Wales strategy. The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) spoke about that. It will also enable people to see how local authorities are fulfilling their agendas.

Mr. Ron Davies: The hon. Gentleman mentions an interesting concept. Perhaps he will explain why he and his colleagues voted against the partnership council.

Mr. Evans: We voted against it because we thought that it would not have any teeth and that it was to meet only once a year. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I spoke about it meeting perhaps eight times a year. I hope that the other place can look again at the partnership council and give it some real teeth. There should be proper discussion between local authorities and Members of the Assembly on matters such as sustainable development. One of the assembly Committees could examine sustainability as part of its environmental remit. It must be given impetus in Wales rather than lip service.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion mentioned other areas that we should examine; one of them is traffic. I know that local authorities will look at traffic problems in their areas; we appreciate that large cities are not the only places with such problems. The assembly can offer guidance and support to local authorities on traffic management. For example, perhaps the railways could carry much of the freight that will result from new investment in Wales.

I was born in Swansea, and I suspect that if sustainability had been on our consciences in the 1960s, the Mumbles railway would still be operating in Swansea. Because of a wanton act of vandalism, that railway is no more. It is unlikely that it will be brought back, but at least its fate enables us to learn from our mistakes and discover ways in which we can protect other features in Wales for future generations. If the Mumbles railway had been retained, it would not have produced the amount of exhaust gases that are currently pumped out by cars using the Mumbles road.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion spoke about giving the WDA a bigger role. The assembly can give guidance and encourage development and new investment on brown-field sites. At the design stage of buildings for new industries, more heed could be paid to sustainability and more environmentally friendly ways of building. On energy policy, we all carefully follow planning policy guidance 22. Wind energy was mentioned, and it would be remiss of me if I did not speak about that, because Wales has suffered more than most areas from the erection of wind turbines in places where they should not be.

Mr. Dafis: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Wales enjoys a large amount of wind energy development? Such energy is clean, and involves no extraction, transport, processing, combustion or emissions. Can the hon. Gentleman think of a better way of producing electricity?

Mr. Evans: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I disagree with him on that issue. I am president of Country Guardians, and I was in touch with Ann West, who lives in Powys and has written to me today about the problem of wind energy generators in Wales. If the wind turbines are put in suitable areas in accordance with guidance that is issued by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions under PPG22, they are acceptable. If changes are proposed, I should be interested to hear about them.

The assembly could give its views on sustainable energy. The hon. Member for Ceredigion spoke about a target of 10 per cent. of renewable energy by 2010. We support that, but it could mean that an area the size of Birmingham would be covered in wind turbines. We must examine all renewable sources and concentrate not just on an inefficient one, which is the wind turbine. Hydro power is far more efficient. Future wind turbine technology may make that system more efficient, so that fewer turbines are required.

As the Minister knows, some wind turbines are 300 ft high and create noise problems. Sunshine is reflected from them into houses, and they scar the countryside because they can be seen for miles. They cannot be hidden because their purpose is to catch the wind. People who live close to large farms of wind turbines take a certain view of them. I hope that any scheme or strategy that is presented by the assembly will ensure that people can have a say about the sustainable or renewable energy that they want for the future.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion spoke about the new branding for Wales. Of course, it is a green and pleasant country. We want to ensure that it remains just like that.

The Welsh assembly has a great opportunity. I am delighted that the Government have tabled new clause 38, and I hope that the people of Wales and the assembly will grasp that opportunity.

Ms Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): I am pleased to speak in the debate, and I especially welcome the Government's new clause 38 on sustainable development. Like the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), I think that the new clause will provide an opportunity for Wales to be in the forefront of thinking, by enshrining the principle of sustainable development in legislation. We do not want the public to continue to think that it is always a matter of the environment versus the economy: we want them to realise that one is strongly linked to the other. We want also to integrate successfully economic and environmental goals with social objectives, and to safeguard the environment of Wales.

The debate on this group of amendments and new clauses—especially new clause 38—is therefore a very exciting occasion. I think that sustainable development will be at the heart of the assembly's policies, and I hope that it will be considered as a part of every action taken and policy developed by the assembly.

I have thought about the sustainable development issues that might arise in my constituency of Cardiff, North, which should be dealt with within a strategic framework. In my constituency, the town is gradually encroaching up the M4 towards the mountains, and the A470—which is probably one of the busiest roads in Wales—comes down from the valleys, surging through the Taff gorge and into the constituency, with traffic pouring down towards the centre of Cardiff.

We want a strategic plan to deal with those issues: to preserve the green belt; to maintain the gap between Cardiff and Caerphilly, and between Cardiff and Newport; to allow development in specific areas; to encourage a strong integrated public transport corridor; and to deal with issues such as transportation of radioactive waste, which is one of the big issues in my constituency. If we have an integrated strategy to deal with all those issues, we shall be able to make not only my constituency but all of Wales a much more pleasant and better place to live in.

The location of the assembly has been mentioned in the debate. I should like to say very strongly that I hope that the assembly will be located on recycled land in the centre of a city, in a recycled building and very close to good transport links—such as a five-minute walk from a major station. Only one place fits that description.

Environmental groups have raised some issues on certain aspects of new clause 38, and I should like to have the Secretary of State's reassurance on some of them. One is the use in the new clause of the phrase "with due regard". Does that mean that a duty will be placed on the assembly? Will it require the assembly to promote sustainable development? I am not accustomed to the legalistic language used in Bills, and I should therefore like the Secretary of State to clarify that point.

The new clause also does not mention any measurable targets or indicators. I therefore assume that the Secretary of State expects that the assembly will include such targets in its annual reports. Nevertheless, I should like his reassurance on the matter.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) mentioned establishing some sort of forum in which environmental groups could meet, and referred to the partnership council. Does the Secretary of State think that the assembly will establish such a forum? Does he think that establishing one should be encouraged?

The Government's new clause represents an historic occasion, putting sustainable development at the very heart of the National Assembly for Wales.

Mr. Öpik: One of the greatest things about living in Montgomeryshire is that it is such a beautiful place: unspoilt, with such a good quality of life that—[Interruption.] I shall deal in a moment with wind farms, although I am not terribly convinced that the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) was entirely feasible on the subject. [Interruption.] With the potential exception of wind farms, the view is quite nice, if one looks on misty days or in certain directions—

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Yes—towards Meirionnydd.

Mr. Öpik: I shall take the hon. Gentleman's advice and look toward Meirionnydd, and be grateful that I do not have even more wind farms than I currently have.

6.45 pm

The quality of life in Montgomeryshire is good. In the rural areas of Wales, that quality of life is determined largely by the cleanliness and rejuvenating nature of those areas. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Ceredigion that we could use an environmental theme as a branding point for Wales. In the company that I formerly worked for, Procter and Gamble—I stress that I have no vested interest in saying this—

Mr. Evans: Whiter than white.

Mr. Öpik: Yes, it has a very white image, even at today's lower temperatures. It woke up to the fact—[Interruption.] It awoke—

Mr. Ron Davies: Ignore them.

Mr. Öpik: I shall take the Secretary of State's advice and ignore the comments on Procter and Gamble, which realised that there was a marketing opportunity in being serious about the environment. The same is true for the Welsh assembly and for all of Wales.

We should remember that Wales, particularly rural Wales, is experiencing difficult times economically—it is perhaps even in a deep recession. In the past two months, we have lost almost 100 jobs in Montgomeryshire. Therefore, there is a most urgent employment and economic aspect to including environmental considerations in decision making. Perhaps we could tie in our work on the environment with job creation. However, I shall not dwell on that matter, as it diverts from the main point dealt with in this group of amendments and new clauses.

We should remember also that we are not debating sustainability simply as a nice-to-have policy: it will crucially determine our descendants' quality of life. If we do not wake up to the fact that, as a society, we must include sustainability in our strategic outlook, we shall—at the very least—bequeath serious problems to future generations, and they will have to pay dearly to clean them up.

Wales has great opportunities in many spheres such as energy, which has already been mentioned in the debate. I whole-heartedly support any suggestions that hydro-electric and solar energy should be pursued emphatically as alternative energy sources.

I must now refer to wind power, which—although it has a place—has been non-strategically implemented. In Montgomeryshire, we have had the most terrible divisions in local communities, for the simple reason that wind turbines are a form of pollution. It is incorrect to suggest that there is no social or environmental cost to covering hillsides with wind turbines. I recognise that there is benefit in having a sensitive approach to wind farm power generation, and there might be some creative solutions that offend no one—for example, coastal farms could make a substantial contribution. However, we should make it clear that a visual scar on a hillside should be regarded as every bit as damaging as some other forms of environmental pollution.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) made some good points about noise and other concerns. It may not always be possible to quantify them in financial terms, but if we are serious about sustainable energy production, we must also be serious about taking into account the more unusual consequences of investing in, for example, wind turbines. There are also some concerns about safety. I am currently holding discussions with at least one of the wind farm companies, because there was recently a fire at a wind turbine. I dwell on that point only because I do not want the Committee to be misled into thinking that there are no social or environmental consequences of wind farm generation. Having said that, I believe that it is appropriate for the Welsh assembly to consider how best to mix its energy generation solutions in the context of a green Welsh agenda.

We sometimes forget that if we could reduce the need for energy, we could adopt an even more sustainable approach. We could have greatly reduced our energy needs in the United Kingdom, as could western society as a whole, if, in the early stages of planning buildings and an integrated transport system, we had thought of the environmental consequences of what we were doing. In that sense, we should encourage the Welsh assembly in its deliberations on sustainability to adopt a formal strategy for reducing energy requirements across Wales, thereby obviating the need for quite so much energy production.

In the context of sustainability, I shall deal briefly with transport, brown-field development and agriculture. We all agree that we must create an integrated public transport system, and I applaud Ministers' comments in that regard. I must point out, as I always do when I mention transport, that there are potentially substantial environmental benefits to be gained from having an integrated air network across Wales. A well-used twin-engine commercial aircraft can use less energy getting people from north to south Wales than a car, which is probably the alternative.

It goes without saying, of course, that any such network would be guaranteed success if it used what I hope will one day be Welshpool international, or at least regional, airport. I have nothing but praise for Ministers' enlightened attitude to that proposal, which I have made many times.

We have discussed various aspects of creating a sustainable economy in the countryside. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is vital to recognise that the crisis in agriculture also presents Wales with an opportunity to invest in agri-environmental schemes, which might create not only jobs but a sustainable agri-environmental strategy. I hope that the Welsh assembly will be absolutely wedded to the idea of creating a more sustainable agricultural environment.

We might even recognise that having a sustainable environment in the countryside might not mean having the most efficient system in terms of the number of people employed on the land. We might want to increase the number involved in producing food, on the basis that that might be the most sustainable way to run the countryside.

I deal now with brown-field sites. I agree with hon. Members who have suggested developing the perhaps slightly more expensive brown-field sites rather than running to the countryside when we need new buildings and areas for industry. I must sound a word of caution, however. Our policies for sustainability have to recognise that some development on green-field sites is necessary. We have to strike a careful balance between the need for rural housing and the necessity of not giving in to the temptation to build on green-field sites when brown-field sites are available.

Finally, I shall cite a rather persuasive document provided by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. It states that sustainable development

"means pursuing those options for development which maximise the benefits for present and future generations."

It goes on to mention the quality of life, an integrated approach and landscape improvement. All those things underline the importance of taking account of the big picture. We must think of the environment not as a separate issue, but as one which should affect all the work of the assembly.

New clause 38 will greatly improve the Bill. Proposed subsection (6) states:

"After each financial year of the Assembly, the Assembly shall publish a report of how its proposals as set out in the scheme were implemented in that financial year."

They are perhaps the most important words that we are debating. I should like to think that they are our insurance policy, to ensure that the Bill's provisions do not simply end up as more rhetoric about the environment, but are implemented.

The future will be our judge, but we have a great deal to be responsible for at this point. We must ensure that the Welsh assembly cannot run away from some of the difficult decisions that it must make with regard to the environment. If we carry out the actions that go with our fine words, we have a good chance of achieving the dream of the hon. Member for Ceredigion, which is to create an attractive brand image of Wales as a green and pleasant place.

Mr. Martin Caton (Gower): Like all hon. Members who have spoken, I warmly welcome new clause 38. The requirement on the assembly to carry out its functions with is an historic measure in the constitutional history of this country.

"due regard to the principle that sustainable development should be promoted"

Sustainable development has become one of the buzz phrases of the past decade. Like much terminology that becomes fashionable, it is in danger of losing its real meaning in knee-jerk repetition. The thought discipline and philosophy that gave birth to the concept risk being lost behind the jargon. People legitimately ask, "Are there theories at the bottom of your jargon?" To be honest, one of the problems with sustainable development might be that there is a whole family of theories at the bottom of our jargon.

Definitions range from "an intention to maintain and even accelerate economic growth, while seeking to protect the environment as far as possible" through to "a commitment to leave future generations with the same capacity as now for improving human well-being by living within this planet's environmental limits". Like the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), I think that we should be aiming to move towards the latter. However, despite the breadth of interpretation, I would not want to narrow the term "sustainable development" any further in the Bill.

I believe that it will be up to the assembly clearly to identify its objectives for environmental protection and improvement when it establishes the scheme that the new clause requires. It will then be up to Members of the Assembly to make sure that, in every aspect of their work, their environmental objectives, as set out in the scheme, are adhered to.

The annual report, to which the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Ôpik) referred, is an important safeguard for ensuring that the sustainable development scheme is more than just fine words, but I hope that the assembly will consider developing further mechanisms for keeping environmental sustainability at the heart of its decision making. I hope that it will look to develop means of measuring every action that it proposes to take against its sustainable development policies—a sort of environmental impact assessment for every proposal.

It is vital that the assembly finds a way in which to hold sustainability at the centre of all policy making, because the subject and service areas for which the assembly will have responsibility are some of the most important in terms of environmental protection and improvement: agriculture, forestry, fisheries, economic development, highways, housing, transport, industry, tourism, planning, water and flood defence, and health. Almost all the policy areas that will be dealt with by the subject Committees of the assembly are crucial for the future of the environment in Wales and for ensuring that our contribution to the global environment is positive. The new clause provides us not only with theories at the bottom of our jargon, but with the basis for best practice.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) spoke, as the Committee would expect, powerfully and thoughtfully about sustainable development. Like many other Conservative Members, I greatly sympathise with his argument. Listening to the debate, however, one would have thought that we were talking about certain matters of substance, not about a constitutional Bill which will establish a set of bodies.

Amendment No. 517 and Government new clause 38 illustrate beautifully the problem that the Government face. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said, new clause 38 is a slight but admirable restriction of the sort that might be applied to a local authority. Amendment No. 517 moves in the opposite direction. Although the arrow of the hon. Member for Ceredigion is excellent, he aims at a target that I think he would dislike if he contemplated it further, as the amendment would further extend the scope of the Welsh Development Agency.

Who would run what and who would pay for what in terms of sustainable development if, as the hon. Member for Ceredigion suggests, both the amendment and the new clause were agreed to, or if, as is more likely, only the new clause were accepted? Under clause 80, the "Secretary of State shall from time to time make payments to the Assembly . . . as he may determine."

He will be the all-powerful paymaster of the assembly. Under the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975, the Secretary of State and the Treasury can grant unlimited borrowing powers to the WDA.

What will happen if the WDA chooses to move in a direction, in terms of sustainable development, wholly opposite from that of the United Kingdom Government and the Welsh assembly, regardless of whether the assembly is constrained by new clause 38? Which body will prevail in this hypothetical case? Manifestly, the United Kingdom Government will prevail, as the Secretary of State and the Treasury will be able to ensure that their favoured policy is pursued through the WDA; they will fund the agency through the borrowing power and deny funds to the assembly.

Before we debated these measures, I had naively understood that the Government wanted to avoid creating a quangocracy. However, the Bill will allow a quango, based on the great powers retained by the Secretary of State and the Treasury, to fight against an ostensibly democratic institution, which, because it will be limited by the new clause as if it were a local authority, will be entirely subject to the fiscal powers of the Secretary of State and the Treasury.

In those circumstances, the assembly will be the loser, which might not be a bad outcome for those of us who favour the integrity of the United Kingdom. However, if the democratically legitimate body opposes the quango, which is the servant of the UK Government, there will be a devil of a fight, and the matter may be referred to our old friend the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a devolution issue. Who, in such circumstances, will genuinely hold the power over sustainable development in Wales?

The Secretary of State may shake his head but, given that the Minister spent little time on this question earlier, it would help the Committee if, instead of concentrating on the important matters of substance—which, in fact, will largely be for the assembly to debate at a later date—he said who will be in charge of this domain, regardless of whether new clause 38 is accepted.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) repeats the depressing cry that we have often heard from the Conservative Benches—that every situation that could arise when the Senedd is established will lead to conflict, and not, as we believe, to co-operation. People throughout Wales will be happy to see the new clause included in the Bill. By voting for the parties that currently represent it in the House of Commons, Wales has taken a great lead in understanding the need for sustainability.

This weekend, there will be a conference in Merthyr to commemorate the 16th anniversary of a remarkable declaration by the people of Wales speaking with one voice. Every county council, representing the entire population, resolved to make Wales a nuclear-free zone. That was long before the decision was taken elsewhere. Democratic Wales had spoken, and if it had spoken on other issues at the time, it would have made a similar resolution about sustainability. The man who took the declaration to Strasbourg has now become immensely successful—and possibly prosperous—in organic farming in Ceredigion.

When I heard what the Estonian Biggles, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Ôpik), said about sustainable air flights in mid-Wales from the Heathrow at Welshpool that is bound to be developed, I was fascinated by the prospect.

Sustainability is understood in Wales. Labour Members share the fears about the future for farming, especially as we face a particularly difficult problem in Wales. If we lose the small farmers, we lose the language, which is a terrible threat. Labour Members support the Government's policy, as we realise that, although many of the changes in farming are painful, they are inevitable—there is a shrinking market for many products. Nevertheless, we want small farms to be preserved, as they have a special cultural importance to Wales.

I urge farmers to achieve sustainability by planting new crops and farming organically. The British Isles imports 60 per cent. of its organic products. Moreover, organic farming is highly labour intensive, and it works well in areas without especially promising land. Several farms in remote communities in Ceredigion have, despite a difficult start 20 years ago, defied all the critics and been prosperous and successful. Why cannot farmers realise that they can cultivate other harvests, which have a future? I am thinking, for example, of flax and hemp, which has unique properties other than those that prompt people's desire to smoke it—farmers could plant hemp with non-addictive qualities and low-quality THC.

The new clause will muster great support. It will give the assembly a new impetus and role, and express what Wales has shown that it can do when, on those rare occasions, it speaks with a united voice. We want to ensure a sustainable future that will be in harmony with nature.

Mr. Ron Davies: I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) will forgive me if I do not follow him down the path of the prospect that he opened up. When he was describing the growing conditions in remote farms in Ceredigion, I suspected that he would suggest some novel crops—I was not disappointed. However, I would get into difficulty with my Cabinet colleagues if I suggested that the sole purpose of devolution, was to bring about a different policy in Wales on growing cannabis. Nevertheless, I welcome my hon. Friend's support.

The term "historic" has been used several times this evening, and I must use it again. The debate has been historic. The policy advocated by the Government has been endorsed not only by the spokesperson for Plaid Cymru—or should we now call it Plaid Newydd?—and by the Liberal Democrats but, I was astonished to note, by four of our own Back Benchers. In our debates on devolution, that is a rare and welcome occurrence. Moreover, not only did four of our Back Benchers speak in support of Government policy, but not one spoke against it. This truly is a historic debate.

I welcome the contribution by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). In the absence of the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), he found himself waxing eloquent in favour not only of the Government's policy in new clause 38 but of the assembly.

Mr. Evans indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman spent several entertaining moments telling us of all the great benefits that would come to Wales as a result of the assembly. Indeed, during the referendum campaign not even the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), in his most enthusiastic of speeches, would ever have dared suggest that if we voted yes on 18 September we would be able to bring back the Mumbles railway, yet it appears that that is the conclusion of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley. We welcome support from whichever quarter it comes. The hon. Gentleman is a late convert to the cause of devolution, but he is an enthusiastic one, and he is welcomed as such.

The debate was opened by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis). I am grateful for the way in which he spoke. Of course he has a great and deep conviction on such matters and he has argued his case consistently, as he did this evening. Later, I shall answer some of his specific questions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane) was supportive and gave us some good examples of how the Welsh assembly, in pursuance of the duty placed on it, will be able to give expression to the principles of sustainable development. He made it clear that he regarded the principle of protecting the environment as an important, but not exclusive, part of sustainable development.

I welcome the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan). She was right in her assertion that sustainability must now be at the heart of politics. What we can do, as we frame the legislation, is to place the duty on the assembly. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) said, it is those in charge of the political process who must develop the politics and policies to give expression to the duty that we shall lay on the assembly to have regard to the principle of sustainable development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North asked three questions. She asked whether we would set targets and whether there would be a forum for the matter to be discussed by the assembly. The answers, of course, will be a matter for the assembly. What we shall do is to place a duty on the assembly. My hon. Friend's third question was what precisely that meant. I refer her to new clause 38(1), which makes it clear that the new clause will impose a duty on the assembly to have regard to sustainable development in the exercise of all its functions.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) raised that point too, and I agree with what both he and the hon. Member for Ceredigion said about the branding of Wales. It is important that, at the heart of the new Wales that we want to create, we put the idea of respect for the environment and for the principles of sustainability. Both transport and agricultural systems should work with the grain of the environment and according to the principles of sustainability.

Several hon. Members have gently teased me about the site of the assembly. I know that it will come as a great surprise and regret to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley when I say that I shall not tell him this evening the outcome of our consultation and discussion process.

I can make one important announcement to the Committee. I know that everybody will be greatly interested to know that the assembly will not be on a green-field site. As colleagues who have followed our deliberations carefully will know, all the sites under consideration are brown-field sites, so that information will not come as a great surprise.

I am afraid that the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) rather spoiled the debate, which was well informed and considered until his intervention. I am sorry about that. The substance of his contribution is something for the hon. Member for Ceredigion to take up, but he also returned to the idea of trying to raise conflict all the time.

I genuinely suggest that the hon. Member for West Dorset has have chat with the converts who now sit on the Opposition Front Bench. They will be able to explain to him that the idea of eternal conflict being institutionalised into our constitution is fantasy. The new arrangements will not work like that.

The hon. Gentleman asked the question about the Welsh Development Agency in our previous debate, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, in reply to that debate, told him the position.

7.15 pm

Mr. Letwin: He did not.

Mr. Davies: Of course he did. The position is clear. The responsibility for funding the Welsh Development Agency will pass to the assembly, as will the responsibility for laying down the strategy for the agency. The responsibility for monitoring the WDA will also pass to the assembly. There is no possibility whatever of a conflict developing between the wishes of the Secretary of State and those of the assembly, because the Secretary of State's responsibilities in respect of the WDA will have passed to the assembly.

Mr. Letwin: Will the external financing limit powers under the 1975 Act pass to the assembly?

Mr. Davies: The responsibility for funding the assembly now rests with the Secretary of State. The funding for the Welsh Development Agency comes out of the block grant. Under the new arrangements, it will be the responsibility of the Secretary of State to consider the expenditure that is necessary and appropriate for the Welsh assembly in the exercise of all its functions. It will then be a matter for the assembly itself to decide what proportion of the grant that it is given shall be allocated to the Welsh Development Agency.

As for raising the WDA's external financing limits, the hon. Member for West Dorset will know that, about 12 months ago, the Conservative Government passed an amendment to the provisions, to allow an increase by means of secondary legislation. That power will pass to the assembly.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to the Secretary of State; he may actually be helping me. Is he saying that, from now on, the agency's external financing limit will be a matter not for the Treasury but purely for the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Davies: When the assembly is established, in more than 12 months' time, it will be for that body to decide how to use the powers that it has been given. The hon. Gentleman is now asking a particular question about the Treasury's residual role. My present understanding is that the ability to raise the financing limit of the Welsh Development Agency will pass to the assembly, but the hon. Gentleman is asking a specific question—[Interruption.] I am trying to deal with the hon. Gentleman on the basis of the information tnat I currently have.

My understanding is that the responsibility will pass to the assembly. If there is any requirement for the assembly to seek approval from the Treasury, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and let him know. Without having had the opportunity to check, it is my understanding that such consent will not be required, but I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and let him know.

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, but I want to return to the substance of the debate now. I do not want to be sidetracked into the funding of the Welsh Development Agency, because we have already had a lengthy debate on that subject.

Mr. Rowlands: As I recall, we recently changed the legislation. Originally any increase in the borrowing powers of the WDA required primary legislation, but now that can be done through an order-making power.

Mr. Davies: That is precisely the point that I just made in answer to the hon. Member for West Dorset.

If there are any questions that I have not answered—apart from those asked by the hon. Member for Ceredigion—I apologise. If there are hon. Members who feel that I have omitted to respond to their questions, perhaps they will let me know and I shall attempt to deal with them in correspondence.

I shall talk about our new clause 38. It is appropriate that the hon. Member for Ceredigion who, as I said earlier, has a long record in such matters, has provided us with the opportunity to debate sustainable development as part of our proceedings on the Bill. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that sustainable development is about ensuring a better quality of life, both now and for generations to come. I also agree with his definition of sustainable development, which encompasses economic, social and environmental goals. It is concerned with achieving economic growth, while protecting and, where possible, enhancing the environment. It is about making sure that those economic and environmental benefits are available to everyone and not just to a privileged few. Sustainable development is about a new and integrated way of thinking that influences choices across government and throughout society.

The Government have committed themselves to placing the environment at the heart of their policy making and are engaged in a wide-ranging consultation process which will lead to a revised strategy for sustainable development. The hon. Member for Ceredigion raised that point and I assure him that it is my desire that that development work should continue between now and May next year, so that when the assembly is established much of the preparatory work will have been done.

Paragraph 1.24 of the devolution White Paper states:

"The Government will . . . ensure that the Assembly . . . promotes sustainable development".

On 8 December last year, I told the House that one of the Government's amendments would

"most certainly place a duty on the assembly to have regard to the principle of sustainability."—[Official Report, 8 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 752.]

The new clause gives expression to that intent and I am genuinely grateful for the wide support that it has received from all parties represented in the Chamber.

[Mr. Davies]

New clause 38 meets the commitments that we have given. It places the assembly under a duty to publish "a scheme setting out its proposals for securing that its functions are exercised with due regard to the principle that sustainable development should be promoted."

The hon. Member for Ceredigion was quite right when he said that here was a case of Wales breaking new ground. No such duty applies to the UK Government in exercising their executive functions or to the UK Parliament in framing legislation.

Mr. Dafis: New clause 38(1) is somewhat convoluted and there appear to be several stages between the words "scheme" and "sustainable development" where the whole process might fall down. Are we talking about the assembly drawing up a sustainable development strategy for Wales?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman has to accept that the wording of new clause 38 makes it clear that the assembly will have to draw up a scheme, just as the Welsh Language Board requires public authorities in Wales to draw up schemes. The question of strategy is a wider matter and it will be for the assembly to decide that for itself through the development of its policies. It will want to develop separate strategies for sustainable development in the countryside, for sustainable development of transport policy and for sustainable economic development generally, and those strategies will inform all aspects of assembly policy.

What we are talking about here is a statutory duty to be placed on the assembly to produce a scheme to give expression to the desire that it should promote sustainability across all of its functions. That is the scheme; the strategy will be the way in which the assembly develops all of its policies, and that is a matter for the assembly and the elected representatives who sit in it.

Mr. Dafis: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, in reality, the scheme will amount to nothing if it does not generate, or oblige the assembly to generate, a strategy? He spoke of several strategies, but surely those would have to be encompassed within an overall strategy, which the UK Government already have and which Governments all over the world were obliged to draw up after the Rio agreements?

Mr. Davies: No, I do not accept that interpretation. It is clear that there will be a requirement on the assembly to produce a scheme. That scheme will have to be published, subjected to the normal processes of accountability and reviewed regularly, so it cannot be set aside, as the hon. Gentleman suggests would be possible. The assembly will have had that duty placed on it. However, I acknowledge that what counts will be the enthusiasm with which the political parties that contest seats in the assembly embrace the principles of sustainability. It will be their policies, for which they will seek the electorate's approval, that will determine how successful and meaningful the scheme becomes.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is a case of Wales breaking new ground. No such duty applies to the UK Government in exercising their executive functions or to this Parliament in framing legislation. The scheme that the assembly must prepare will extend across all its functions, although—this is the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North—obviously the "due regard" to be given to the principle of promoting sustainable development may vary from function to function. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire said, there will be a need to develop strategies for transport, for agriculture, for economic development in the countryside, and so on. The assembly will also be under a duty to keep its scheme under review and to publish an annual report setting out how its proposals in the scheme were implemented in each financial year.

The other amendments in the group express Plaid Cymru's concerns for the environment in Wales and the wish to ensure that all economic development is sustainable. Naturally, the Government prefer their own provision, new clause 38, to new clause 18, although there are similarities between the two.

New clause 18 raises the additional point that the assembly should review annually

"the implications for Wales of any relevant quantitative targets for the United Kingdom set by Parliament or by Ministers of the Crown."

That recognises that there are policies that affect sustainable development in Wales over which the assembly will have no control, because they will continue to be dealt with by the UK Government—for example, taxation issues, such as the level of duty on petrol and value added tax on domestic fuel. When he opened the debate, the hon. Member for Ceredigion asked whether schedule 4 should be extended to include Opraf. I shall consider that question and, when I have taken advice, I shall get in touch with him.

In exercising its functions, the assembly will need to have regard to the international obligations into which the UK has entered, for example, after the Rio and Kyoto summits. However, it is unnecessary for the Bill to refer explicitly to such matters, as the assembly could take account of them in framing its scheme under new clause 38.

The Welsh Development Agency is required under existing legislation to further the improvement of the environment in Wales. The overarching requirement on the assembly to have due regard to sustainable development will inform the strategic guidance and targets that it sets for the agency. That and the agency's own governing legislation are sufficiently robust to ensure that environmental concerns are taken into consideration by the agency in the exercise of its functions. Given those two additional provisions, the Government's view is that amendments Nos. 517, 518 and 522 are unnecessary.

New clause 37 provides for a board member of the agency to be assigned specific responsibility for environmental sustainability. I can say only that that has to be an organisational matter for the agency. The hon. Gentleman asked whether I had received any representations from the agency in respect of that matter and the answer is, no, I have received no such representations. I have recently announced to the House of Commons that I shall appoint members to the agency on the basis of fair and open competition. I shall not make any predecisions, but I hope to be selecting from a pool of candidates with a wide range of skills and experience, so I hope that someone on the board will have a measure of experience and competence in this area. It will then be for the agency itself to assign particular responsibilities to individual members.

On the basis of the reassurances that I have provided in respect of the assembly and the Welsh Development Agency, I hope that the hon. Member for Ceredigion will ask leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Dafis: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his response and I have enjoyed the debate. The amendments have served their primary purpose, which was to give us an opportunity to debate sustainable development. It is good to know that there is widespread support for the principle and that the idea that the assembly should take sustainable development as an informing theme and that Wales will do so has been widely accepted here. I certainly acknowledge that the Government's new clause will ensure that the issue is high on the assembly's agenda when it meets, which is very important.

The debate has been useful, although not all of it has been well informed. The debate about energy illustrated the need for people to become much more well informed about the options that we face on energy supply. No development is without its impact. If we talk about dispersed development—which sustainable development is, by definition—the visual impact will be real, although much less than the visual impact that exists in our environment. I had better leave it there. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

7.30 pm

Mr. Llwyd: I beg to move amendment No. 520, in page 56, line 13, at end insert—

'(2A) After subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(2A) The Agency shall establish a department with the responsibility of drawing up and ensuring the implementation of, policies in furtherance of the purposes set out in subsection (2) appropriate to rural areas.".'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 524, in clause 121, page 56, line 40, leave out from beginning of line to end of line 2 on page 41 and insert

'be transferred to the Welsh Development Agency.'.

No. 525, in clause 122, page 57, line 6, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 526, in clause 123, page 57, line 19, leave out 'or Schedule 11.'.

No. 527, in page 57, line 21, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 528, in page 57, line 28, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 529, in page 57, line 33, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 530, in page 57, line 41, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 531, in clause 124, page 58, line 2, leave out 'and Schedule 11.'.

No. 532, in page 58, line 11, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 533, in page 58, line 13, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 534, in page 58, line 16, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 535, in page 58, line 22, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 536, in page 58, line 25, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 537, in page 58, line 35, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 538, in page 58, line 40, leave out 'cease to exist' and insert 'are transferred.'.

No. 539, in clause 125, page 59, line 11, leave out 'ceasing to exist' and insert 'being transferred.'.

Mr. Llwyd: Amendment No. 520 is straightforward, saying, in other words, that there should be a Department charged with formulating policies of relevance to the rural economy.

I wish to draw attention to amendment No. 524. Clause 121 currently reads:

"The functions of the Development Board for Rural Wales shall cease to exist."

The amendment is a probing amendment. I believe that the functions do exist, but I accept that, if it is meant in terms of functus officio, that it is a right and proper use of the word. I would prefer the Bill to refer to the transfer of those functions to the new body, which would secure the position. The Minister, being a Latin scholar, will no doubt deal with this point in due course—or perhaps not.

I ask the Government to consider my proposal that the word "transfer" is preferable to the phrase "cease to exist". Surely the functions are still very much in existence—perhaps more than ever in view of the agriculture crisis. The Minister should give thought to that matter in his response.

Many people in rural areas in Wales are worried because of the changes occurring in the agencies charged with ensuring the economic development and well-being of rural areas. I speak as a Member representing a constituency which was very well served by the Development Board for Rural Wales. Other hon. Members in the Chamber were equally well served by that board, and they have shown in the past, and will show in the future, their concern about this matter.

People who live in mid-Wales have for some time enjoyed great assistance from the Development Board for Rural Wales, a body specifically set up to tackle the problems of rural Wales. Over the years, the board amassed considerable expertise and experience. The task of economic regeneration in rural areas is far more difficult, and requires more application and creativity than in an urban area, where at a stroke of a pen—frequently on a cheque—many hundreds of jobs can be created.

Many of us look with envy at the recent developments in north-east and south-east Wales. Who would not accept 6,000 new jobs at a plant such as LG at Newport? That underlines the dichotomy. In that instance, 6,000 jobs were created, thus having a dramatic effect on the unemployment figures and the economy of that area—which is to the good. To create 6,000 jobs in rural areas is, by comparison, a mammoth task. A more sympathetic approach is required, together with an intimate knowledge of the needs and requirements of rural areas.

[Mr. Llwyd]

One grave concern is the fact that WDA and the Development Board for Rural Wales moneys have been used to bring in such plants as Sony and LG, but, without being niggardly—I do welcome their arrival—I must question what price has been paid for their success. There is no doubt that, proportionately, far higher spending has occurred in the eastern areas of south Wales and in the industrial eastern area of north Wales than in the rest of Wales. By and large, the rural areas of Wales are and have been let down.

I am not saying that that was in any way intentional, but the budget was finite, and a great deal of money was taken out of the overall cake and went into some of those schemes.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the lack of democratic accountability and transparency in the development of economic policy in Wales may have had a bearing on the fact that there has been an imbalance not only between east and west, but between rural and urban, and between small businesses and large projects?

Mr. Llwyd: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and he may be correct. I am hopeful, as he will be, that the new set-up under the assembly will put paid to that aspect, and will introduce a more equitable distribution of funding for inward investment throughout Wales.

I know that political influences can come in to play, as I almost lost a plant in my constituency. I prefer not to give all the details, but I was called at the eleventh hour to try to save the plant. The persons running the plant were told that, if they relocated to Breconshire, everything would be fine and they would have all the money they needed. In Bala, they could not have it. It was only by sheer good fortune that I intervened. A local councillor in Bala rang me that evening, and, the following morning, that was reversed. There was an admission that some skulduggery was afoot, and I hope and pray that the assembly will ensure that that kind of nonsense will not recur.

Several of us campaigned for a change of direction in terms of funding of the agencies in Wales as there was an acknowledged imbalance between east and west. For example, the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) said last week that, for every £1 spent on job creation and inward investment in the Swansea area, £5.25 was spent in Cardiff. We now know that the WDA agreed to expend a moiety of its inward investment budget in the western areas of Wales. That was agreed last year, and sanctioned by the Welsh Office. That was announced and it was most welcome, especially to those of us who had campaigned for it.

However, it shows that different parts of Wales were dealt with differently. Following the LG announcement, the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales received savage cuts to their budget. To put it simply, some money had to be obtained to honour the cheque that was paid to bring in those new plants. There is great anxiety throughout Wales that such inward investment is brought in at too high a price—certainly at a very high price to rural Wales. In my view, that imbalance must be addressed, and I am sure that many hon. Members share my unease. We must all ensure that every part of Wales receives its fair share.

I always use the word "inclusiveness" in these debates. I always feel obliged to do so, as Ministers always do. If it is to mean anything, we must ensure that it means an equitable distribution of all moneys throughout Wales; I am sure that that will be a guiding principle of the national assembly.

However, rural Wales has extra problems, for the reasons that I have given, and because it is a far more difficult task to create growth in the small and medium sector than in large enterprises. We have the problems of remoteness. Infrastructure is inadequate. The sparsity factor is of great importance, and that translates into a higher cost of delivery of services, especially in remoter areas.

The Bill provides for the creation of a powerhouse—a new body which will be an amalgam of the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Land Authority for Wales. That is acceptable, but the loss or dilution of the expertise that was possessed by the Development Board for Rural Wales should never be acceptable. Some of the worries in that sphere have been identified by many Welsh bodies in the past few months.

For example, the Country Landowners Association in Wales briefed various hon. Members a few months ago. I shall quote briefly from a letter that it wrote. The association questions whether the assembly's "procedure for determining and managing its spending priorities" will recognise and protect the special needs of rural Wales. It questions whether there will be sufficient

"provisions to ensure that the advice of the regional committees will be heard in the Assembly".

It seeks an assurance that the enlarged new authority, having taken over the functions of the Development Board for Rural Wales,

"will address the particular needs of rural areas".

The association also sought assurances that the subject and executive Committees of the assembly and the board of the WDA would have rural representatives. That is very important.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Pardon an intrusion from a Scot. Much of this is familiar, but what can a Welsh assembly do to overcome the very real problem that the hon. Gentleman outlines that enlightened Ministers in the Welsh Office cannot?

Mr. Llwyd: I believe that the basic problem has been the tug of war between the Department of Trade and Industry, the WDA and the Welsh Office. We all know that it has been going on behind closed doors, and we know that there is a finite budget, even in a Welsh context, but equally in a United Kingdom context. There has been far too much toing and froing, and far too much of that tug of war between Departments.

At least when we have a national assembly, there will be no tug of war within that body. I hope that, within the assembly, there will be an overall view of the needs of the whole of Wales, and I trust that the assembly will be guided by expert committees on the needs of rural areas and so on. Does the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) wish to raise another point?

Mr. Dalyell: Is not the proposed Welsh assembly stretching the goodness of human nature rather far?

Mr. Llwyd: That is not an unusual comment from the hon. Gentleman. He has been saying that for 25 or 30 years. I say that with respect, because I have a great deal of respect for him. I have heard it said that the assembly might well be a cure for flu, and I have heard other people say that, if we had had an assembly, we should not have had the miners' strike.

Surely, with respect to the hon. Gentleman, it is not beyond the ken of any type of national assembly to address the real economic needs of rural and urban areas. I realise that finance will be needed, but at least we shall not have this tug of war, which has taken much time and energy.

I remember, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), arguing with the late great right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who at one time walked the streets of Cardiff very occasionally. The first thing we discussed with him after he became Secretary of State for Wales was the idea of giving a new development status to the southern part of my right hon. Friend's constituency and the northerly part of mine, following the closure of a large plant. Everyone, including the Welsh Office, seemed to support that proposal, but it was stopped at the last minute by the Department of Trade and Industry. I hope that that type of thing will not happen when we have the national assembly. It is inconceivable to me that it will happen.

I realise that there is a finite budget, and that there will be a certain amount of creative tension regarding that budget, as there is in the setting of priorities, but at least we shall do away with that time-wasting exercise.

Mr. Wigley: My hon. Friend mentioned one example of difficulties with the DTI. He will remember that, as recently as last year, Steven Spielberg wanted to make a film in Wales. The Welsh Office supported the idea, but unfortunately it could not carry other Government Departments with it, and the film was made in Ireland. Surely, in a similar situation, we should have much more clout with our own assembly.

On rural or urban matters, a consensus can be achieved in the Welsh Grand Committee on what is needed in Wales—a consensus that cannot be achieved on the Floor of the House. I believe that, in our own national assembly, there will be an opportunity for a consensus in a Welsh context that, unfortunately, we cannot get within the existing structures.

7.45 pm

Mr. Llwyd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Needless to say, I agree with what he said.

To return briefly to what I said earlier, I believe that it is highly desirable that the national assembly has an explicit duty to promote and sustain the interests of rural Wales. Rural Wales amounts to more than 85 per cent. of the land mass of the country, and Wales has a very strong rural character.

I shall not repeat an argument made some weeks ago, but the Environment Act 1995 sets a clear precedent. Under the 1995 Act, national park authorities have a duty to foster the economic and social well-being of local communities, and to co-operate with public agencies whose functions include the promotion of economic and social development in their areas.

Surely we cannot leave the situation as it is. It is a very, very important—indeed, all-important—remit, and if we merely leave it to the area committee structure, we shall fail the people who voted in favour of the national assembly. I believe that there must be a thorough appraisal of current thinking and current policy in creating sustainable economic and social development in rural areas.

The Government have responded positively to many of the far-sighted suggestions of my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) about sustainable growth. Surely what I am now suggesting is part and parcel of the same important debate.

We are in the teeth of a fierce storm in agriculture. We know that there will be a change in the very near future, because common agricultural policy reform is imminent and the industry will have to change; of that we can be sure. However, our rural communities and rural economies will also have to change. It is vital that the national assembly is able, and is speedily given the right and the responsibility, to input policy suggestions into that discussion. I hope that there will be a subject Committee dealing with agriculture and rural development, as that would seem to be a sensible vehicle to assure sympathetic and effective development.

Recently, via the European Commission, the European Union issued a plan for agri-environmental policies and those dealing with the development of the rural economy to be brought within a single framework. The National Assembly for Wales would do well to emulate that move.

I hope that I have established that there is a vital need for forward thinking in terms of the rural economy. Agriculture is a central consideration, but so is transport infrastructure, the creation of sympathetic light industry, telematics, electronic infrastructure and agricultural diversification. There are numerous other important facets. I trust that the Government will look favourably upon the amendment, which would introduce into Wales the same sort of forward thinking exercised by the Countryside Commission in England.

I am not too proud to say that I would seek to borrow some of the commission's ideas—I would also like to borrow some ideas from the English rugby team—because they tackle a breadth of subjects regarding rural life and the economy. The commission deals with those issues very effectively under the one roof. Huge challenges will face rural Wales in the coming months and years, and they must be met. If we begin by giving the agency responsibility for addressing those issues, it will be a valuable step towards meeting that all-important challenge.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: In speaking in opposition to amendment No. 520, I acknowledge that it raises the converse of the issue explored so well by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). They asked whether, under the enhanced WDA, there would be a lack of focus in terms not only of the industrial economy of Wales but of rural areas. I resist the amendment because I do not believe that it is simply a question of structure: it is more a matter of educating Members of the Assembly and Welsh citizens about the need to strike a balance between the treatment of rural and urban areas in Wales.

Establishing a regional affairs department, which is the subject of this amendment, will not of itself guarantee adequate funding or attention to rural areas. We must accept that there is a risk with devolution that the role of the Secretary of State as an honest broker or umpire will be lost. However, hon. Members—including my legalistic friends on Labour Benches—and I support devolution because issues must be exposed to the light of day and debated openly.

One of the strengths of the Government's proposals is that they will allow genuine, open, democratic debate about issues that have arisen under the quangocracy fostered by the Conservative party for 18 years. The imbalance between north and south Wales in terms of economic development might be defined more precisely as an imbalance between west and east, as there is substantial inward investment in north-east Wales—especially along the A55 corridor. We must address that matter.

I welcome the establishment of the National Assembly for Wales as an opportunity to consider that issue openly and democratically. We must also address the imbalance of investment between urban and rural areas in Wales. If there is genuine, open debate, I feel confident that the quality of decision making will improve and that both rural and urban areas will feel well served by the new institution.

How does the Minister view the role of rural policy within the enhanced WDA? It seems that the Government are not minded to pursue a policy of ring-fencing funds for rural development. None the less, there must be some focus on rural areas. I would be interested to hear the Minister's comments in that regard. I would also be interested to hear his views about the issues raised by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd).

Do the Government intend to require the WDA to comprise persons who have experience in agriculture and rural affairs? I am sure that the Minister is aware that that matter has caused great concern. I appreciate that the Government have adopted the legitimate position that they cannot be too prescriptive and tie the assembly's hands—after all, it is a democratic institution that will be capable of making its own rules and decisions. However, in view of the difficulties facing Welsh agriculture at present, some clarification or an idea of the policy would be appreciated.

I also seek clarification of whether the Government, through Standing Orders or some other means, will require the WDA to have regard to the requirements not only of agriculture and efficient land management—I refer to section 1(4) of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975—but of the economic and social well-being of rural areas. I should be grateful if the Minister would clarify those issues.

Mr. Evans: I wish to make a short contribution in the guise of a few questions to the Minister. He will be delighted to learn that normal hostilities have resumed after new clause 38. I apologise for my raw voice, but I was at Twickenham on Saturday: never has so much energy been expended for no good purpose.

I asked earlier about the vital European Union regional aid that is channelled to rural Wales. What has happened in the discussions about revising the way in which that aid is calculated? The calculation is to be based only on unemployment, which will disadvantage whole swathes of Wales in favour of other areas, including some parts of Spain, that are thriving. It could put a £1 billion hole in expenditure for Wales.

The Development Board for Rural Wales was established in 1977, and has successfully examined specific problems, such as depopulation in rural areas, and vital issues such as public transport, social housing and industrial investment in rural areas. It serves 40 per cent. of Wales. When the board is meshed into the super-quango, how will the Government ensure that its remit extends sufficiently to rural areas? A favourable reply would render these amendments unnecessary.

We must not lose sight of the reason why the Development Board for Rural Wales was invented. Rural areas must not be disadvantaged or forgotten because of extra demands on the WDA. Much has been said about LG coming to Newport and creating 6,100 jobs. That employment is vital—as is the spin-off of between 9,000 and 15,000 extra jobs—and the whole of Wales will benefit from it. Do the Government have any plans to bring the Wales tourist board within the remit of the Welsh Development Agency? Tourism is vital for rural Wales.

Another remit of the DBRW was its support for farming. Will that remit be taken on by the Welsh Development Agency? That question is particularly important in the crisis currently facing Welsh farming.

In an earlier debate, it was mentioned that the DBRW had a remit to steer a certain percentage of development away from the M4 and A55 corridors. That is extremely important, as there are parts of south-west Wales into which it is difficult to attract inward investment, whereas it is much easier to attract it into areas such as Newport and along the M4 and A55 corridors.

Can the Minister tell us what is to be the steer for the new super-quango? Will it be to ensure that a specific percentage of the inward investment that comes into Wales finds its way into rural areas, away from the main corridors? As new clause 38 deals with sustainable development, I assume that it is intended to allay fears for rural areas.

Having kept my contribution brief, I hope that that will leave a little more time for the Minister to cover those points.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I have considerable sympathy with the amendment which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) said, seeks to ring-fence rural affairs within the DBRW. For economic, cultural and social reasons, it would be a tragedy if the new quango neglected rural affairs. It may be unrealistic, as my hon. Friend suggested, to expect that the agency would ring-fence rural affairs.

I shall put two questions to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. First, what about the money? We are discussing not just a merger of three bodies—quangos—but an extension of powers. With regard to social development, there will be an extension of powers wider than the present Meirionnydd, Powys and Cardiganshire. Social development will go to all the rural areas outside that area covered by the development board, and to urban areas.

The new super-quango will have increased powers over those areas in that sphere. Will it have to make do with the same amount of money, plus annual increments, as is now geared to its existing powers, or will it have more money to enable it to perform its new functions, as set out in the amendment? Those new functions will need money. If new money is not forthcoming, money will be taken from existing functions. People will put pressure on the new quango for social development money, if I may so describe it, in areas outside the present development board areas.

My second question, which was also raised by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), is: what about farming? Farming was not thought of as industrial, and so was probably not considered to be within the original remit of the WDA. Now that the reference is to business, which can be industrial, commercial or professional, it must obviously cover farming, especially when it is said that the business does not need to make a profit—we all know that farmers do not make any profit.

On a legalistic reading of this legalistic document, farming would be included under economic or social development. There are clear social ramifications to farming in rural Wales. I should have thought that farming would fall within the remit of the new social and economic powerhouse, unless the European Community claims that it is the only body allowed to spend money on farmers. If that is not the case, there should be a glimmer of hope for farmers under the new, more powerful super-quango. Will more money be provided for that purpose?

Mr. Livsey: I commend the remarks of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). One of the huge problems of the DBRW was that it could not support farming because it did not have the powers under the legislation that set it up. There were many frustrating moments when we were unable to support the agricultural industry with co-operatives for the marketing of lamb and so on during the 1980s. It would be a great advantage if farming as a business could be incorporated into the remit of the agency.

I strongly support the amendment and congratulate the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) on tabling it. There must be redress in the rural areas, through the creation of a rural affairs department. I have long advocated an additional Welsh Office Minister responsible solely for the rural areas. The Under-Secretary is responsible for other matters, such as education under the previous Administration, and health under the present Government. Such is the importance of the rural areas that they deserve a strong focus.

I agree with the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas), who said that the resources should be ring-fenced. As a consequence of amalgamating the bodies, resources may find their way to the centre. I hope that I am wrong. We have heard an analogy with rugby. It is significant that one of the reasons why the English rugby team is so successful is that a certain proprietor of The Sun has enabled an £85 million deal to be done. It is ironic that the Government gave an £85 million support package to agriculture recently, but that was across the United Kingdom. Only £12 million of that came to Wales, so we are losing out again.

We must demonstrate the needs of rural Wales. Agriculture is vital. In some parts of Wales, 25 per cent. of the population is engaged directly in agriculture or in support industries. Family farms are in crisis. The farm management survey figures for the year 1997–98 suggest that farmers in Wales will earn only £2.50 an hour on a 40-hour week, and in 1998–99 are unlikely to make anything at all. We have heard reference to sustainability—we need sustainable incomes as well.

I know of many instances where rural businesses have collapsed in mid-Wales.

Mr. Öpik: Does my hon. Friend share my view that there has never been a more important time to get support right? The closure of DC Evans in Newtown and Welshpool has cost 35 jobs, and the closure of the former Laura Ashley factory—now called Merchant Design Manufacturing—in Machynlleth cost 60 jobs. People are looking to the Bill to provide real support, so that a rural crisis is not allowed to turn into a deep and lasting recession.

Mr. Livsey: I know that my hon. Friend has had many problems in his constituency as a result of the crisis to which I have referred.

Social development, which has already been debated, is extremely important. In the context of rural affairs, national parks are similarly important. One of the purposes of a rural affairs department must surely be to hammer out a rural strategy in conjunction with the assembly. That will create something coherent for the rural areas of Wales.

Amendments Nos. 524 to 539 relate to the transfer of powers from the Development Board for Rural Wales to the Welsh Development Agency. The use of the word "transfer" is extremely important as it identifies what will and should happen. As I have said, we have already debated the transfer of powers for social development.

Business Connect for Wales has given an excellent service throughout the DBRW area and it has been a great success, but it requires staff to service it with expertise. A report yesterday referred to the possibility of 60 jobs being lost in the DBRW. If that happens, it will not be possible to service a business connect network throughout rural Wales. That is serious. We must demand answers.

I have two questions for the Minister. How does he intend to maintain the rural premium in funding the new agency to ensure that the Government's stated aim, which is to see effective business development delivered throughout Wales through business connect, is achieved? Secondly, how is the Minister using the funding mechanism of the new agency to ensure that its new divisional structure delivers the quality and extent of service that he says he wants to see, given that there is the possibility of staff reductions? I should say that that possibility was denied yesterday, but I hope that the Minister will refer to it.

The rural premium, because of sparsity, has been £100 per person in the DBRW area. It used to be £605 per person in the WDA area, but that premium has been subsumed. It has found its way into local authorities and has been lost. Will that happen to the rural premium, which has been made available with success, in the DBRW area? Perhaps that puts the question of the ring-fencing of resources back into the park.

The Government should accept the amendments as a form of insurance for rural Wales, for agriculture, for rural businesses and for people living in the rural areas. Present powers must not be lost. Instead, they must be transferred. If the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy puts the amendment to the vote, we shall support him.

Mr. Caton: I shall speak in favour of the policy for rural areas as set out in the Bill and, therefore, against the amendments. In doing so, I have much sympathy for the fears and concerns of Members who represent constituencies which come within the area of the Development Board for Rural Wales, which is to be merged into the Welsh Development Agency.

I used to live just outside Aberystwyth. That being so, I am aware of the high-quality work that the DBRW has done, including the use of its social powers. Its special expertise in taking up economic problems in our country towns and villages has proved valuable. The Mid-Wales Export Association, which was established and funded by the DBRW, has undertaken superb work recently.

I represent and live in a rural constituency that is not included within the DBRW boundary. Like many of my colleagues in rural south Wales, west Wales and parts of north Wales, I am concerned that the current situation is not sustainable, to borrow a word that was used in a previous debate. We do not have access to the expertise and experience that was once available to us. In the perception of the DBRW, we have in the past been overshadowed, often understandably, perhaps, by the acute problems faced by neighbouring urban and industrial areas.

8.15 pm

The new WDA must make rural development policy one of its key functions, using best practice from both the DBRW and the WDA. We must use the experience and the expertise of both. It must serve the whole of rural Wales, not a particular geographical segment. If we do that, I am sure that the whole will produce rather more than just a sum of the parts.

The agency must have a dedicated rural section, call it rural affairs department, a rural policy unit or whatever.

Mr. Llwyd: That is precisely what the amendment seeks to achieve.

Mr. Caton: The hon. Gentleman interrupted me just as I was about to say that I do not believe that this is a matter for legislation in the way that is set out in the Bill.

The assembly and the agency should give serious and sympathetic consideration to the proposals of Professor Peter Midmore and Joan Asby of the Welsh Institute of Rural Studies in Aberystwyth, which are that an integrated rural development fund should be established to foster co-operation and indigenous growth, which realistically will be the main source of new jobs and economic activity in most of rural Wales in the coming years.

I can understand that subsumation into an all-Wales Development Agency for some people in mid-Wales represents a threat. I believe that for them, as for the rest of the people of rural Wales, it provides a tremendous opportunity. I hope that we grasp it.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who made an excellent speech in support of the amendment. Having listened to the debate, I think that there is general agreement that there is a need for the Welsh Development Agency to have a rural remit, although there is disagreement about the way in which that is best achieved.

I cannot support any move towards the ring-fencing of cash within an organisation such as the WDA. Although I have supported ring-fencing in the past, I now believe that it can be an extremely rigid way of allocating money. It does not allow flexibility for any agency in any particular way, and that flexibility is important.

I make a particular plea—this has been touched upon by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies)—for agriculture. He was right to say that it is a vital industry in rural Wales. It is now the biggest employer of any productive industry throughout Wales. In Wales, 53,000 people are employed directly in agriculture. The Development Board for Rural Wales has estimated that, over the next 10 years, 5,000 of those jobs will be clearly under threat.

We are facing a crisis in the rural economy, which is a crisis in rural Wales. Rather than approaching those matters in the disparate way that we have done historically, with some money coming from the common agricultural policy, some through structural funds, some from the Welsh Office and some from local authorities, we should adopt an integrated rural approach. I believe that the new powerhouse agency will have an opportunity to integrate within Wales all of the money that should be coming through into the rural economy. We should consider agriculture as the basis upon which we drive up the rural economy while ensuring that we consider the ancillary industries.

I hope that the Minister will acknowledge the strength of feeling about the need for particular concern to be paid to rural Wales and to drive forward the agenda for an integrated rural policy.

Mr. Hain: I begin by thanking everyone who has contributed to an excellent debate. I acknowledge that there is a real crisis in agriculture and in rural economies generally. I hope that some of my remarks will provide some reassurance. However, there is no point in denying that a crisis exists. The Government are doing their best to tackle it.

I thank the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) for the way in which he moved the amendment. In doing so, he made some extremely pointed and inclusive remarks. In asking him and his hon. Friends not to press this group of amendments, I do not for a moment wish in any way to underplay the valuable and much-praised work of the Development Board for Rural Wales over the past two decades. However, much of the rationale for its establishment was a reflection of the need to develop new towns in mid-Wales. That work was completed some time ago, and the board's activities now very much overlap, and, in some cases, duplicate, those of the WDA.

That overlapping and duplication is, in the Government's view, inefficient and is a waste of public money: such waste is one of our key motivations in attempting to reduce the number of non-departmental public bodies in Wales. The legislation as it stands provides for those functions of the DBRW and the Land Authority for Wales that are not at present enjoyed by the WDA—I stress that point—to transfer to the agency on merger. I am convinced that the skills and experience of the DBRW's staff will provide an invaluable addition to those of the agency, in particular in rural affairs. The transfer of all the board's functions rather than just those not currently enjoyed by the agency would not enhance the agency's powers or functions in any way. That is an important point.

I shall pick up on a point that the hon. Gentleman raised—whether or not I am a Latin scholar—about the issue of "cease to exist". I understand his concerns in that respect, which were echoed by hon. Friends behind me. I shall clarify what the Bill means. In saying that the functions cease to exist, all it is saying is that the DBRW ceases to exist. That is how the Bill achieves that objective. There is, however, a selective transfer of functions that the DBRW exclusively has at present, which the WDA does not have, to the new agency under clauses 121 to 125. That achieves the objective that the hon. Gentleman is seeking.

Mr. Llwyd: The Minister used the word "selective". Does he mean that some powers currently enjoyed by the DBRW will not transfer? Or does he mean that all the powers over and above those that the WDA has, which the DBRW has, will transfer? To what does selective refer?

Mr. Hain: There is an overlap of powers and functions at present, so there is no need to transfer all of them; only those that are not enjoyed by the WDA at present will be transferred.

I now take up the issues raised, quite rightly, by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas), who made several valid points. I hope that Members of the Assembly will have expertise in agriculture and rural affairs. That is essential. I cannot guarantee it by legislation, but I hope that all the parties will ensure that that is secured.

My hon. Friend also raised a point about the importance of agriculture in the assembly's objectives, and, indeed, those of the WDA. The assembly will be obliged to set out a clear strategy to safeguard—indeed, defend and improve—conditions in rural communities. Section 1(4) of the Welsh Development Agency Act already says:

"In exercising their functions the Agency shall have regard to the requirements of agriculture and efficient land management."

That will remain. I think that that answers the point, which was also made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

The point was well made by many hon. Members, but in particular by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey), that rural areas have been facing a crisis. That is why the Government announced today that they will fund the entire start-up costs and first-year running costs of the new British cattle movement service. In addition, the Government have decided that the charges for implementing new specified risk material controls on cattle, sheep and goats will not be recovered from the industry from 1 April. That amounts to the Government giving £70 million to agriculture. I can assure all hon. Members that a substantial portion of that money will go straight into Wales because of its needs.

Mr. Denzil Davies: As my hon. Friend said, the agency shall now have regard to agriculture, but that is not the same as making it one of its main purposes. Section 1(2)(b) of the Act talks about promoting industrial efficiency. If "industrial" is replaced with "business", which has been defined, surely agriculture must mean promoting agricultural efficiency.

Mr. Hain: I expect that it does. It is valuable that my right hon. Friend has put that on the record. He made the point powerfully.

Mr. Livsey: May I thank the Minister for his announcement about SRM materials and expenditure? It was a helpful statement.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful for that kindly intervention.

Amendment No. 520 relates to the functions of the WDA and its organisational structure. Although I appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, and that of his hon. Friends, I cannot agree that the level of detail is a matter for legislation.

I understand and share the view that the needs of rural areas throughout Wales should be very much part of the focus of the exercise of enlarging the agency's functions that we are undertaking. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already spoken of his wish to see a rural policy unit established within the agency, possibly to be located within one of the regional directorates. It is inconceivable that the rural policy unit—this may be of particular interest to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik)—could be located in Cardiff. It is a matter for the agency, which is currently reviewing all those issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West was concerned that there might be a lack of focus for the new agency, and that agriculture may lose out as a result. I can assure him that that should not happen. I hope that all that I have said so far will go towards ensuring that it does not.

There is a problem with ring-fencing. Although my hon. Friend raised the matter, the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) replied adequately to it.

It is important that we do not compartmentalise rural policy. One of the advantages of the proposals, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) said, is that rural policy will assume centre stage in the economic powerhouse. Instead of being confined to one particular but important part of Wales dominated by agriculture, it will be part of the major strategic objectives of the agency as it drives forward its economic strategy, as set by the assembly.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) asked constructive questions—I must stop praising him, as it will get him pushed off the Front Bench—about regional aid and the definition. Those important points are relevant to Wales's needs, where gross domestic product is, of course, the key factor, and where there is much hidden joblessness. We are pursuing this vigorously with the European Union.

[Mr. Hain]

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether the WDA's remit sufficiently covered rural areas. I think that it does, but it will be for the assembly to hold the new agency to account and ensure that it does. I am confident that, with huge representation from rural areas, that will occur. He asked why the Wales tourist board is not coming under the powerhouse agency. I am not sure that that is a matter for this debate. We decided that the tourist board has enormous responsibilities in the coming two years with the summit, the World cup and other initiatives. It will, of course, be for the assembly to decide whether some reorganisation is necessary or desirable in future. We have set clear new targets for investment to spread not just westward but up the valleys and into much of the neglected rural areas.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli raised important points about money. There will be a budget of £200 million for the new powerhouse agency, bringing together the existing budgets. He raised important points about extending powers and social development functions to all areas. That will have to be taken into account by the assembly. His points will be carefully examined.

All the points raised by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will be addressed in the assembly's economic powers. In the light of those comments, I hope that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Llwyd: We have had a good and useful debate, although I believe that the Minister is wrong about agriculture. However, his response has been positive and I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

It being half-past Eight o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 118 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 119 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 9 agreed to.

Clause 120 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 10

WELSH DEVELOPMENT AGENCY: OTHER AMENDMENTS

Question proposed, That this schedule be the Tenth schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Denzil Davies: We have already debated schedule 10 in relation to the definition of the word "business". My hon. Friend the Minister was asked why it was necessary to include

"the activities of any government department or any local or other public authority" in the schedule. The Committee will recall that "business" is now defined not only as

"activities (whether or not with a view to profit)"

but as the "activities of any government department or any local or other public authority".

I do not criticise my hon. Friend for not dealing with the matter, because time ran out. However, I, the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and others asked why on earth a Government Department, perhaps Her Majesty's Treasury—who knows, the public sector borrowing requirement may flip over again; we do not know—should stand outside the WDA with a tin can looking for money. This is a drafting matter. Why is it necessary to include a Government Department? I can understand the need to include a local authority a little better than a Government Department, but why is it necessary to include a public authority?

According to the definition, everyone in the world will now be able to rattle a tin can to obtain money from the WDA. The difficulty is that it has only £200 million. We were told that if it is to satisfy all the requirements built into the legislation, the money will have to come from somewhere else.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to say why it is necessary for "any government department or any local or other public authority" to be included in the definition as recipients of money. It may well be that this is a back-door way of legitimatising the joint venture agreements that the WDA had with local authorities. They were clearly illegal right from the beginning. It was not necessary to pay the large sums that some councils did to silks in Wales to tell them that they were illegal.

The WDA then moved to some kind of partnership agreement, although I was never quite clear what the difference between a joint venture and a partnership was. Those agreements are probably illegal as well. I do not know whether this is an attempt to cure that illegality—probably not—but will my hon. Friend explain why it is necessary to have the included in the definition of "business"?

Mr. Rowlands: I have listened to my hon. Friend the Minister's replies to a succession of amendments and watched the extension of the WDA's role, and I want to enter a caveat. I understand that the economy and the world are changing, but one of the qualities of the WDA was its industrial focus. I can remember the old-fashioned standard industrial classifications. Do I now understand that all that has been swept aside?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asks a relevant question. We have defined business in a broad way—as we saw in the previous debate, agriculture is included in a certain context—precisely to recognise that, with the development of modern economies, there is a great deal of overlapping between the different areas, which previously may have been segmented off into traditional categories. We wanted to ensure that the new powerhouse drove forward the Welsh economy and that it had sufficient functions and powers to deal coherently with all the different sectors of the Welsh economy.

I reassure my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) that there is certainly no intention to introduce any back-door method of legitimising illegal agreements. He is right to suspect that that is not the case. I am sorry that I did not respond to the question earlier, but I did run out of time. The specific reason why Government Departments or any local or other public authority are included is that it may be necessary, as happens in the case of local authorities, for them to enter into an agreement with a private operator or a joint consortium. I think, for example, of waste management companies. They may then receive WDA support or advice or business services. The same is true for a Government Department. We wanted to ensure that we allowed the new powerhouse to engage in such activity and not be prevented from doing so. That is the purpose of including the reference in the schedule.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 10 agreed to.

Clause 121 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 11

DEVELOPMENT BOARD FOR RURAL WALES

Mr. Hain: I beg to move amendment No. 490, in page 104, leave out lines 42 to 44.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 491 and 492.

Mr. Hain: The Government have tabled the amendments in order to keep alive certain references to the DBRW in the Housing Act 1985 and the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. I have been advised that to repeal the references might have undesirable knock-on effects on former tenants of the board, or on bodies to which the board may have assigned leases.

For example, without the changes it is possible that former tenants of the DBRW would effectively lose their time as such tenants in calculating their right-to-buy discount. It might also be the case that certain terms of existing tenancies would change simply because the DBRW's functions had been taken over by the WDA.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that those consequences would be undesirable and unfair, and I therefore urge the Committee to accept the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 11, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 122 to 124 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 125

ABOLITION ETC.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move amendment No. 274, in page 59, leave out lines 18 to 20.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 275, in clause 131, page 62, leave out lines 8 and 9.

No. 276, in clause 135, page 64, leave out lines 27 to 29.

No. 512, in clause 141, page 66, leave out line 30.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful for the opportunity, in the brief time that I have available before the witching hour at 9 o'clock, to deal with this group of amendments. Amendment No. 512 does not belong to us, so I shall leave that to those who claim paternity to it—[Interruption.]—if anyone wants to claim paternity to it. Ours are the type of probing amendments that would be relevant for the Committee stage of any Bill. Had the proceedings been taken in Standing Committee, we would have gone into such detail much more.

Amendment No. 274 seeks to delete lines 18 to 20 to ascertain the exact intention of clause 125, particularly the interplay between subsections (3) and (4). I suspect that that amendment, which deals with the Development Board for Rural Wales, and amendments Nos. 275 and 276, which deal respectively with the Land Authority for Wales and Housing for Wales, are the type of provisions that were heralded in the White Paper. Paragraph 3.23 of the White Paper says:

"Where necessary the Bill will give the Assembly limited powers to amend existing primary legislation."

That is what is happening by virtue of those clauses.

I want to ensure that we know the extent of that power to amend. As we heard in a number of our debates this evening, the DBRW has important functions for the parts of Wales for which it is responsible. Those responsibilities might well have been applied in other parts of Wales, as was suggested earlier. The question of amending other legislation because of the effect of the repeal of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976 is fairly significant. If it is felt that, because of the absence of that Act, there is a need to amend other legislation that impinges on a range of economic and social powers—social powers are within the purview of the 1976 Act—these provisions enable such primary legislation to be amended by order introduced by the Secretary of State to this House.

Subsections (3) and (4) must be taken together in order to understand what we are discussing. I shall select just one part of the wording so that the provision makes sense, because the way in which the draftsmen have attacked this part of the Bill has not resulted in the most attractive English. Subsection (3) says:

"The Secretary of State may by order make any consequential . . . provisions . . . in connection with . . . the repeal by this Act of any provision of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976."

It goes on:

"An order under subsection (3) may include provisions . . . of amendments . . . of any . . . other enactment."

Any other enactment could be amended by order if it was deemed to be dealing with any matter that was incidental to or consequential on the abolition of the Development Board for Rural Wales. That is fairly far-reaching, but it is necessary because many aspects will come to light that should have been covered by the legislation. This provision allows a fast route for changes to primary legislation.

Mr. Öpik: Is the right hon. Gentleman trying to ensure that we do not drop the ball when powers are transferred from the Development Board for Rural Wales to the new organisation? Is that correct?

8.45 pm

Mr. Wigley: Yes, that is correct, but I am going beyond that. These are probing amendments. I want to know what the effect of leaving out those lines would be, but first I want to establish what they facilitate. They seem to facilitate the far-reaching changes that may be necessary.

Amendment No. 275 deals with the Land Authority for Wales. Clause 131(3) and (4) give the Secretary of State the power to amend any enactment relating to land that it is felt appropriate to amend according to the wishes and policies of the National Assembly for Wales. Amendment No. 276 deals with Housing for Wales. Clause 135(3) and (4) enable the Secretary of State by order to make any incidental provisions that he deems appropriate.

Those three clauses could have substantial significance, because they allow the Secretary of State to make orders that change whole sections of housing, land or rural affairs legislation. I welcome that. The White Paper included that proposal: the Government said that they would enable primary legislation to be amended by order. The House will not lose its veto over changes to primary legislation, because an order will have to be approved by the House. An order is the vehicle for enabling provisions that would otherwise have to be included in primary legislation to be taken quickly through Parliament, to meet the requirements of the National Assembly for Wales to change the law in those three areas. The proposed mechanism is fast and effective.

Mr. Letwin: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Secretary of State could make the process even faster if, by a transfer of functions order or subsequent such order, he were to transfer the order-making power in those clauses to the assembly?

Mr. Wigley: Yes, that would be a mechanism whereby the assembly could change primary legislation of its own volition without reference to the House of Commons, but the Government are not proposing that. Under the Government's proposals, the House of Commons will ultimately have a veto over such changes to primary legislation. Scotland is allowed to change primary legislation, and we want our assembly to be able to do likewise, but the clauses do not allow that.

Mr. Letwin: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the structure is in place to permit that change? Under the Bill, the Secretary of State could, by order, transfer those powers to the assembly so that it could thereafter by order change primary legislation.

Mr. Wigley: Yes, but only for such matters as are covered by the Bill. There is no provision for a general facility along those lines.

Mr. Letwin indicated dissent.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman is shaking his head, but the clauses and amendments that we are discussing deal with the activities of the Development Board for Rural Wales, Housing for Wales and the Land Authority for Wales.

Mr. Letwin: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wigley: By all means.

Mr. Letwin: I apologise for intervening again, but the matter that I wish to raise is of some constitutional significance. Clause 22(1) makes it explicit that "Her Majesty may by Order in Council . . . provide for the transfer to the Assembly of any function so far as exercisable by a Minister of the Crown in relation to Wales".

Clearly, the provisions to which the right hon. Gentleman draws attention are "in relation to Wales". They concern the power

"exercisable by a Minister of the Crown".

Therefore, under clause 22, the powers involved could presumably be transferred by a transfer of functions order to the assembly, which would then have the power, by order, to overturn an Act of Parliament.

Mr. Wigley: At the risk of trespassing on our earlier debates—I remember that the subject was touched on, although I think that we got into time trouble—let me say that there are restraints on clause 22.

I was not aware that primary legislation, in its generality, could be amended by order, but if that is the case, and if the arrangement is open-ended, the hon. Gentleman is clearly right. The amendment may be redundant, having already been dealt with by that mechanism. In the case of three of the four areas specified in part VI, however, there are mechanisms to allow changes in primary legislation.

I think that right and proper, and I believe that it should apply to other areas, too. I will not pursue the argument, because I would be trespassing on the Committee's time; but, if responsibilities that lie firmly with the assembly need to be modified, it would be nonsensical not to modify them. The modifications would relate only to Wales, and there is a long stop on the order in this part of the Bill. There are other long stops in other parts with regard to the financial implications. If we do not allow such a development, we shall create a structure that could lead to tensions between the assembly and the House of Commons.

If we want a devolved structure—I realise that Conservative Members may not—we must ensure that it takes on proper responsibility, carries that responsibility and does not merely lead to sniping between one Chamber and another. That is why I welcome the facility provided in the three subsections to which our three amendments relate. I hope, however, that the Minister will tell us how he envisages the working of those subsections, in the context of my comments. I hope that he will justify the need for them, given that—as the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) pointed out—clause 22 may provide an overarching mechanism that makes those requirements redundant. Some clarification is needed.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) for succinctly raising one of the major points at issue in the amendments. In our view, it is clearly the beginning of a slippery constitutional slope, which is why the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was so keen to support the principle behind them. What my hon. Friend warned against, however, is even more evident in clause 141, which our amendment No. 512 addresses.

Clause 141 states:

"The Secretary of State may by order make in any enactment contained in . . . an Act passed before or in the same session as this Act, or . . . subordinate legislation . . . such amendments or repeals as appear to him to be appropriate in consequence of this Act."

If my hon. Friend is right, that is also a power that can then be transferred to the assembly under clause 22. In effect, that would allow the assembly—or, indeed, the Secretary of State, which is bad enough—to change primary legislation not on the ground that it was necessary to do so, but on the ground that it appeared to the Secretary of State

"to be appropriate in consequence of this Act."

We have discussed Henry VIII clauses before, but this is a Henry VIII clause of which not only Henry VIII but Cardinal Wolsey would have been proud. According to the Delegated Powers and Deregulation Committee's report of 1992-93, a Henry VIII clause is

"a provision which enables primary legislation to be amended or repealed by subordinate legislation with or without further Parliamentary scrutiny."

All the authoritative statements on such clauses make it clear that they were not intended to be used in this rather loose and informal way. They are intended to be used restrictively. The report of the Delegated Powers and Deregulation Committee in the other place summed up the definition. It stated:

"the case for using Henry VIII clauses for updating lists, or uprating for inflation and for making consequential and transitional provisions was recognised. In any event the Government should be expected to justify the use of such clauses as being necessary: they should not be used simply for convenience."

I think that the Committee will agree that if such a mechanism is to be used, those criteria might apply, but they are not contained in clause 141. The clause states:

"such amendments or repeals as appear to him to be appropriate in consequence of this Act."

That is a judgment by the Secretary of State, and there are no criteria by which to judge it. The clause could allow him, by order, to change primary legislation through a one-and-a-half-hour debate without amendment. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset said, if that power were transferred to the Welsh assembly, that body could change primary legislation, whether by amendment or repeal, and Parliament would not have a chance to consider the matter.

That is a dangerous precedent, and I do not think that the Committee should lightly allow it to pass. I hope that even if the Minister cannot accept the amendment, he will bear in mind the seriousness of my statement and will at least agree to look at the issue again.

Mr. Hain: I can reassure the right hon. Members for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) that their concerns are misplaced. The amendments relate to residual order-making provisions in the Bill that allow the Secretary of State, by order, to amend primary legislation as a consequence of the quango reform provisions in part VI or the enactment of the Bill generally. All major Bills have an impact on existing statutes and require repeals and amendments. Although we have tried to provide for those in the Bill as, for example, in schedules 8 and 14, it is possible that some detailed matters have not yet been identified. That is why the safety net powers are necessary.

I understand the concerns of hon. Members who have tabled the amendments and I reassure them that the powers are intended to be used and, I stress, could be used only as a means of tidying up the statute book where other provisions in the Bill make that necessary. The alternative would be to return with fresh primary legislation to cover minor and technical matters. I hope that all hon. Members will agree that that would not be a fruitful use of parliamentary time.

Amendment No. 512 was tabled in the name of the right hon. Member for Devizes and some of his hon. Friends. I have heard the phrase "slippery slope" so often during the Bill's passage that by now the slope is well oiled. It is pure fantasy. The amendment would remove from clause 141 the Secretary of State's power to amend primary legislation by order when the Bill's other provisions made that necessary or desirable. The power represents a far better approach than burdening Parliament with fresh primary legislation to effect technical amendments.

Mr. Ancram: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, because I do not have much time.

I recognise the right hon. Gentleman's concern, but there is no scope for such a power to be misused. As I have said, it may be used only as a consequence of the Bill's provisions. Clause 144 provides that any orders made under clause 141, which amend primary legislation, would be subject to affirmative resolution here and in the other place.

Mr. Ancram: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: No, and I regret that I cannot give way. I have not been left much time.

The same arguments apply to the clauses that the right hon. Member for Caernarfon seeks to amend. A Secretary of State who, for whatever reason, sought to use the power unreasonably, could be checked by Parliament, which could also reject a draft order if it considered that the matter would be more properly dealt with by fresh primary legislation.

The amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon would remove the Secretary of State's order-making powers in the merger of the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Land Authority for Wales and in the abolition of Tai Cymru, which would seriously impede the smooth implementation of those proposals. If further technical matters were uncovered during the merger process, we should then have to introduce new primary legislation to deal with them. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not wish that to happen, and therefore invite him to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wigley: I am very grateful for the Minister's response, and I have taken note of the points made by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). The point is that—although different arguments may apply to clause 22—the clause would provide a safeguard for the House and avoid the need for primary legislation each time there was a need for consequential changes arising from the Bill.

It being Nine o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 125 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 126 to 131 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 132 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 12 agreed to.

Clause 133 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Letwin: On a point of order, Mr. Martin. I wonder whether you will give some guidance to a new Member on a genuine point of order. Earlier in the Committee's proceedings, the Secretary of State wrote to me—he deposited the letter in the Library—stating that there neither were nor would be powers other than those that I had mentioned for the assembly to overturn primary legislation passed by the House. The Minister—in failing to respond to what was said, and by what he has or has not said—has virtually implied that that letter was false or was inadvertently misleading. I wonder whether you can give us some idea of how one should deal with such a situation in the Committee's proceedings.

The First Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can table questions to the Minister to get some elucidation on what he meant. The hon. Gentleman will understand that we have now passed that matter because of an instruction of the House.

Clauses 134 to 136 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 13

AUDIT ETC. OF WELSH PUBLIC BODIES

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I beg to move amendment No. 510, in page 118, line 20, at end insert—

'12. The Arts Council for Wales.

13. The Sports Council for Wales.'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 511, in page 118, leave out lines 28 to 31.

Mr. Collins: This group of amendments would correct a seemingly rather serious anomaly in schedule 13: the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales are exempted from the provisions of clause 136 on accountability.

Under clause 136, for those bodies which are specified in parts I or II of schedule 13, which do not include the Arts Council of Wales or the Sports Council for Wales, the Secretary of State may by order make provision about the accounts of any such body,

"the audit of any such body's accounts, or . . . reports by any such body on its exercise of its functions."

The clause goes on to specify that this could include the making of provisions relating to

"the giving of directions by the Assembly" and

"the publication and public inspection of documents."

Given that in his introduction to the White Paper, the Secretary of State said that one of the primary purposes of the Bill—the creation of a national assembly—was to bring

"the quangos under control and into the open",

it seems curious that these two particular bodies should be exempted. It is especially curious because annexe B of the White Paper lists all 19 executive bodies reporting solely to the Secretary of State for Wales, but, if one excludes bodies such as the Development Board for Rural Wales which are to be wound up or merged with other bodies, every one of those 19 is to be subject to the full provisions of clause 136, with the exception of the Sports Council for Wales and the Arts Council of Wales.

The Minister is an amiable soul and a likeable fellow, and no doubt has a good reason for the special status of those two bodies, so we shall probe a little to find out what that may be. Does he regard these bodies as autonomous, executive bodies which should not be subject to clause 136? In one of its customarily excellent papers, the House of Commons Library quotes the constitution unit which has, appropriately, classed the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales alongside the Higher Education Funding Council and the Further Education Funding Council as autonomous bodies. However, the funding councils are fully subject to clause 136, so that cannot be the reason.

Is it because heritage and cultural matters should be given special status? That does not quite work either. Under schedule 13, the National Library of Wales and the National Museum of Wales are properly subject to clause 136. Is it because the two bodies have some advisory functions? That does not work either, because the Ancient Monuments Board for Wales and the Historic Buildings Council for Wales are subject to clause 136 and they have advisory functions.

Could the reason be that the Government regard the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales as unimportant? That is a little difficult to reconcile with the figures in the White Paper which show that, in the current financial year, the Arts Council of Wales is to spend something like £14.7 million and the Sports Council for Wales something like £9.1 million. Those figures exclude lottery awards which the two bodies make in Wales. The Arts Council of Wales reports that, in the last full financial year, it made a total of 228 awards, worth more than £14 million of lottery money. The Sports Council for Wales distributed similarly large sums.

I am sure that the Government would not argue that the two bodies were unimportant because I have in my possession a copy of a speech made 12 months ago by the Prime Minister when he was Leader of the Opposition. It was a speech made at the Mansion house to the British Screen Advisory Council. He said:

"Art is important for the standing of the nation. When Britain is culturally successful it matters to the rest of the world. It is part of our national pride."

I am sure that the Minister agrees that, if that is true of Britain, it must be true of Wales, so the two bodies are important and must be properly subject to the provisions of clause 136.

Is the reason for the exclusion that the Government believe that cultural matters should be kept out of the political sphere? There are some who hold the view that such things should be kept out of the hands of grubby politicians of any party. Sadly, if that were the contention now, the Prime Minister demolished it in his speech 12 months ago when he said:

"New Labour wants to put the arts on the political agenda", so there is no question of the arts being kept out of the political sphere. One is left to wonder exactly what has led the Government to give special treatment to the two bodies.

The Minister, who on the whole has conducted himself amiably in these debates, will forgive me if I venture the somewhat partisan thought that the explanation may lie in the fact that the Government are embarrassed about their record on the arts and sport. That is why they do not want these bodies to have to produce reports or allow their documents to be inspected under clause 136. The Government have every reason not to want such reports to be published. Before taking office, the Prime Minister said in that speech of 12 months ago:

"Arts organisations have had a huge boon from the Lottery—now we need to build on what has been achieved."

We found out a few months later what "building on" that meant: it meant taking £50 million away from the arts and £50 million away from sport in order to put it in the Government's coffers.

On the other hand, perhaps the Government do not want reports from these bodies because they are rightly embarrassed by their announcement last December of a further reduction in the grant made to them. The Minister may argue that we should not criticise the Government for that, as Labour is only carrying on with the previous Government's spending targets. He will forgive me for reminding him, however, that it was his party, not ours, which inflicted on the airwaves and ears of the nation for several weeks last year that dreadful pop song "Things can only get better". For the arts and sport, things are getting worse, not better.

Another possibility is that the Government may be embarrassed by what these bodies may have to say about January's announcement by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to the effect that music, art and physical education are to be struck out of the national curriculum. The Times described that as striking

"a blow at the heart of British culture", and closing

"the book on culture for millions of children".

The Government have every reason to be worried about what would happen if the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales were encouraged to produce open publications and to be subject to clause 136. That is no reason why we should accept the status quo that the Bill would maintain.

I believe that the amendments will enable the Government to come clean about their pledges to the Welsh and UK arts and sport communities. They will also enable them to deliver their pledges in the White Paper; they were quite clear in that document that they wanted all quangos to be open and accountable. Just in case the Government are worried that the Arts Council might oppose this idea, I want to end by quoting an extract from the Arts Council's website which appeared this very day. It said that the Arts Council believes "that all the Arts Councils"— in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales—

"are expected to account for their decisions and to explain them to Government, the arts community and the general public."

If the Arts Council is happy, I cannot see why the Government are not. That is why I commend the amendments to the Committee.

Mr. Rowlands: For the life of me, I cannot understand why sports and arts council issues cannot be subjected to the full rigour of democratic accountability. I have been puzzled by that ever since it was decided to exclude these two bodies. I understand that they have special status—charters and so on—but there is surely a powerful case for making these respectable quangos democratically accountable and responsible. They make operational and budgetary decisions of considerable interest to, and consequence for, large numbers of people. Why, then, are they to be excluded?

I do not want to embarrass Ministers by reminding them that before the election, we used very strong language about quangos and the quango state. The arts and sports councils were often invoked as examples of just such bodies. Like all other sensible, right-thinking people, I assumed at the time that they would be made fully accountable to the democratic assembly. Now it appears that they, more than any other organisations, are to be excluded from supervision.

I accept the problems caused by the special way in which those two bodies were set up—they were established by warrant, or whatever—but I believe that those two functions could have become the direct responsibility of the assembly. I did not think that we needed a sports council and an arts council whose budget would need accounting for. I think that they could have become an integral part of the Committee structure of the assembly. Those bodies make interesting, fascinating decisions on priorities in all sorts of ways.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Can my hon. Friend envisage, especially in the light of recent events, a situation in which a Committee of the Welsh assembly selected future national rugby teams?

9.15 pm

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend tempts me to say that things could not be worse. Things must get better. What was that lovely song we had for the election—"Things can only get better"? Certainly, after last Saturday, that must be true of Welsh rugby.

May I remind my hon. Friend that there has been lively public debate of all sorts in the Welsh media about arts expenditure. There was a debate, or argument, between the Valley arts association and the arts council. It is a curious belief that democracy will be philistine by nature. I do not believe that that is so.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the amendments will not restrict the ability of the arts council or the sports council to undertake their current activities, but simply make them accountable?

Mr. Rowlands: I am suggesting that the amendments are not radical enough, and that given the nature and character of the organisations concerned and the interest in the way in which they spend their money and their priorities, there is a case for more direct democratic accountability and responsibility for their actions.

We made that case over and over again in the run-up to the election. I said that if one had to choose two quangos that should be subject to full democratic accountability and responsibility, it would be those two. There were arguments; there were, rightly, lively debates about the various priorities of the Arts Council of Wales.

There is not one of us who is not interested in the way in which the Sports Council for Wales spends and allocates its money. There is interest not only in its grand strategies for young people—many of which are most admirable, according to all the documents that I have read—but in the nitty-gritty decision-making processes by which grants and resources are allocated to various organisations and communities. I would have thought that that was the meat and drink of democratic accountability and of devolution in its real sense. Then we find in schedule 13, after reading through the names of all the other bodies, that right at the bottom, the quangos most exclusively excluded from any form of democratic accountability are the arts council and the sports council.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Is it not the case that the Government have inherited an anomaly and that they have to live with it? Would it not require a separate regime to put it right?

Mr. Swayne: Change it.

Mr. Thomas: It will be interesting to hear what the Minister says.

Mr. Rowlands: I wish that I had brought some letters with me, because I had something of a correspondence with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the special status of those two bodies. I thought that Parliament was supreme, and that whatever the problems with the status of the two organisations and the methods by which they were established, Parliament could simply unwind the process. Although that would require various consents and various elaborations, surely it would be within the power of Parliament.

I cannot believe that it is beyond the power of Parliament to bring the Sports Council for Wales and the Arts Council of Wales within the jurisdiction, accountability and responsibility of the Welsh assembly. We fight over whole areas of parliamentary sovereignty, but apparently those two bodies are beyond the scope of that sovereignty.

I must confess that I do not understand that, and have never understood it, throughout all the discussions that we have had. We said that we would light a bonfire of the quangos and, although I do not want to burn down either the Sports Council for Wales or the Arts Council of Wales, I certainly want them to become totally democratically responsible to a Welsh assembly.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate and grateful to the Conservative Front-Bench team for having moved the amendment. Tonight, in several debates, we have heard a different tenor of debate from Conservative Members.

Mr. Swayne: That is because of the speech yesterday.

Mr. Wigley: It might well have something to do with that, but, be that as it may, we should welcome the repentance of sinners on the road to Damascus. I congratulate the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), who spoke lucidly and concisely when moving the amendment. As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said, the amendments is perfectly reasonable.

I have to be careful in what I say, as my wife is on the Arts Council of Wales, although it may well be that that gives me an added incentive to ensure proper scrutiny of that body.

Mr. Rowlands: Abolish your wife.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman should not tempt me—his wife has been on the S4C authority and we have already debated the question of whether that body should be answerable.

The Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales are important bodies which have a strong Welsh identity—in fact, no quango has a stronger identity than those two. At times, both bodies have decisions to make that should be open to scrutiny. There has been some controversy in recent weeks about certain matters.

The status of those bodies is something with which we could deal in this Parliament, to which point I shall return; but their status has not been such as to prevent Parliament from casting its eye over them in the past. I am sure that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) will recall a meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee where we debated the annual report of the Arts Council of Wales. I remember Lord Hooson—Emlyn Hooson as he then was—being involved in that. If the Welsh Grand Committee can exercise some degree of scrutiny over that body and, by implication, over the Sports Council for Wales, why on earth can the assembly not do the same thing?

If the Government have come up against some technical changes which will take a prolonged period to get through, would it not be sensible to provide in this part of the Bill an order-making mechanism that could transfer responsibility for the two bodies fairly quickly, once that procedure has been exhausted? Our debate has demonstrated a meeting of minds across the Committee, and unless there is a very good reason for refusing the amendments, this may be an issue on which the Minister should choose to give way and incorporate the suggestion in the Bill.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I wish to speak on the amendments, but, before doing so, I should like to thank the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for his acknowledgement of Conservative pragmatism. It is that mixture of pragmatism and principle which has illuminated the Conservative mind throughout the centuries, and hearing that tribute from the right hon. Gentleman merely confirms what most of us already knew about the Conservatives' ability to adapt to change.

It is in that spirit that I approach the amendments, because, if we are going to do this, we must do it properly. The message that the exclusion of the arts and sports in Wales will broadcast to those communities and to the whole of Wales is that they are not important. How particularly and peculiarly unfortunate that is, given that we are talking about Wales, which is the land of Dylan Thomas, of Gareth Edwards and of Barry John—I was at the match on Saturday, but we shall not go into that. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said—

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I am happy to do so, if the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about rugby.

Mr. Hanson: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that both the bodies named in the amendments were established by royal charter and that the only reason why they are not being brought under the control of the democratic assembly in the Bill is that the arrangements can be changed by invitation via the royal charter procedure? That is the only reason—it is a simple technical matter. We do not disagree with Opposition Members or with my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on the principles of the Bill. This is a simple technical matter which can be dealt with outside legislation.

Mr. Hayes: The problem with that thesis, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale has pointed out, is that the two bodies are no different in that respect from several others which are treated entirely differently in the Bill.

Mr. Hanson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: No, I will not give way again because I wish to be brief and I have been generous to the hon. Gentleman once. The message being broadcast to these communities is that they have been deliberately excluded, and that must be unhealthy. I could go on at length about the Government's cuts to the arts, but I have been moderate, sensible and reasonable. Let us make this work properly by bringing the bodies within the compass of proper procedure. Let us make them accountable and, therefore, in the eyes of the public, respectable.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I am not sure that I can follow the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes)—certainly not about rugby. I must endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) has said. I find the drafting of schedule 13 odd for a number of reasons, not least because I have looked at similar legislation dealing with audit.

My understanding is that the Government are looking to extend the scope of auditing. It seems odd to me that the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales should not be included, given the nature of those august bodies. It would be helpful to those bodies if they were subject to full audit, because their awards are the subject of controversy—not from an audit point of view, but from the point of view of those who do not receive awards. I am sure that many hon. Members are aware of the controversy surrounding the awards. It would be in the interests of those bodies if they fell within the schedule. For that reason, the Minister should look at the schedule from the point of view of those bodies.

Mr. Swayne: I have essentially only one point to make—it is to distance support for the amendments from the case made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). The amendments are purely about financial accountability, and I reject entirely the case made by the hon. Gentleman that this is meat and drink for the democratic process.

It would have been no more appropriate to go further and take those bodies into the heart of the assembly, with Committees dishing out the funds for the arts and sport, than for a Committee of this House to undertake such a function. It is outrageous. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) wants me to give way, I shall happily do so, but he must not continue mumbling from a sedentary position. I cannot hear what he is saying.

Putting such powers in the hands of politicians would be most dangerous. It is outrageous to suggest that the task could be properly done by politicians, who do not have the expertise for it. As for the suggestion by the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) that this was merely an anomaly that the Government had inherited and with which they had to live, that is extraordinary. For a Government who are turning the constitution on its head to say that this is an anomaly is rather weak. They will have to do better than that.

Mr. Hain: This is starting to be quite fun. What I expected to be an extremely technical debate has opened up into a wide-ranging one.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) on a very effective contribution from the Front Bench. If he keeps that up, he will soon be challenging his hon. Friends for positions on the Front Bench. I seem to recall that, in a previous incarnation, he was a chief spin doctor for the Conservative party—indeed, that he might even have operated from Conservative central office. I congratulate him on bringing his talents to the Dispatch Box tonight. I also congratulate him on regarding me as likable and amiable, but I assure him that flattery will get him nowhere in this debate.

I respond directly to the Conservative Members who intervened with great eloquence in the past few minutes—I am sure at very short notice—to make some arguments about the amendments. Obviously, the short notice has encouraged them to overlook a central fact about the debate, about which I am sure that, in retrospect, they will be very embarrassed.

I wonder whether Conservative Members realised, as they went to great lengths to attack the Arts Council of Wales, question its credentials and wonder why the assembly was not abolishing it or taking control of it, that the chief executive of the Arts Council of Wales is

[Mr. Hain]

Mr. Emyr Jenkins, the father of Mrs. Hague, the wife of the leader of the Conservative party. In all humility, I think that the hon. Members for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) should have recognised that and perhaps taken his advice.

9.30 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson rose—

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Hain: I shall let the hon. Member for Tewkesbury intervene in a moment.

The chief executive of the Arts Council of Wales would have been able to instruct the hon. Gentlemen on the details of its royal charter and on why the amendments are unnecessary.

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Hain: I know that the right hon. Gentleman is extremely sore about the fact that I ran out of time to give way to him last time, so I shall generously let him in this time.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the Minister for his unusual generosity in giving way in one of his winding-up speeches. His remarks about the father of the wife of the leader of the Conservative party came rather strangely from the Labour party, because I had understood that the Labour party did not believe in nepotism. We do not; does he?

Mr. Hain: I am still trying to follow the relevance of that point, but I encourage the right hon. Gentleman to keep up that type of spirited intervention. I thought that nepotism was the product of the Conservative party over the years. While we are getting rid of the Conservative quango state, any trace of nepotism will be got rid of in this context as well.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) rose—

Mr. Hain: I think I was due to give way to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I remind the Minister that I described the arts council as an august body. I was suggesting that the measures contained in the amendments would add weight to those bodies and take nothing from them.

Mr. Hain: I understand the point. I was merely suggesting to the hon. Gentleman that, had he had time to obtain detailed guidance during the few days in which I am sure that he has been preparing his speech, he would have had the chance to consult Mrs. Ffion Hague, who I suspect is an expert, not just on the Arts Council of Wales, but on all of Wales. Given that she occupied a very senior position in the private office of the Welsh Office and, as I understand it, did extremely well and landed up marrying the former Secretary of State, she could have given the hon. Member for Tewkesbury a great deal of advice, after which he might have concluded that his intervention tonight was a little over-enthusiastic.

I appreciate that these may have been probing amendments; perhaps they were probing speeches as well. [Interruption.] Ah, we are going to get a Division at last, are we? I relish the prospect of a Division. We have been champing at the bit for a Division all evening. It is a measure of the fact that the Conservative party has adopted such a low-key approach to the Bill. Indeed, at times tonight the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)—Ribble-on-Wales—actually seemed to praise elements of the Bill. I welcome his conversion. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Welsh Office—and, I am sure, the Welsh assembly—will carefully consider resurrecting the Mumbles railway.

These probing amendments seek to establish why the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales will apparently be subject only to examinations by the Auditor General for Wales of their use of resources. Some legitimate questions have been raised, and I shall attempt to answer them. The royal charters of the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales make no reference—far be it from me to suggest that this is an anomaly—to audit arrangements. The current position is that, by agreement as set out in their management statements, the Comptroller and Auditor General audits the councils' grant in aid accounts. In other words, there are no auditing provisions in the charters of those two councils. Perhaps the matter was overlooked. That is why, by agreement, those special auditing arrangements are set in train by the Comptroller and Auditor General.

Under section 7 of the National Audit Act 1983, the Comptroller and Auditor General has powers to carry out examinations of the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the councils' use of resources. Far from ducking the issue, we believe that we should be firmer in the context of this Bill about the auditing arrangements that govern those two important quangos. The Government intend to invite the two councils to propose amendments to their royal charters that would confer on the Auditor General for Wales the function of auditing their grant in aid accounts. Therefore, although the Government agree with the purpose of the amendments, we believe that it is unnecessary to change schedule 13 to achieve the desired outcome. The Government intend that the charters, rather than an order under clause 136, should provide for the audit arrangements.

Mr. Rowlands: I am following the Minister as closely as I can. What if the two bodies concerned refuse to comply?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that Her Majesty would not want to be put in that position. My hon. Friend made some very good points—I suspect at short notice, but he was no less eloquent for that. The Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales are bodies created by charter or royal warrant. Therefore, the assembly would not have the power simply to amend their auditing arrangements and it would not be appropriate to do so in the Bill.

Mr. Rowlands: If I may pursue that point, the assembly would not have the power to amend those arrangements, but Parliament does. I drew attention to that fact in correspondence and through interventions in much earlier debates. I took advice from the Library, and it is clear that Parliament can overrule and change the arrangements. Is it a lack of political will, rather than a complicated technical exercise, that has led us to this impasse?

Mr. Hain: We decided—I am sure that my hon. Friend would have done the same in our position—that this was the best way to approach the issue. It was not a question of a lack of political will; it was a question of convention and the right and proper way to proceed.

Mr. Hanson: I have listened very carefully to the Minister's comments. Does he mean that the Conservatives in opposition have proposed an amendment that transfers powers from Her Majesty the Queen to the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises a very interesting question. I am not sure that that is the Opposition's intention—perhaps it is one consequence of their amendments. We are behaving with extreme decorum and responsibility in this matter, and it is interesting to note that Conservative Members are not doing the same.

Mr. Ancram: This is new Labour. This is modernisation.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman chides me for adopting new Labour practices. Apparently the Conservative party is considering changing not only its whole structure but possibly even its name. Plaid Cymru may do the same thing. Perhaps that is a consequence of the new inclusive politics that has been sparked off in the Welsh context.

Mr. Paterson: Can the Minister explain where the decorum and responsibility are in the clause? It is in breach of the statement made by the Secretary of State to the House when he introduced the White Paper. He said:

"The Assembly will be given sweeping powers to democratise and if necessary further restructure the quango state."—[Official Report, 25 July 1997; Vol. 298, c. 1124.]

He also said:

"No longer will our key public services lie in the hands of political appointees operating in secret and accountable to no one in Wales."—[Official Report, 22 July 1997; Vol. 298, c. 755.]

Can the Minister explain the anomaly?

Mr. Hain: There is no anomaly. The Bill is full of decorum and responsibility. As the hon. Gentleman refers to the bonfire of the quangos, I shall try to answer him fully in the time available. You will tell me, Mr. Martin, whether I am in order.

The five bodies that will be abolished spend £164 million. That is almost one fifth of the total sum spent by the bodies. If the assembly abolished all the bodies possible, there would be only 16 bodies left, compared to the 45 that exist now.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): On a point of order, Mr. Martin. What has that to do with the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales?

The First Deputy Chairman: The Minister is in order. If he were out of order, I would have told him so.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful, Mr. Martin, and I will stay in order as best I can. I am sure that you will keep me in order if I stray. With all due humility, I was answering a question that had been put to me.

The assembly has the ability to leave only 16 quangos in existence, if it so chooses. That amounts to a bonfire of the quangos, which we lit with the Bill, and we have complied with our commitments in the White Paper.

Why did we not abolish all the bodies? That brings me directly to the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales. They, together with three other bodies—the National Library of Wales, the National Museum of Wales and the Royal Commission on Ancient and Historical Monuments of Wales—are all bodies created by charter or royal warrant.

Unless the Conservative Opposition have suddenly become a republican Opposition, surely they would agree with me that it is for Her Majesty to agree changes to those bodies. It is not appropriate to amend them by means of a Bill. I am surprised at the blatant irresponsibility of the Conservative Opposition in suggesting that.

Mr. Wigley: If, as the Minister suggests, a voluntary change may be introduced by those bodies and taken through the appropriate channels with the palace, would it be the intention of the Secretary of State to use the provision under subsection (6) to amend schedule 13 to bring the two bodies into the schedule's purview?

Mr. Hain: I do not think that that would be necessary. It will be possible to accomplish the necessary changes as set out in the provisions of the Bill for auditing arrangements and other matters.

Mr. Letwin: May I intrude briefly on this amusing spectacle by asking for genuine clarification? Now that the Minister has admitted that the National Library of Wales, the National Museum of Wales and the Royal Commission on Ancient and Historical Monuments of Wales are also established by warrant or charter, can he explain why they fall not in part III, but in part I of the schedule? Is it because they already have in their warrants or charters provisions for audit that are different from those relating to other bodies?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that sensible and not excessively legalistic point. It is a straightforward and common-sense question. [Interruption.] The Whip says, "For a change." That is uncharitable.

Why does the Bill provide for the other charter bodies—the national library, the national museum—to be audited by the Auditor General for Wales? The answer is that grant is paid to the national library and the national museum under section 9 of the Museums and Galleries Act 1992, which also provides for them to prepare accounts and for those accounts to be audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General. It is therefore possible for an order under clause 138 to transfer those functions to the Auditor General for Wales. They are thus in a different position.

Mr. Rowlands: I am not a republican, but I am a parliamentarian. Will my hon. Friend confirm that Parliament can abolish such a charter?

Mr. Hain: As I understand it—from my point of view, I am straying into uncharted territory constitutionally—

[Mr. Hain]

Parliament is sovereign in this country. Therefore, presumably, it could do what my hon. Friend suggests. However, by convention that has not happened to royal charters.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Mr. Hain: Does the hon. Gentleman want to have a go at me again?

Mr. Letwin: First, I thank the Minister for his lucid explanation. I congratulate him on having found an instance—I think uniquely in the Committee's examination of such, and I quote, "legalistic points"—in which the Government and their draftsmen have not made an error that they subsequently need to write to somebody about to correct.

9.45 pm

Mr. Hain: Touché. The hon. Gentleman makes his point with his customary elegance and legalistic wit.

As for examinations of the use of resources by the councils are concerned—the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales—the Government propose that the Auditor General for Wales should have equivalent powers to those that are set out in the National Audit Act 1983. Clause 137 and schedule 13 provide for that.

The national lottery accounts of the councils are audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General under section 35 of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993. The Government have no plans to change that. To make the most effective use of auditor resources, the Auditor General for Wales will be able to use staff of the National Audit Office under clause 92, so that, as now, one team of auditors could order both sets of accounts. In the light of that explanation, I invite the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale to withdraw the amendment.

I wish to respond to some specific points which were raised by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale. He said that the Government were somehow embarrassed about sport and the arts. I confess, as a Minister, to being embarrassed about the performance of Wales at Twickenham last Saturday. It was the first time that I had been to Twickenham since I was carried off the pitch in January 1970, in the context of an anti-apartheid demonstration against the all-white South African team. Judging by the performance of Wales, it might not be a good idea if I were to go back too soon to watch them play.

The Government are not embarrassed about their commitment to sport, whether it be rugby, football or anything else. As a new Labour Government, through lottery and other provision we have committed ourselves to ensuring that we make Britain, and in our own context Wales, one of the best sporting nations in the world.

I move on to the arts and the responsibilities of the Arts Council of Wales, and the need to ensure, as the Bill does in the provisions that we are applying, that the accounts are properly audited. It is interesting, given the development of arts in Wales, which the Government are encouraging, that we are seeing a new arts movement emerging in a new Wales. We value our past in terms of opera and other arts as we value present achievements in opera, orchestra, choral music and male voice choirs, for example. I am the president of half a dozen male voice choirs in my constituency.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): Give us a song.

Mr. Hain: I think that that would be even more horrific than my speeches in the Chamber.

Mr. Evans: Impossible.

Mr. Hain: We are seeing a new wave of pop music in Wales. It is partly because of the activities of the Arts Council of Wales in recent years that a new wave of popular music has come through such excellent institutions as the Pontardawe international music festival, which takes place in my constituency. It is supported by the Arts Council of Wales. We have seen that new wave of culture coming through Wales, and we are determined to encourage it. Given the Bill's provisions and much better auditing arrangements, that momentum can continue.

Mr. Rowlands: Does my hon. Friend believe that an elected Welsh assembly would do anything less—indeed, it could possibly do a great deal more—to promote just such festivals as he describes? Is that not a case for greater democratic accountability?

Mr. Hain: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, because, in the context of arts provision and policy, one of the central objectives is that the assembly will enable us to involve all of Wales in influencing the overall policy for the arts and sport rather than having a limited group—under the Conservatives, some might have said an elite in Wales—influence its direction. We will have people from all over the country.

I hope that we shall see in the assembly young people who will support some of the excellent new Welsh pop bands, such as Catatonia, the Manic Street Preachers, Super Furry Animals, and the Stereophonics. Indeed, I was delighted to congratulate the Stereophonics on receiving an award at the Brit awards the other week. I did not have a bucket of water poured over me; they were delighted to see me. They are part of the new wave of music that is putting Wales right at the top of the pop agenda and on the international stage. As my hon. Friend said, the Welsh assembly will give greater strength and recognition to the new wave of pop music, with Wales leading the world not just in a democratic transformation but in the transformation of our popular culture. I am sure that the Bill's provisions will encourage that process. The amendments that the Opposition are tabling so destructively will undermine the whole popular movement for music in Wales.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale made a wide-ranging point, but I need to respond to it. He said that the Government were striking music, arts and sport—all of which are covered by the Sports Council for Wales and the Arts Council of Wales—from the national curriculum

Mr. Win Griffiths: Never.

Mr. Hain: As my hon. Friend reminds us, that would never be possible under this Government. We are reviewing the way in which the national curriculum is delivered in the classroom. We are saying that arts, sport and music must continue to be taught in primary and secondary schools. We have always valued the curriculum Cymraeg, the broader provision of education, and that is especially true of music, sport and the arts, where Wales prides itself on being ahead of England in the ability of our schoolchildren to perform in those areas.

Mr. Öpik: I apologise for being absent briefly from the debate.

Is the Minister seeking to help Wales to hit above its weight in the arts and sport, in the same way that Barnsley has scored an historic victory over Manchester United in the FA cup tonight?

Mr. Hain: I am interested in that information, because, as well as being vice-president of Neath rugby club, I am a Chelsea fan. It is nice to hear that result, if the information is correct.

In respect of arts policy and sports policy—in regulating the Sports Council for Wales and the Arts Council of Wales, overseeing their objectives and holding them to account—the assembly will ensure that Wales is put on the international stage. It will allow our sportsmen and women, our artists, pop musicians, male voice choirs, opera stars and the rest to have the backing of a national assembly for the first time, ensuring that their voices are heard across Europe and, indeed, the world.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that it is nothing short of a tragedy that, particularly in sport in Wales, we no longer have teachers who are thoroughly involved in getting on with the business of teaching youngsters sport? One of the consequences of that is, perhaps, less than good performances by some of our national teams.

Mr. Hain: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is important to their development. Proper rugby coaching in schools for those children who want it, boys and girls, would help Welsh rugby. I should like to see much better provision for sport in schools. I am discussing with the Sports Council for Wales and the Cricket Council for Wales how we might take that forward, possibly in co-operation with the private sector, but I hasten to say that that is not a matter for debate this evening.

We seek to lighten the burden on teachers of the over-restrictive and over-centrally directed imposition of the national curriculum, which makes it impossible for teachers to deliver on the core skills of numeracy and literacy in which Wales, as the rest of Britain, has fallen behind in recent years.

We are seeking advice from the Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales on how to introduce a new curriculum which will protect traditional subjects, such as the arts, music and sport, but allow an iron focus on the essential core skills of literacy in English and Welsh, and numeracy, without which our children cannot achieve their full potential in school.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the best things that can happen to schools is for them to be able to build on the kind of services that are provided by peripatetic teachers? The fewer peripatetic teachers there are, the poorer the standard of music will be. Does my hon. Friend accept that some schools now face difficult decisions because of the lack of cash for peripatetic teachers to ensure that we in Wales can build on what we are best at? Our schools have some of the best youth brass bands and orchestras in the United Kingdom, but they require cash.

Mr. Hain: Peripatetic teachers are vital, whether in respect of brass bands or music generally, or of the arts, but particularly in respect of music. The same principle could be applied to sport and I agree that that needs cash. That is one of the many reasons why the Government have introduced an extra £50 million funding for education to go straight into schools budgets in local education authorities throughout Wales, including in my hon. Friend's constituency.

I have in part responded to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), but I should just like to add to that before I conclude my remarks—much, I am sure, to the relief of the Committee. My hon. Friend asked why we were not subjecting the Arts Council of Wales and the Sports Council for Wales to the full rigours of accountability. We are doing that. They will be accountable to the National Assembly for Wales under the Bill. That will subject them to accountability by elected representatives from all over Britain.

Under clause 29, we have made it clear that royal charter bodies can only gain functions; they cannot be taken away. For those reasons and all the others which I mentioned this evening, I urge the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale to withdraw the amendment. I am sure that the arts and sports policies in Wales will be all the better if that is done.

Mr. Collins: We have had an extremely enjoyable debate. I particularly enjoyed the reference from the Minister, who will probably go down in history as the first Minister to have filibustered his own Bill, to the idea that the Conservative amendments would undermine the popular music movement across Wales. I know that the Conservative party is on the verge of once again becoming influential, but the idea that, throughout the Principality, electric guitars are being unplugged and drums thrown down as word of the amendments spreads across the land stretches credulity a little, even as far as the Minister is concerned.

We heard speeches by Labour Back Benchers and from Plaid Cymru, and excellent speeches by my hon. Friends, all of which made the argument. I am delighted that the Minister said that the Government agree with the purpose of the amendments. As he has said that he intends to look at ways of implementing the purpose of the amendments, and despite his evident enthusiasm for a vote, which extended almost to the point of goading, we shall deny him the opportunity of a vote. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Postal Services (Liverpool)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

10.1 pm

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): I am pleased to be able to deal with the issue of postal services in Liverpool at such a timely moment, as the decisions that will affect the quality of that service must shortly be made by the Post Office board under the overall policy direction of the Government.

I pay tribute to the men and women who work for the Post Office. May I narrow down my tribute and pay particular tribute to those who work for the Post Office in Liverpool and in the precincts of this House? I know from personal experience in both places how effectively they work, and that they often work under extreme pressure.

The Royal Mail prides itself on its ability to collect a letter anywhere in Britain and deliver it as quickly as possible anywhere else at a fixed price. If one purchases a first-class stamp, the letter is often delivered by the following day. That outstanding quality of service may be threatened in Liverpool by the Royal Mail's plans to remove the sorting of mail away from the city to Warrington.

That is part of the Royal Mail's £64 million investment programme to enable it to meet global and European challenges to its domestic markets. The investment is a welcome indication of the Government's commitment to ensuring that the Royal Mail in the public sector can compete with the best and face the challenges of the new millennium with cutting-edge technology, and with confidence that it can provide a top-quality service to its customers.

I am no Luddite, but I have a quarrel with one aspect of the strategy announced by the Royal Mail in June 1997, and that is what I wish to highlight in this debate. To do so, I must first outline the plan as it affects Liverpool.

In so far as it relates to the Royal Mail's north-west and north Wales region, the plan involves transferring processing from three mail centres, five outward vouching offices and three centres for bulk mail handling to new mail centres and a new regional distribution centre. The Royal Mail envisages a new Warrington mail centre replacing Crewe and Liverpool mail centres, a new Chester mail centre replacing the current Chester mail centre, five outward vouching offices in the Wirral and north Wales, and a new Crewe regional distribution centre replacing Brunswick Dock, Westhoughton and Lostock bulk handling centres.

However, ever since the announcement of those proposals, there has been a strong feeling in Liverpool that the Royal Mail is wrong to move more than 900 jobs to Warrington if they can be retained in Liverpool. I remind the House that Liverpool has an unemployment claimant count of 9.4 per cent., with male unemployment at 13.7 per cent.—one of the highest rates in the country.

The Government and the European Union recognise the relative deprivation. Liverpool is a European objective 1 area, which is a recognition of the fact that it is one of the poorest regions in Europe. The Government have also acknowledged the economic and social disadvantage that is clear for all to see in the city, and have granted Liverpool the status of an employment zone.

My constituency benefits from Government funding for regeneration through two single regeneration budget partnerships at Speke-Garston and Netherley valley. Many other regeneration initiatives throughout Liverpool are backed with Government money. Only last week, the Government approved an estates renewal challenge fund application for £43.78 million to assist in the regeneration of the public sector housing stock in Speke-Garston.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Does my hon. Friend recall that, only two weeks ago, she and I were at Ford's factory in Halewood congratulating the workers on being awarded the contract for Jaguar car production, which carries with it £43 million-worth of Government investment? The factory is located between our constituencies. It is a tragedy that such a good news story for Merseyside has been cancelled out by the Post Office's plans for the sorting office.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend must be psychic, because I was just about to make that very point.

The Pinehurst estate in the north of Liverpool has also benefited from the estates renewal challenge funding that was announced last week. As my hon. Friend said, Ford's Halewood plant has received £42 million of assistance from the Department of Trade and Industry, and I should like to commend the Minister on his role in that. Many of my constituents work at Halewood, although the plant is in my hon. Friend's constituency. That assistance will enable Ford's decision to build the baby Jaguar on Merseyside to be realised. The Department has also been actively involved in promoting business on Merseyside in other areas. It puts its money where its mouth is, to the tune of millions of pounds.

The Government have also given £13 million of extra money to repair rundown schools in Liverpool. I could use the whole of my speech to give examples of similar Government initiatives. Liverpudlians applaud the Government's concentrated effort to tackle the legacy of unemployment and poverty that long-term decline and 18 years of Tory destruction have left us.

Why should a major publicly owned concern such as Royal Mail, which should be expected to take its social responsibilities seriously, so blithely counteract the Government's good work and threaten to remove 900 jobs at a stroke? It should not, but I accept that operational decisions such as where to site new mail centres should be made by the Royal Mail and the Post Office board and not by the Minister. His role is to set overall policy guidelines, and I know that he would not be swayed to intervene by the facts that I have mentioned alone, although I have no doubt that he is sympathetic to my point of view. However, it should interest him to know that the business planning, evaluation and comparisons of alternative options on which Royal Mail based its decisions were fundamentally and seriously flawed. He should want to put the matter right.

While the work force and local Members of Parliament have campaigned on this issue, it has emerged that there is indeed a site in Liverpool that is better than the Warrington site chosen by Royal Mail for the new mail centre. It is at Speke-Garston, on the old Northern airfield site, soon to be launched as the Estuary business park in my constituency.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): Does my hon. Friend agree that, as the independent consultants' report—which has now been published—shows that it is more cost-effective for Royal Mail to stay in Liverpool, it would be extremely serious if it took action that would result in the loss of 900 jobs in the most deprived city in the United Kingdom? That would mean a loss of £16 million a year from the local economy, which would affect the whole community.

Maria Eagle: I could not agree more with that.

As my hon. Friend has said, it is not a matter of conjecture that the decision is strange. Like many of my hon. Friends, I have had the benefit of seeing an analysis by the business consultants PA, carried out on a like-for-like basis and using the same evaluation and modelling techniques as Royal Mail to appraise options. PA has not sought to add factors that would make Speke look better than Warrington; its role has been purely to check the rigour of Royal Mail's own option appraisal. Had Royal Mail done a rigorous job itself, one would have expected PA's analysis to result in the same conclusions as those of Royal Mail.

PA, using the same modelling techniques as Royal Mail, produced a very different result when it analysed the various sites. It disagreed with some of Royal Mail's assumptions about travel times to the rail hub for outward mail, and I must say that I agree with its worries. It does not take 40 minutes to travel from Speke to the rail hub at Warrington, as Royal Mail assumed in its analysis. Moreover, although we are often told that the Warrington site is adjacent to the rail hub, it is actually three miles down a road that is unsuitable for heavy goods vehicles, and is often congested. "Adjacent" is therefore a somewhat misleading description, and certainly a relative term.

Furthermore, PA could not fathom Royal Mail's rationale for sending all the mail to Warrington to be sorted, and then sending it back to Liverpool to be delivered. That clearly would adversely affect transport costs and distribution time targets.

It is no small matter, either: 60 per cent. of the mail to be handled at the new centre—whether it is built at Warrington or at Speke—originates from Liverpool, and half that mail is then returned to Liverpool to be delivered there. Meanwhile, only 27 per cent. of the overall volume originates in Warrington. Speke has 14 per cent. more volume returning to it than it originates. Surely it is important to sort the mail closer to where it is posted and to be delivered, if possible, than to transport it to a site by a rail hub that is not needed and then return it to its original point. I for one fail to see how that can be efficient.

I have referred to a few of the detailed points in the analysis, but, as my hon. Friend the Minister will know, there are many more. Let me summarise the full findings of the PA report.

The report shows that a mail centre in Speke is operationally as viable as a Warrington centre; it shows that land is cheaper in Speke, and that there is room for expansion; it shows that a Speke mail centre is cheaper to operate than a Warrington mail centre; it shows that 60 per cent. of the total mail to be processed at the new centre originates from Liverpool, so mail arrival times must be better in Speke than they are in Warrington; it shows that Speke has 14 per cent. more volume returning to it than it originates; and it shows that a Warrington mail centre will increase travel and subsistence costs for Royal Mail by £3.6 million over three years.

Using Royal Mail's own modelling techniques and data, PA has shown that the Speke site is £3.7 million less expensive to run—on a non-reoccurring account cost basis—than the Warrington site, and worth £4 million more in net present value terms. The report is a devastatingly effective document, and I commend it to the Minister. It raises serious questions—which I hope he will address tonight—about the quality of the Royal Mail analysis in respect of other decisions, and its use of public money in implementing them.

The PA report was commissioned by the Communication Workers Union nationally, in response to the CWU Merseyside amalgamated branch's request for back-up. I commend that local branch. Those who see Liverpool as a place bypassed by the modern world of industrial partnership and stuck in the past of industrial relations might have predicted that, faced with the threat of 900 job losses, the local branch would have responded by downing tools and walking out. Instead, the branch has conducted itself in a most exemplary manner, and has shown itself to be a fine example of a modern trade union. It has taken its campaign to the people of Liverpool, the Royal Mail, hon. Members and the Government, but it has ensured that its members kept working, and has constructively looked for a viable, alternative plan.

The union backed its judgment by producing a devastatingly effective piece of business planning which the national union commissioned on its behalf. That was done despite the worry about the future which I know that those working at Copperas hill have felt for the past eight months.

The union's forward-looking and positive approach has not stopped there. Until the introduction of new technology, preferably at Speke, the union has agreed to change working arrangements to bring in 30,000 items of mail in the early afternoon to ensure that it can be dispatched to the rail hub at Warrington in time for next-day delivery. However, the local management has not implemented the change, and one wonders why not. The local branch of the union is working closely with management to improve overall performance, and it is currently working with Royal Mail industrial engineers to see how staff can best be utilised. Those are hardly the actions of a militant or obstructive union branch.

The results of the PA analysis justify the union's approach. As the Minister knows, I have been pressing for some time for assurances that the constructive and positive way in which the campaign has been conducted will be rewarded with proper consideration for the Speke option.

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): My hon. Friend may find it helpful if I draw attention to the fact that, although usually in an Adjournment debate only the hon. Member initiating it and the Minister who will reply are present, there are 10 of us here with an interest in this matter. Royal Mail might like to take that into account.

Maria Eagle: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention.

Mr. Field: I am told that I cannot count.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend certainly counts. I had not noticed how many of my hon. Friends were behind me, but I notice that not many Opposition Members are here.

I have some questions for the Minister. Is he happy that Royal Mail is assessing the Speke option fairly, fully, and against consistent and rigorous criteria? If necessary, will he intervene to ensure that the Royal Mail decision is soundly based? What does he make of the fact that Royal Mail has been unable properly to assess net present values, and, in view of PA's findings, is he sure that the rest of Royal Mail's analysis is robust enough to be implemented?

As Royal Mail is using public resources for major investment, is the Minister confident that its decisions are based on proper business planning and financial competence? I understand that Royal Mail originally ruled out the Speke site without even visiting it. When does he expect Royal Mail to make a decision in respect of the Speke-Garston option? Is he content that, on the day that the union presented the PA report to Royal Mail, it called for final bids from seven tenderers to build the mail centre at Warrington that it had originally planned? Does that show that Royal Mail has made up its mind, and has no intention of changing its plans?

Although I accept that Royal Mail will not enter into binding contractual arrangements in respect of Warrington before returning to the union, does the Minister think that it is sensible for Royal Mail to expect its tenderers to go to the expense of submitting final bids for a particular site before a decision has been made to build the mail centre there? On the basis of his knowledge and the PA report, does he think that option A, which is to build a mail centre at Speke-Garston, should be followed?

Finally, I invite the Minister to visit the Estuary business park in the near future when his parliamentary business is not quite as exhaustingly pressing as it was on the last occasion. Such a visit will enable him to see for himself the advantages of siting the mail centre there.

10.18 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) on securing this debate on postal services in Liverpool. I should like to declare an interest. I am married to an Evertonian, and my wife's family all live and work in Liverpool. They are probably more interested in how I respond to the debate than are my hon. Friends. I shall pick carefully through the issues that have been raised, because I am keen to maintain a safe and enjoyable family weekend for the first time in many months.

When I have time to do so, I should be more than happy to visit the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Garston. I have already visited her constituency on at least two occasions since becoming a Minister, and I look forward to visiting it again. As my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) said, I was there on the day that the massive new investment at Halewood was announced. I hope that I have time in my reply to give the House details of other investments that have been made and to advise my hon. Friend the Member for Garston of other investments that will be made, with the Government's support, in Merseyside.

My hon. Friend the Member for Garston, the Minister for Welfare Reform, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), and my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) and for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) have discussed those matters with me, and I acknowledge the close interest that they have had in the subject since last June. They have maintained—with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) and my hon. Friends the Members for Knowsley, South and for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts), and with Liverpool city council and the Communication Workers Union—their involvement in the matter, and have assiduously raised their concerns with me and my Department.

Before responding to the issues of postal services in Liverpool that have been raised in this debate, it is important that the House should understand the matter's broader context. Postal services at both national and local level—in the form of letters delivered to the door or services provided through the nationwide network of post offices—are an important element, on either a personal or a business level, in everyone's daily life.

It is therefore only natural that plans for change might cause concern. When those plans centre on proposals for major investment in automation and introduction of new technology, there is understandable concern, as in Liverpool, about the loss of local employment, local identity and the quality of service that is so closely tied to local postmen or postwomen.

My Department has had discussions with the Post Office on Royal Mail's proposals because of such concerns. Last summer, I met the CWU and Liverpool Members, to hear their views and to discuss their concerns.

At my insistence, Royal Mail subsequently opened discussions on its strategic investment programme with the CWU, and offered to provide the CWU with data on its preferred north Wales and north-west scheme, and with data on other options that it had considered but had rejected on operational and financial grounds. Royal Mail agreed also not to make irrevocable purchase commitments for new sites, and to consider any alternative proposal made by the union within three months. At the union's request, the Post Office subsequently extended the time limit to four months.

Royal Mail's primary duty is to develop and maintain an efficient and competitive postal system on both a national and a regional level. Its overall investment programme is designed further to improve its standards of service, which are already among the highest in the world. That programme accords also with a policy advocated, for example, by the Communication Workers Union in a consultative document that it issued last autumn, which calls for a substantial increase in the Post Office's capital investment programme.

Royal Mail's planned £64 million investment in the north Wales and north-west region, which was announced last June, is part of its national programme of progressively developing a network of automated processing centres and distribution centres. Those are equipped with the new technology necessary to handle more speedily and accurately the increasing volumes of mail, to improve the quality of service for customers and to maintain its competitive position in the communications market.

An efficient and modern postal infrastructure is obviously very important in attracting new investment and jobs to the north-west and in maximising the potential of the major regeneration projects that are now under way in the region. Unfortunately, Royal Mail's proposals will lead to a net loss of 400 full-time equivalent jobs in the region—comprising 800 from Liverpool and 300 from the Bolton area—which is offset by about 700 jobs at new automated processing centre and regional distribution centre sites.

Royal Mail envisages that a substantial number of Liverpool staff would transfer jobs if a site were eventually agreed at Warrington.

Mrs. Ellman: Does my hon. Friend accept that, given the economic and social circumstances in Liverpool, it will be very difficult for Liverpool workers to travel to Warrington? This is because there is a far lower than average level of car ownership in Liverpool, many jobs are part-time, and the shift times, particularly for women, mean that it would be extremely difficult for the distances involved to be overcome.

Mr. McCartney: I recognise my hon. Friend's argument. Indeed, it has been put to me many times and was deployed as part of the socio-economic case for the site to be in Speke-Garston instead of Warrington. Over the next few days, many people will no doubt put it again to the Post Office to illustrate what impact the people of Liverpool believe a decision to locate the operation at Warrington will have. I have previously assured my hon. Friend the Member for Garston, and did so again today, that the points she has made in relation to the potential cost of relocation have been delivered with some force to the Post Office.

I said at the outset that there have been recent successes in attracting new jobs to Merseyside. In addition to the new Jaguar X400 line at Halewood, there will be 250 jobs at QVC at Knowsley, and a £40 million investment by Medeva is expected to create 100 new jobs in the important pharmaceutical and drugs industry, which has also received substantial additional investment from Glaxo and Eli Lilley.

The north-west as a whole is now the top UK region for attracting call centres, which is a rapidly growing sector. Of course, a few years ago, Merseyside won additional postal jobs, from my constituency and other parts of the north-west, in the restructuring of Parcelforce operations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Garston has highlighted the substantial level of Government funding being injected into Liverpool in recognition of its objective 1 and employment zone status. This is part of my work at the Department, and we have made substantial efforts to ensure that our strategy in relation to objective 1 status and the attraction of inward investment has been successful since we came into office. I believe that we will continue to be successful in attracting new investment and job opportunities to Merseyside, including Liverpool.

While the proposals clearly have negative features in employment terms for Liverpool, and also for the Lostock and Westhoughton areas of Bolton, it is important to recognise the scale of Royal Mail's long-term commitment to the north-west and north Wales region, whatever the final decision may be. What is clear is that, without any major investment in automation to maintain Royal Mail's competitive position, regionally and nationally, there would over time be a progressively much greater loss of postal jobs in the region than is currently envisaged.

In agreeing to defer any irrevocable commitments to a Warrington site, and to consider seriously any alternative options put forward, Royal Mail did, however, make it clear to the union that contingency planning for its own preferred option would continue while alternative options were being explored. My hon. Friend asked what was happening in relation to the Warrington site, and that is my response to her.

It was made absolutely clear from the outset to the union and others that while alternatives were being considered, there would be no decision to make binding commitments to the Warrington site, but, at the same time, contingency planning had to continue. That is precisely what has happened.

Maria Eagle: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McCartney: Not at the moment, as I have only three minutes left to finish my remarks.

I know that Royal Mail has been studying carefully the alternative proposals set out in the report. I am arranging an early meeting with the chief executive of the Post Office to discuss the results of its analysis and studies of the alternative Speke-Garston proposal. Decisions relating to the operational arrangements for the postal businesses are and must remain a responsibility of the Post Office board and management.

My locus in what is essentially a management issue is limited to satisfying myself that, in the case of the north-west and Liverpool operations, the alternative options have been fully and fairly considered and judged on consistent and rigorous criteria on a like-for-like basis. When I have done this, it will then be for the Post Office to reach its final commercial decision, which it will discuss with the CWU as soon as it is in a position to do so. Following that, it will meet Members of Parliament for the area to give them its decision on this potential new investment.

Maria Eagle: Does the Minister consider that inviting final tenders to build a plant is contingency planning?

Mr. McCartney: I cannot be any more specific or open with my hon. Friend than I have been. The Post Office gave the commitments in good faith; I intervened personally to ensure that an alternative proposal was made. Having exerted my influence in that manner, there was no way I would countenance any undermining of the professional viability of the proposal. What has happened is a matter of due process. It has nothing to do with irrevocable decisions that would render that process null and void.

That was not the reason I made the decision. If I had not felt that the process of having a potential alternative was right, I would have been open, frank and honest from the outset, last summer, in saying: "This is the site; go ahead with it." I hope that that assurance is of assistance to my colleagues.

Last summer, the people of Liverpool were worried that the Liverpool postmark was going to be lost. I took representations on that, and I can confirm that Liverpool's postmark will continue in use indefinitely. The Post Office has offered a commitment in that respect.

There has been unhelpful press speculation during the past few days to the effect that Girobank is to announce a complete withdrawal from its operations on Merseyside. That is completely speculative. It would be wrong at this stage to assume that the review will result in job losses. A refurbishing—

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Individual Learning Accounts

1. Mr. Wyatt: If he will make a statement on the role of individual learning accounts in the workplace and the home. [29877]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published yesterday our consultation document "The Learning Age". That set out our proposals for developing individual learning accounts to help people to take more control of their learning and manage their own careers.

Mr. Wyatt: Will my hon. Friend explain how people who are out of work might benefit from the learning initiatives and credits, and what impact they might have on the national grid for learning and the university for industry?

Dr. Howells: Individual learning accounts will focus in particular on those who are currently out of work and would like to acquire new skills in order to return to work. The accounts will run alongside a range of other Government initiatives, such as the new deal, which is aimed specifically at 18 to 24-year-olds and is designed to help them to return to training and education, and to obtain work.

Through the Green Paper, we are consulting on how that will impact on the national grid for learning. We believe that the grid will extend to colleges and universities, and to public places. The individual learning initiative will be linked in many ways to many parts of the national grid for learning, and to the whole education and training spectrum.

Mr. Willis: We were deeply disappointed by the Green Paper that was published yesterday, but one feature that pleased us was the introduction of individual learning accounts. That has long been a Liberal Democrat policy, and we are glad that the Government have adopted it.

To date, have any financial institutions expressed interest in taking up the 1 million £150 bank accounts that are to be introduced as part of the policy? Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer already ruled out the two other important elements of individual learning accounts—tax relief on income put into the accounts by employers or individuals, and the matching of income by the Treasury?

Dr. Howells: I am very glad that the Liberal Democrats have seen fit to support individual learning accounts. We think that this is an excellent initiative, and we are very encouraged by the response of industry. We have discussed the initiative widely with industry, and we will continue to do so. We hope very much that employers will see the sense of topping up individual learning accounts: we think that they are an excellent way in which to promote training, and we think that training equals better profits. The best firms understand that, and are already putting a great deal of money into training—£10.5 billion last year. We want to do everything to encourage them.

Mr. Derek Foster: Will my hon. Friend commend the managing director of Thorn Lighting in Spennymoor? Speaking about the work force, he said, "We discovered that with every pair of hands we were given a free brain." Is it not true that most employers only scratch the surface of all the skill and talent that they have in their work force? Is that not why lifelong learning and individual learning accounts are crucial?

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend is right. Many firms contain enormous potential that has hardly been recognised, and certainly has not been developed. We must encourage employers to take such action—especially the great mass of small and medium-sized enterprises that are often firefighting just to stay alive. All too often, such employers worry only about their margins and their bottom lines. We need to reconfigure the whole delivery of training and education, so that it is tailored to meet the requirements of employees and employers, and to improve their competitiveness and that of the country.

New Deal (Long-term Unemployed)

2. Miss McIntosh: What representations he has received from long–term unemployed people concerning their eligibility under the new deal. [29879]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Disability Rights (Mr. Andrew Smith): I have received a number of such representations. The new deal for adults who have been unemployed two years or more will start this June, and we are currently considering piloting the extension of the new deal approach to cover those who have been unemployed for a shorter period.

Miss McIntosh: Does the Minister find that the Secretary of State supports his view that the success of the Government's new deal policy will be proved by making the downward trend move even more rapidly, and that the long-term unemployed under-25-year-olds—those who have been unemployed for more than two years—are the hardest target to help now? Their chances of leaving the count are only 57 per cent. What measures do the Government intend to announce for the summer, and what take-up has there been from the private sector for the new deal to help the long-term unemployed under 25?

Mr. Smith: The new deal for the longer-term unemployed has not started yet, but, when it does, we shall all see the take-up from employers. The initial signs are encouraging in terms of the overall support and participation in the new deal by both small and large businesses. On the current trends in unemployment, of course the new deal first offers help to the younger unemployed, but we shall be introducing help for the longer-term unemployed. It is interesting to note that while unemployment has fallen sharply for the young unemployed, it has also fallen equally sharply for the older and longer-term unemployed.

Mr. Reed: Although I welcome the emphasis we have placed on young people and getting the young generation back to work, will my hon. Friend accept that in many constituencies such as mine in Loughborough, where many people lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector, those in their 40s have much to offer this country, particularly engineers who have been made redundant over the past few years? The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) will know about this, as Loughborough used to be his constituency. We know full well that those people have much to offer. Can we ensure that we move as quickly as possible to bring into the scheme those in their 40s who have another 20 years to offer?

Mr. Smith: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend about the contribution that older unemployed people and older workers have to make. That is why we are extending the new deal to the older age group in June, and it is why we maintain a wide range of programmes aimed at helping older workers back into jobs. It is also why I am consulting on how we can most effectively tackle discrimination in the workplace, which so badly afflicts the prospects of so many of those trying to get back into work.

Mr. Willetts: Does the Minister accept that there are more people who have been unemployed for more than two years than there are young people who have been unemployed for more than six months? Can he defend the fact that 90 per cent. of the budget will go on young people and only 10 per cent. on the long-term unemployed? Does not he remember that, in the Chamber the other week, he said that the reason why the Government could not support legislation to ban age discrimination in recruitment advertisements was that their new deal would be caught by it?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman would do well to remember that, thanks to the legacy we inherited from his Government, youth unemployment is still twice the level of unemployment among the rest of the work force. The damage done to those young individuals, starting on what should be a life in work, but being consigned by the policies of the previous Government to a life on benefit, is incalculable, not only to them but to the communities in which they live and to the level of crime in this country. We make no apology for keeping our promise to get 250,000 young people off benefit and into jobs. We will help older people as well through the measures I have announced today.

Mr. Sheerman: Will my right hon. Friend remember that there is a lost generation in this country—lost due to the incompetence and unfeeling nature of the former Government? Many people became unemployed in the early 1980s during that bitter recession, and many of those in our towns and cities have not worked to this day. The sooner the new deal gives them a chance to get back into work the better.

Mr. Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend. Providing such a chance is why, from June, those workers will be eligible for a £75 a week subsidy for six months as they move into employment, and why they will be eligible to take up the training and study opportunities that they were denied by the Conservative party.

New Deal

3. Mr. Paterson: What representations he has received on the new deal. [29880]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Alan Howarth): We are receiving enthusiastic support from across the country. In the 24 hours following the launch of the new deal television advertising campaign, we have received more than 780 calls, mainly from employers. Most importantly, the reaction from unemployed young people themselves in the pathfinder areas has been very positive. Last week, 154 young people who were not yet eligible for the new deal presented themselves early.

Mr. Paterson: In the past 15 years, small businesses employing fewer than 20 people have created 2 million jobs, enjoying the benefits of our deregulated, free-market economy. The Federation of Small Businesses has stated that, if business rates were sharply reduced, small businesses could take on up to 25 per cent. more employees. Has the Minister received representations from such organisations on reducing Government-imposed business costs with the money that Ministers have confiscated from the utilities?

Mr. Howarth: It is really very sad that the Conservative party appears to be indifferent to unemployment among young people. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Disability Rights reminded the House a moment ago, the Conservative party left youth unemployment at twice the national average and at twice the level that it was in the early 1980s. Now, the hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that we should not bother about unemployment among young people. Of course we desire to create conditions in which businesses, including small businesses, can prosper. However, a very large majority of the 1,362 employer agreements to take part in the new deal that have already been signed are with small and medium-sized enterprises.

Miss Melanie Johnson: Will the Minister join me in welcoming the fast-growing enthusiasm among employers for signing up to the new deal? Perhaps that enthusiasm is attributable to the fact that real-life employers have been used in the national advertisements, and that their enthusiasm is evident to everyone watching them. Does he agree also that young people's enthusiasm is growing? For the first time, they are getting a real chance to combine what they want, what they can offer and what employers want. That opportunity is making a tremendous difference to the new programme.

Madam Speaker: Before the Minister replies, I note that the hon. Member for North Shropshire

(Mr. Paterson), who tabled the question, has left the Chamber. I remind hon. Members that they must wait until the question is finished.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed, Madam Speaker, the indifference of the Tory party could not have been more vividly shown. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) is absolutely right: the new deal is a massive undertaking—a real national effort—in which it seems that the only people who do not want to be involved are those in the Tory party. However, Conservative Members' support will be welcome. There is, in my experience, a welcome for the sinner who repents, and I encourage them to overcome their embarrassment—which we all understand—and join employers and voluntary organisations in a shared commitment to provide effective help to those who have been the casualties of the policies of the later years of the Conservative Government, and those who are most vulnerable to the processes of economic change.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Is it not a fact that the Government can find only approximately a half of the quarter of a million young people whom they want to help in the new deal? Do the Government still assert that the new deal will be cost neutral, despite the fact that 17 similar schemes undertaken in 10 Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries have proved to cost far, far more and to be extremely expensive? Is not unemployment still falling in this country because of the excellent economy that the previous Government left? Is the new deal, therefore, not irrelevant?

Mr. Howarth: The penny seems slow to drop. The Conservative Government left unemployment among young people at twice the level that it was among other groups in the population. We think that a proper—a vital—responsibility of Government is to address that. Each month, about 15,000 to 20,000 young people pass six months' plus unemployment, and we, for our part, will not give up on them.

Basic Literacy

5. Mr. Gerald Howarth: What plans he has to enforce standards of basic literacy in schools. [29882]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): Literacy is at the heart of our drive to raise standards. By the end of this Parliament, we expect 80 per cent. of 11-year-olds to reach the standard expected for their age in English. We have made the curriculum more flexible and reduced bureaucracy so that primary schools can focus on the basics, and we have allocated £59 million to support literacy in 1998–99.

Mr. Howarth: The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Howarth), was speaking a moment ago about sinners who repent. We greatly welcome the fact that, at long last, the sinners in the Labour party are repenting of their failure to acknowledge the importance of the three Rs in providing our children with the basic ability to compete in the world. We appreciate what the Minister has done, but why has it taken so long? After all, the Labour party has been in charge of delivering education at local level across much of the country. What is the Minister doing to ensure that our teacher training colleges understand the importance of the three Rs, especially literacy, in their curriculum?

Mr. Byers: We have changed the initial teacher training curriculum so that teachers are taught how to help children read. The hon. Gentleman might like to reflect on the legacy that we inherited whereby one in four 11-year-olds failed to reach the expected level in English. He should give some thought to what is happening in his local education authority area. Hampshire, I am pleased to say, has agreed that, by the end of this Parliament, 88 per cent. of 11-year-olds will have reached the required level.

The hon. Gentleman might also thank the Government on behalf of the schools in Aldershot which, as a result of an announcement made three weeks ago, will have 8,000 new school books this financial year. That is an example of the Government not just talking about raising standards, but providing the resources to ensure that it happens.

Mr. Clapham: Although I understand that there is a need to improve literacy standards, does my hon. Friend agree that there is a place for the creative arts? Will he consider what might be done in the future to ensure that the creative arts are included on a wider basis in education?

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has established a creative arts curriculum group which will report on how we can develop the non-basics in the primary curriculum. However, we have to get the basics of reading and writing in place before young people can benefit from the creative arts.

Agenda 2000

6. Mr. Sanders: What representations he has had from local organisations with respect to Agenda 2000 and the reform of the European structural funds. [29883]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): I have received three representations from further education and from the Confederation of British Industry. In addition, my right. hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Disability Rights has held meetings with the Alliance for Regional Aid and the Local Government Association.

Mr. Sanders: The Secretary of State will be aware that the structural funds are divided up by regions across the whole of the European Union. The Devon and Cornwall region receives around £191 million from the present programme up to the year 2000. The problem is that, in future, the region that will determine how the programme affects our area will be the whole of the south-west region. Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that the special problems of Devon and Cornwall, which make the area distinct from the rest of the south-west, will be recognised in the new programmes after 2000?

Mr. Blunkett: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and

I will make every possible representation. That includes providing the foundations from our presidency in getting right Agenda 2000, and ensuring that the European social fund and the remaining structural funds are used effectively so that we protect our areas from the changes that are inevitable in that new period of funding.

Mr. O'Hara: Given that the European Union is now confident that provision for the expanded Community can be catered for from growth within the European economy, and given that the United Kingdom is currently classed as the fourth poorest of the European countries, will my right hon. Friend assure me that he and his colleagues will be fighting to ensure that there is no reduction whatsoever in the UK share of structural funds after 2000?

Mr. Blunkett: As my hon. Friend knows, it is important to this country that the assessment is based on gross domestic product and the real economy. As things improve, we hope that there will be less need for investment in regions that currently suffer deprivation, such as his area and my area. We need specifically to protect objective 2 programmes—we shall take every possible step to ensure that we do so.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is it not clear that Her Majesty's Government would be unwise to look to the European Union in the longer term to sustain jobs in regions of high unemployment in the United Kingdom, particularly in view of projected enlargement? If the European Union is unable to support British jobs, is not it crucial that the Government reduce the net British contribution in the next quinquennial financial perspective from 2000? Is not it of paramount importance that the budgetary bind has no adverse effect on enlargement?

Mr. Blunkett: The negotiations to ensure that we receive from the European Union what we put into it, and the way in which we balance broad economic objectives across the 15 nations—more when the Union has expanded—with the need to invest regionally, are part of the programme that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Cabinet are addressing. If we had had a better environment in which to approach these issues, we would obviously have been able to make more rapid progress.

Mr. Pearson: European structural fund money has played a major part in the economic regeneration of the physical fabric of Birmingham and the west midlands, and has improved the work force's employability. In welcoming my right hon. Friend's comments on the importance of objective 2 and the reform of the structural funds, may I encourage him to make representations in the strongest possible terms so that we receive our fair share of European regional money in the west midlands and in the rest of the United Kingdom? Proposals that mean that the United Kingdom will suffer a disproportionate cut are not acceptable.

Madam Speaker: Is there a question there?

Mr. Blunkett: I will do my best to answer the question as I perceived it. The answer is yes. I will ensure that, at the joint education and social affairs informal meeting in London on 12 and 13 March, we start to address these issues, so that we highlight the importance to the United Kingdom of the structural funds and draw the press's attention to the significance of getting Agenda 2000 right. I hope that that answers my hon. Friend's question.

Madam Speaker: Or his comment.

Unemployment (Regional Disparities)

7. Mr. Wigley: What steps he plans to take to reduce regional disparities in unemployment levels. [29884]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Notwithstanding welcome falls in the overall level of unemployment and, indeed, some narrowing of regional disparities, we recognise the deep-seated problems in Wales, notably in the valleys and rural areas. That is why we are proposing an expanded role for the Welsh Development Agency—which will work with the national assembly—and the initiatives in the new deal, such as employment zones and regional selective assistance.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that my constituency has the highest unemployment rate—9.4 per cent.—in Wales, but does not have full development area status? Is not it time to consider the panoply of tools that are available to the Government—to the Department for Education and Employment and to the Department of Trade and Industry—to ensure that all avenues are explored in order to bring down these unacceptably high levels of unemployment?

Mr. Smith: Indeed, which is one of the reasons why we set up prototype employment zones—the one in Wales includes the right hon. Gentleman's constituency—to explore new ways in which to pool existing streams of funding and to harness local community effort from the bottom up, in partnership with the Government's wider approach. We are doing that precisely to generate jobs, to enhance employability and to give hope to those of the right hon. Gentleman's constituents who are in long-term unemployment.

Ms Moran: I am pleased to hear my right hon. Friend welcome the prototype employment zones. Will he join me in welcoming an initiative that will tackle the severe problems of the long-term unemployed in areas of persistence and long-standing unemployment? Will he consider extending the initiative to areas such as my constituency in central Luton? Does he agree that focusing on local problems and local need is infinitely more effective than the standardised schemes that were the legacy of the previous Government?

Mr. Smith: Yes, indeed. Partnership and the bottom-up approach are integral parts of the new deal, which will benefit the older and longer-term unemployed as much as the young unemployed. Partnership with business, local councils, the voluntary sector and environmental groups will bring real hope to those who suffer the legacy of the failed policies of the previous Government.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: While I recognise the problems in the Caernarfon constituency, which are always ably articulated by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), will the Minister give me an assurance that the Government have no proposals, under the new deal or anything else, that will damage the prospects of areas with low levels of unemployment such as my constituency of Macclesfield, which has about 2.2 per cent. unemployment?

Mr. Smith: Indeed not. Under the new deal, help goes to the individual, so unemployed people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency will receive help in the same way as unemployed people elsewhere. The particular focus of the new deal on enhancing employability and equipping people with skills means that it will be good for the wider community and the young long-term unemployed in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and good for business.

New Deal (Retail Sector)

8. Mr. Love: What representations he has received from the retail sector about the new deal. [29886]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have had discussions with representatives from retail organisations about the new deal for young people, and have been very pleased with the enthusiasm and commitment that they have shown. Many retail organisations have already signed national employer agreements, including Dixons, W H Smith, Tesco and Sainsbury.

Mr. Love: I thank the Minister for that reply. Is he aware that many young people eligible for the new deal will want to work in the retail sector? The agreement whereby in-house training provided by retail companies can be translated into National Vocational Qualifications has been warmly welcomed within the industry. Will he ensure that all future arrangements include the same combination of high-quality education and appropriate qualifications to ensure the long-term job prospects of the young people involved?

Mr. Smith: Yes, indeed. It is a core requirement of every aspect of the new deal that it should supply high-quality training to a recognised standard. That is why the agreement that we have reached with the retail industry is not only of value in ensuring that well-regarded in-house training arrangements are translatable into progress and NVQs, but is a model for framework agreements in other sectors which we shall also be pursuing.

Unemployment

9. Mr. Gapes: If he will make a statement on his Department's measures to reduce unemployment. [29887]

Mr. Andrew Smith: We shall continue with policies for sustainable economic growth and employability that create employment opportunity for all, including raising educational standards and extending lifelong learning, as well as the new deal and other Employment Service measures.

Mr. Gapes: I am grateful for that reply. Will the Minister continue to make sure that the Government's policy to get people off benefit and into work will lead to long-term employability, and real skills and education so that they will have long-term prospects in the job market, in contrast to the failed policies of the previous Government—the Mickey Mouse jobs and the so-called schemes which left so many young people bitterly disillusioned about their prospects of getting work in future?

Mr. Smith: Yes, indeed. My hon. Friend is right to say that the new deal will offer real jobs and qualifications leading to a life in work instead of a life on benefit. That is why every employer agreement—subject to the young person progressing satisfactorily and being sufficiently well motivated—commits the employer to providing a continuing job beyond the period of subsidy. That is why we insist that young people have at least the equivalent of one day a week training towards a recognised qualification. As those features of the new deal become better known among young people as well as employers, hundreds of youngsters are trying to get on to the programme early.

Mrs. Browning: The Minister will be aware that, among the people on benefit whom the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) mentioned, are people with learning disabilities, who might be quite capable of carrying out the tasks required in the workplace but whose essential difficulty might be communication and behavioural problems. What, in practical terms, do the Government intend to provide as support either to them or to the workplace to enable more people with learning disabilities to get off benefit and into work?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Lady raises an important concern. That is why the programme provides for early entry into the new deal for disabled people, including those with learning difficulties. They will not have to be in receipt of jobseeker's allowance for six months before being able to receive the benefits of the new deal. Those benefits will include, as a follow-up to the initial gateway interview, assessment of their particular needs and referral to specialist course and agencies, including voluntary groups with a track record of success in working in the community, to ensure that needs are addressed. Another core feature of the new deal is such tailored help, which responds to individuals' needs. We want to ensure that those with learning difficulties or other disabilities get a fair deal through the new deal.

Mr. Barry Jones: May I remind my right hon. Friend of the tens of thousands of redundancies in the steel industry over many years? Many of them took place in my constituency. We have also lost development area status and objective 2 status. Many estates, streets and communities are still trying to pick up the pieces following the redundancies. Will the new deal help the long-term unemployed?

Mr. Smith: Yes, it will. My hon. Friend's constituents will be able to benefit from the employer subsidies for recruitment and the training and study opportunities that the new deal will make available from June for long-term unemployed people—as well as being able to benefit from the wider application of the principles of employment zones, which I described earlier.

Education Funding

10. Mr. Spring: What steps he is taking to ensure that funding from central Government for education is actually spent on education by county councils. [29888]

Mr. Byers: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has written to the leaders of local authorities to emphasise that the increase in resources of more than £1 billion should be passed on to schools. Of that, more than £10.7 million should be going to schools in Suffolk.

Mr. Spring: In practice, educational provision in the county of Suffolk, for example, is under threat. In practice, for the first time in the county's history, school budgets are being cut. Would the hon. Gentleman like to take this opportunity to apologise to all parents, teachers and governors who, having heard his party's education, education, education slogan, now know that they have been bitterly let down and misled?

Mr. Byers: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not allow prejudice to get in the way of fact. He needs to be aware that the Government have provided £10.7 million for schools in Suffolk—way above the rate of inflation. That is only half the story. If the hon. Gentleman looks at Suffolk's capital provision, he will see an extra £1.2 million for school building this year and, for the coming financial year, no less than £5.3 million for capital spending for Suffolk schools. That is another illustration of a Government who do not just talk about raising standards, but provide resources to see that it happens.

Ms Hodge: I congratulate the Minister and his colleagues on the extra money that they have found to put into schools. Does he share my concern that some local education authorities are not passing on to schools the money that the Government have made available? Would he, in particular, condemn Conservative-controlled councils such as Kensington and Chelsea, which is keeping more than 30 per cent. of its education budget centrally? Will he take steps to make the allocation of education spending at local authority level more transparent so we can see where the money is spent?

Mr. Byers: I deeply regret the decisions taken by the councillors in Kensington and Chelsea not to pass on the considerable additional resources that the Government have provided to them. They will be held accountable in the May local elections by the parents, teachers and governors of the schools of Kensington and Chelsea because of their failure to put education first. That is the top priority of the Government. We have provided the resources and we want local authorities to provide that money to schools so they can join with the Government in raising standards and giving our children the best possible start in life.

Mr. Dorrell: Does the Minister accept that the acid test of the Government's commitment to education will be the movement in school budgets when those have been finalised by local authorities in the next few weeks? Does he not understand that all the rhetoric—of which we have heard more this afternoon—rings hollow in schools around the country where budget increases seem likely to be barely more and, in some cases—as my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) said—less than, inflation? Is it not the case that the balloon of expectation pumped up last year by the Government has now burst and that it is clear that the Government's priority is not education, education, education, but presentation, presentation, presentation?

Mr. Byers: That was one prepared a bit earlier today. For the first time in many years, schools throughout the country will have an above-inflation increase in resources—provided by this Government. Every council has had its capping level lifted so that it can passport the new money directly for school spending. That is another illustration of the Government putting standards first. Most importantly, the acid test of the Government will be the fact that, at the end of this Parliament, a greater percentage of our national wealth will be spent on education than when we took office.

Citizenship Education

11. Dr. Tony Wright: What plans he has to include citizenship education in the national curriculum. [29889]

Mr. Blunkett: I have appointed an advisory group on citizenship and democracy under the chairmanship of Professor Bernard Crick—with you, Madam Speaker, as its excellent patron—to ensure that we can develop, as part of the review of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, both citizenship and democracy education for the future.

Dr. Wright: We have been talking about the importance of educating young people in citizenship for the past 30 years or more; the problem is that we have only ever been talking about it. Will my right hon. Friend respond to the report of the group, when it comes—I congratulate him on setting it up—in terms of two principles; first, that a democracy has an obligation to educate young people in citizenship; secondly, we shall make progress only if it now becomes a requirement, and not merely a recommendation?

Mr. Blunkett: I am keen that we do not repeat the situation that appertained when the previous Labour Government lost office, when Baroness Williams was in my post. She was still talking about this subject when the Government were defeated. We now need action to ensure that the curriculum reflects the critical importance of citizenship and democracy to equip our young people for the world of tomorrow so that they understand the structures of our society and democratic institutions, and their part in holding the Government to account.

Mr. Brady: Will the Secretary of State ensure that citizenship education also makes an important allowance for educating children on the importance of keeping promises, such as that highlighted in The Times this morning? The report states that the Prime Minister wrote to a Doctor Tillson, assuring her that her children would continue to receive funding under the assisted places scheme until their education at their school was complete. That promise has now been broken. Is that not a bad example for the Government to set?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall ensure not only that people understand the importance of keeping promises, but that they can read so that they may get the promises right. The promise we made we shall fulfil. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the previous Government's scheme to extend assisted places to primary education had not yet been implemented at the point to which he refers.

Fiona Mactaggart: Does not Britain provide less social and civic education than other countries with a national curriculum? In my right hon. Friend's review of the national curriculum, will he consider ways to include the provision of social and civic education?

Mr. Blunkett: The answer is yes, and the Minister for School Standards will introduce proposals, in consultation with the Department of Health, so that we can ensure that personal and social education is supported by health education. In that way, we shall have a clear picture of our support and help for young people in the future.

Training and Enterprise Councils

12. Mr. Llwyd: What current review there is of the operational efficiency of training and enterprise councils in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [29890]

Dr. Howells: We are looking at the efficiency of all the organisations we fund as part of the departmental spending review.

Mr. Llwyd: Is it not time to evaluate the work and results of TECs? In particular, is it not time to consider whether many of their functions could better be performed by colleges of further and higher education?

Dr. Howells: We are looking closely at what the TECs do so that we can ensure that they are focusing on the objectives of this Government, including providing proper value for money; ensuring that the TECs rid the part of the training and education system that they fund of fraud and abuse; and improving the performance of weaker TECs to the level of the best TECs. Some good TECs are doing valuable work in improving the competitiveness of the regions that they serve.

Mr. Bill O'Brien: I thank my hon. Friend for his assurance that the TECs will be investigated. Many of my constituents have been let down by the Wakefield TEC, because the shortage of skills and lack of training has been apparent in an area with many redundant mineworkers. In reviewing the efficiency of TECs, will my hon. Friend take especial interest in the Wakefield TEC, because it has failed many local people?

Dr. Howells: I know that my hon. Friend and his colleagues from neighbouring constituencies have assiduously monitored the progress of Wakefield TEC. It has had special problems, of which we are aware. A few improvements have been made recently, which will make a significant difference. I assure my hon. Friend that we are looking closely at Wakefield TEC and will draw several lessons from its failure to provide the goods in its training schemes.

Mr. Dorrell: I welcome the generally favourable approach that the Minister is taking to TECs, which he continues in his replies this afternoon. Will he confirm that almost the only firm decision that was included in the glitzy presentation yesterday was the cut of £150 million in the money available to the TECs, which he has just endorsed? Will he explain why he thinks it sensible to announce a reduction of £150 million in the resources available to a scheme that he supports, before the review that he mentioned earlier takes place?

Dr. Howells: The right hon. Gentleman has once again completely misunderstood the situation. The TECs have £280 million languishing in their reserve accounts that should be used to provide education and training. Those sums have been sitting there for years in some cases and we aim—we have consulted the TECs on the subject—to make that money work. It will work by providing individual learning accounts, which will improve the lives of the people who live in the regions served by the TECs.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), is not part of the problem of TECs and further education colleges as training providers in areas where there are skills shortages and a higher age of unemployment that insufficient investment has been made in appropriate training opportunities? Will my hon. Friend look at that during his review?

Dr. Howells: That is a central function of the TECs and, where they have failed, it is nothing short of a disgrace. They were set up by the previous Government to provide exactly the sort of functions described by my hon. Friend. During the review, we shall make sure that, in future, no TEC will be guilty of a dereliction of duty of that sort. It is absolutely vital that, if they spend large amounts of taxpayers' money, they spend it well and provide the skills and training required in their regions.

Higher Education Funding

14. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: When he plans to meet the chairman of the Standing Conference of Principals to discuss higher education funding. [29892]

Dr. Howells: My right. hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to meet the chairman of the Standing Conference of Principals, but the Department is in close contact with all the higher education representative bodies.

Mrs. Bottomley: I hope that the Secretary of State will urgently review that decision. My constituent, the excellent Professor Norman Taylor, principal of the outstanding Surrey institute of art and design, expects to meet the Secretary of State shortly. The Secretary of State will be aware that students already feel betrayed because, far from accepting the Dearing recommendations—as the Prime Minister rather ill-judgedly asserted yesterday—the Government have rejected Dearing and are abolishing student maintenance grants and hitting the poorest students harder. The principals will make it clear that they are fed up with the mountain of propaganda. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where's the question?"] I hope that the Minister will be able to give some reassurance—that is a question—that the beneficiary of those measures will be higher education and not the Treasury.

Dr. Howells: I am aware, Madam Speaker, that you have asked us to deal only with questions. We have just heard a good speech, although I did not believe a word of it. If we are going to talk about betrayal, we believe that the betrayal of students was the reduction by a quarter in funding per unit over the previous 10 years. That was nothing short of a disgrace, and we are going to reverse that.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: When my hon. Friend does meet the principals, will he bear in mind that top-up fees will deter students from lower-income families? Will he stand firm in ensuring that having no top-up fees becomes part of the Government's strategy?

Dr. Howells: I can give my hon. Friend an absolute assurance that top-up fees play no part whatsoever in our proposals.

Further Education Funding

17. Mr. Allan: What plans he has to give extra funds to the further education sector. [29895]

Mr. Blunkett: The Government have allocated, within the spending control totals, an additional £100 million for further education in the coming year, plus the substantial proportion of new deal expenditure on both day-release and in-house training and the full-time education option available to young people from April onwards.

Mr. Allan: Does the Secretary of State let the House expect the regional development agencies to have a strategic planning role in the provision of the FE sector and its funding in future? How does he expect the relationship between regional development agencies and the regional committees of the Further Education Funding Council to evolve?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I expect there to be a strategic part that regional development agencies can play, both in the planning of further education provision and in terms of the development of meeting skills needs. That is why we appointed Chris Humphries to chair the new skills task force and why it will be working at regional as well as national level. That is why we think that further education has a critical role to play and why "The Learning Age" Green Paper and our consultation will concentrate heavily on sharing with the community as a whole the task of getting it right for the future, so that, instead of snipers and cynics, this country can have a programme that equips the whole nation for the economy of the 21st century.

Mr. Chaytor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a considerable part of the additional £100 million announced at the end of last year was tied into new initiatives for the colleges and planned growth for next year and so did not compensate for the loss to colleges of the cutting of the demand-led element by the previous Government? Does he have plans to ensure that colleges will receive further funds for the 1998-99 financial year?

Mr. Blunkett: As I have already said, we have allocated £100 million plus. We cannot compensate automatically for the lost years in which further education was extremely badly treated by the previous Government, with the imposition of enormous productivity gains and changes in unit funding. What I can promise is that the changes in resourcing as a consequence of our changes to funding for further and higher education will ensure that those funds are reinvested, as part of our comprehensive spending review, in lifelong learning as a whole, which includes both further and higher education. The future for further education and lifelong learning is better than any that this country has ever known, and it is our intention to make sure that we get it right.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Secretary of State confirm the findings of the House of Commons Library research paper that the Government will take £2.5 billion out of the pockets of students in the next three years under their proposals; that, in order to make it even remotely feasible for students to go to university, the Government will have to lend back £2.25 billion to those students, with the result that virtually none of the money that Dearing identified as being needed will be available to put into higher education? That is all of the burden and none of the benefit.

Mr. Blunkett: I can see that we need a numeracy as well as a literacy strategy. I have never heard such claptrap in all my life. We are not taking money off students. We are providing the resources that students need and expanding the amount of money and then collecting—[Interruption.] I am being heckled wonderfully, Madam Speaker. If Opposition Members would listen, they might learn a little. The truth of the matter is that students will then, on a progressive basis, repay only at a time when their income allows them to do so. So we are not taking money from students but providing money for students.

Within five years, we shall have raised through our proposals as much as £800 million for reinvestment. I spelt that out on 23 July and I spell it out again now. I hope that Opposition Members can get it right for the future.

School Non-attendance

18. Mrs. Humble: What measures he is taking to reduce the rate of non-attendance at school. [29896]

Mr. Byers: We are providing direct, practical help by supporting locally devised projects in 119 local education authorities at a total value of £22 million in 1998–99. We have also consulted widely on detailed new guidance for schools on attendance issues and will be issuing the final version of this shortly.

Mrs. Humble: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and for the £0.5 million that the two education authorities in my area will receive. Does my hon. Friend agree that projects such as those being developed by Lancashire and the new unitary authority of Blackpool, which involve both parents directly in schemes to combat non-attendance and other agencies, are vital as part of a partnership and a shared approach to deal with this difficult problem?

Mr. Byers: I am delighted that the Government have been able to provide an extra £0.5 million to local education authorities in my hon. Friend's area. It is a clear demonstration that the Government take non-attendance seriously. We believe that children who do not attend school not only lose out on valuable education but drift into crime and anti-social behaviour. That needs to stop and we are now putting measures in place to ensure that it does.

Mr. Bercow: Is the Minister aware of the proportion of cases of truancy in which the parents are unaware of what is happening? It seems essential that, if the problem is to be tackled, we discover at what stage the parents become aware of the activities of their children.

Mr. Byers: For the first time since 1 May, I am going to agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is right. Proper education works well when the school and the parents stand shoulder to shoulder with the pupil. The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, but, looking at the empty expanse of green Benches opposite, I think that we need to have a non-attendance programme for Conservative Members of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman is one of only 17 who have sat through all of Education and Employment questions this afternoon.

New Deal (Men Over 40)

19. Mr. MacShane: What proposals he has to extend the new deal programme to men over 40 years of age. [29897]

Mr. Andrew Smith: New deal provision for adults, including men over 40, who have been unemployed for two years or more will start this June. We are also considering piloting the extension of the new deal approach to cover those who have been unemployed for shorter durations.

Mr. MacShane: I welcome my right hon. Friend's reply. Is he aware that, in Rotherham, some 50,000 men lost their jobs under the Tories? The equivalent of five army divisions were destroyed by Conservative economic policies. Those men, many of whom are now too old to get work but too young to die, are the legacy of those wasted Tory years. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, excellent as the new deal is for young workers, we should not forget our obligation to men over the age of 40 as our policy develops?

Mr. Smith: We certainly shall not forget them, I am pleased to reassure my hon. Friend. That is why, in June, we shall extend the benefits of the new deal to the longer-term older unemployed, and why we are considering how to extend to them the support that the gateway provides, as well as the advisory support that is available and the subsidised employment opportunities. If that can be delivered with the innovation, energy and dedication evident in partnerships such as that which has been pursued in Rotherham, the older unemployed will have hope for the future.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): May I ask the Leader of the House to make a statement on the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): The business for next week will be as follows.

MONDAY 2 MARCH—Completion of consideration in Committee of the Government of Wales Bill.

TUESDAY 3 MARCH—Opposition Day [8th Allotted Day].

Until about 7 pm, there will be a debate on ISAs, PEPs and TESSAs, followed by a debate on the countryside. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

WEDNESDAY 4 MARCH—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Consideration in Committee of the Scotland Bill (Sixth Day).

THURSDAY 5 MARCH—Until about 7 pm, completion of consideration in Committee of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

Motion on the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Partial Continuance) Order.

FRIDAY 6 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be as follows.

MONDAY 9 MARCH—Remaining stages of the National Minimum Wage Bill.

TUESDAY 10 MARCH—Opposition Day [9th Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

Remaining stages of the Fossil Fuel Levy Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 11 MARCH—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Progress on remaining stages of the School Standards and Framework Bill.

Remaining stages of the Wireless Telegraphy Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 12 MARCH—Remaining stages of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

FRIDAY 13 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

Mrs. Shephard: I thank the right hon. Lady for giving us the business for two weeks. As she knows, we greatly appreciate the fact that she manages to give the House the provisional business for the second week. I know, as does she, that it has been quite tricky to arrange that business this time. We understand that business management is becoming more complex, because it is difficult to predict how long Committee stages will take, and we appreciate the fact that the Leader of the House endeavours to keep her pledge.

May I ask yet again for a debate on the national health service? Last week, we had the embarrassingly steep rise in NHS waiting lists, and this week there has been another embarrassment for the Secretary of State for Health with the disclosure that, despite his protestations, the Public Administration Committee has revealed that he has been packing NHS trust boards with political nominees. The Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), has rightly criticised the Secretary of State over the fact that 111 out of 113 council appointments came from the Labour party. The House should have a chance to debate those matters in Government time, together with the seven statements made by Health Ministers since the election, given that the only debate on the NHS since 1 May has taken place in Opposition time.

Will the Leader of the House also provide time for a debate on her Government's abuse of this House? I am sorry to have to put it to the right hon. Lady in that manner, because I know that she feels strongly about the issue, given the views that she has expressed in the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons. It is important that the House should not be sidelined and insulted by the constant stream of announcements, press briefings, conferences held outside the Chamber and disclosures on the "Today" programme.

Last week, the Leader of the House promised in good faith that the House would be informed before the wider world about the contents of the millennium dome. However, baby dome was announced on the "Breakfast With Frost" programme on Sunday and on Tuesday, the day that the glitzy launch took place at breakfast time, there was a written answer from the dome Minister saying that the Prime Minister's speech on the subject would be placed in the Library when it opened at 10 am, after the launch. The Government's plans for lifelong learning were also disclosed outside the House, and the House was thrown a sop in the form of a written answer.

The consequences for the Government of that arrogance were demonstrated yesterday, when the Minister for the Environment had to come to this place and apologise for briefing an outside group before he briefed the House. I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's apology, which was gracefully made. However, it would have been less embarrassing for him and for the Government if their cavalier and rather hostile attitude to the conventions of parliamentary democracy had not made that apology necessary.

I feel sure that the Government will wish to arrange an early debate on social security issues. The amount of pre-Budget press briefing, with or without the knowledge of the Secretary of State for Social Security, has resulted in mess, muddle and confusion. With the Secretary of State supposedly sticking to her line that cuts in lone-parent benefits are necessary—although who could be quite sure—the Chancellor's people telling the press that he has bowed to Back-Bench pressure on lone parent benefit cuts, and the Prime Minister yesterday denying it all, we need a little clarity in that area. The House does not deserve that contempt of parliamentary democracy. I ask the right hon. Lady to insist that her ministerial colleagues adopt the view that she expressed so admirably to the Hansard Society earlier this week.

Finally, as the right hon. Lady said, we shall devote part of our Opposition day to a debate on PEPs, TESSAs and ISAs. Will the right hon. Lady assure the House that the Minister responsible for those matters, the Paymaster General, will reply to that debate?

Mrs. Taylor: On the last point, a senior Treasury Minister will reply to the debate. With regard to the pre-Budget speculation about the Department of Social Security, the right hon. Lady should take the advice that the Prime Minister offered during Question Time yesterday, when he dealt with that matter very clearly.

As to the right hon. Lady's request for a debate on the national health service, she should read again the report of the Public Administration Committee that was published last week—I thought that Conservative Members might refer to it last week, but, as usual, they are a week or two behind. That report did not criticise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health in the way that the right hon. Lady suggests. All appointments to NHS boards since the election have been made on merit and in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the Commissioner for Public Appointments. It is important that we abide by those guidelines, and my right hon. Friend has done that.

The right hon. Lady's other questions were about what she described as abuses of the House. I informed her and the whole House last week that the House would be kept informed about developments regarding the millennium dome. That was the case, and written parliamentary questions were answered. There has been no change of policy. I do not think that many hon. Members would want the House to be used as an exhibition centre or would consider it a good use of our time if we were to examine the details of the dome in this place, when we should be discussing legislation that is currently before us.

With regard to the Green Paper on lifelong learning, the right hon. Lady will recall, as she was a member of the previous Administration, that it was quite exceptional for any Green Paper to be the subject of a statement to the House.

I am glad that the right hon. Lady welcomed the graceful apology, as she described it, given yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment on the right to roam. I wish that the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) had been as gracious in accepting that apology. If there was any abuse of the House, it was from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): I am after another debate on Iraq—not on whether we should bomb or invade, but on what we should do to help the Iraqi people to achieve democracy, peace and economic and social progress. When I raised the matter on Tuesday with the Prime Minister, he twice said that we are doing everything we can to help in those areas. May we have a debate to discuss the details of what we are doing, and what we think we should do, to assist in those areas?

Mrs. Taylor: I understand the concern, which is shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Our quarrel is not with the Iraqi people but with Saddam Hussein's regime. My hon. Friend will know that many Government Departments have provided assistance to the people of Iraq. Indeed, during Health Question Time this week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health detailed some of the help that was included in that programme. I do not think that it is possible to find time for a debate, but it is important that that information should see the light of day.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Is the Leader of the House aware that, during the student lobby yesterday, official police photographers took close-up pictures of some of our constituents in an intimidatory way, to try to discourage them from exercising their normal rights as citizens? Will she inquire whether that is normal practice? In future, will old-age pensioners, the disabled and farmers be photographed in that way? Is not that an abuse of the normal right of access of citizens to the House and to us as Members?

Secondly, has the Leader of the House made representations to the BBC, on behalf of us all, about the way in which it is dumbing down parliamentary and current affairs programmes that report to the nation the many activities of the House? Is she aware that in some parts of my constituency it will be impossible to listen to "Yesterday in Parliament" or "Today in Parliament"? Any increase in the number of times that "The Week in Westminster" will be broadcast—it will have a small audience on a Thursday—simply will not compensate for that. I hope that she will make representations on behalf of the whole House.

Thirdly, is the Leader of the House aware that there is all-party concern about anxieties expressed in all parts of the rural environment, about the way in which 10 months have made even worse the product of 10 years and more of Tory neglect of rural areas? Will she now recognise that there is anxiety on both sides of the House to make real what the Prime Minister is apparently prepared to concede is necessary: a new approach to poverty, deprivation and services in all parts of the rural community?

Mrs. Taylor: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I had not heard anything about the taking of photographs yesterday. I am sure that he has taken that up with the relevant authorities.

On the issue of the BBC, the hon. Gentleman may recall that you, Madam Speaker, invited hon. Members to comment, and I think that you made representations at the time. The hon. Gentleman may know that the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport met this morning and questioned senior representatives of BBC Radio on the matter. The Select Committee has asked that no changes be made until it has published its report and recommendations. I am sure that the BBC will consider that request carefully.

On the issue of the countryside, I at least welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman recognises that the problems in rural areas have been growing for the past 18 years and have not developed in nine months, but it is a false dichotomy to say that there is one group of problems in the countryside and another in urban areas. Many of the Government's policies on health, transport, housing, education and crime are relevant wherever one lives.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will my right hon. Friend please insist to the BBC that its plans should not include cutting down on scrutiny of Select Committees, which is usually an important part of its reportage? If those outside the House are to know what is happening day by day, they must rely on accurate representations of what we do from the BBC, not on a series of cheerfully written and wholly inaccurate reports that relate only to the individual idiosyncrasies of Members of Parliament.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend will recall that one thing that has happened in recent weeks is that the House now produces, as a result of some of the Modernisation Committee's recommendations, a weekly list of all the Select Committee hearings, stating the topic and who is giving evidence. It is in everyone's interest that there should be a greater awareness of what happens in Select Committees, and serious reporting such as we can get through those programmes is useful to people outside. Those who want that information often find it difficult to get it in other ways.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Following a debate in the other place on 18 February, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate in this Chamber on the restitution of assets to victims of Nazism, especially in the light of the extremely worrying comments of the Minister who participated in that debate, who implicitly suggested that the Government would take no action in returning those assets to victims of Nazism? If she cannot find time for a debate, will she at least ask the appropriate Minister to make a statement as soon as possible in this House?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is right to anticipate that I cannot find time for a debate in the near future. His wisest course of action might be to apply for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. James Wray (Glasgow, Baillieston): Will my right hon. Friend allow time for a debate on the fluoridation of public water supplies? There has a move by Ministers to push the fluoridation of public water supplies, and I want us to debate the moral and medical aspects of that, because it is in breach of the Food and Drugs Act 1956 and section 130 of the Medicines Act 1968, and was thrown out of the Scottish courts under the Water Act 1945. It would be unfair of Ministers to try and push that issue, especially given that there is a free vote in the House and in the Labour party.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend will be aware that Ministers, in Scotland and the rest of the country, are consulting on health-related matters, and a Green Paper touches on the issue that he raises. My hon. Friend and others may wish to respond to the consultation that is taking place.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): Will the right hon. Lady consider an early debate on local government democracy, particularly on coalition government? Is she aware that last Thursday, Mrs. Lesley Salter won the Chalkwell ward for the Conservative party from the Liberal Democrat party, as a result of which Southend council is now made up of 19 Conservatives, 13 Liberal Democrats and seven Labour councillors? Does she agree that it is improper for the seven Labour councillors to continue to prop up the 13 Liberal Democrats?

Mrs. Taylor: I do not think that we can have a debate on local government in Southend—or, as some hon. Members have suggested, in Basildon.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): First, may I support the plea by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) for a further debate on Iraq? As founding chairman of the all-party land mine eradication group in the House, may I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the accelerating momentum around the globe for the development and discipline of policies on humanitarian de-mining and clearance of unexploded ordnance? That is of increasing interest. Improving the clearance rate would greatly help third-world aid projects, and there is pressing interest in the level of Government involvement in land mine eradication programmes. I seek a half-day debate on the subject.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend raises two serious issues. I answered the first when responding to a previous question. The whole House welcomes the progress that has been made on land mine eradication. It is appropriate for the House to debate such issues, but he knows the pressure of business as well as everybody else. I am afraid that I cannot hold out the prospect of an early debate on that matter, important though it is.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I press the Leader of the House for an early debate on the current situation in Northern Ireland, so that the House can explore how far the two Governments have danced to the tune of terrorists, of whatever ilk, and moved from the Mitchell principles? There were to be no preconditions to the talks, but Sinn Fein now says that it will not go back into the talks until it has met the Prime Minister. Sinn Fein is due to return on 9 March; I suspect that it may not go back in until after the purported meeting on 10 March. Surely that should not happen.

Mrs. Taylor: Clearly, the issues to which the hon. Gentleman refers are serious. All Hon. Members want the talks to succeed, and we are all aware of our responsibilities to choose our words carefully and to try to advance the peace process rather than cause difficulties. At the moment, an early debate is not possible, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland tries to keep the House informed. I am sure that that approach will continue.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Bearing in mind the fact that during Question Time we had an exchange on citizenship, is my right hon. Friend aware that it is totally unacceptable for the BBC to put forward plans whereby "Yesterday in Parliament" would be broadcast on long wave only? That programme has an audience of more than 1 million people; half, or more, will be lost if the BBC proposals go ahead. "Today in Parliament" lost half its audience when it went on to long wave.

As the House is not divided over the matter, will my right hon. Friend and the shadow Leader of the House make a joint representation to the BBC and tell it that it has no business whatever marginalising the proceedings of Parliament? Without Parliament and our democracy, there would be no BBC. I hope that there will be unanimity on this. Wearing her Commons hat, not her Government hat, will she and the shadow Leader of the House see the BBC people as soon as possible?

Mrs. Taylor: I have already acknowledged the strong feelings on both sides of the House, which were expressed some months ago when the plans saw the light of day. I have also outlined to the House the action taken today by the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport. The BBC chairman will be available in the House on 12 March to meet hon. Members on the matter. A meeting between Madam Speaker and the chairman has already been arranged for 17 March. I hope that there will be sufficient opportunity to ensure that the BBC is in no doubt about the strength of feeling on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Will the right hon. Lady make time for a full debate in Government time on countryside issues, because they are undoubtedly at or near the top of the list of parliamentary anxieties? Does she agree that it might be worth while attaching to Bills a rural impact statement, to test the interests of rural communities against those of towns, to ensure greater equity? Does she further agree that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer put more duty on petrol, he would be inveighing against rural areas?

Mrs. Taylor: I think it right to assess the environmental impact of legislation when it is introduced, regardless of the nature of that legislation. I entirely reject the hon. Gentleman's basic premise that the issue is "rural versus town". I do not think that it does anyone any good to try to portray it in that way, or to try to pretend that the problems that have arisen in rural areas have become apparent only in the past nine months.

Gillian Merron (Lincoln): There has been publicity recently relating to the industrial tribunal criticisms of Lincolnshire police authority and the handling of grievance and disciplinary procedures, which have been the subject of investigation by Humberside police—although, regrettably, their report remains secret. Will my right hon. Friend allow a full debate on the matter, so that we can make progress in increasing openness and effectiveness?

Mrs. Taylor: I know that my hon. Friend has asked questions about the issue before. Fortuitously, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is present, and will have heard what she has said today. I cannot promise a debate in Government time, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will find other ways in which to pursue the matter.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I agree with the concern expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the action that the BBC may take to reduce coverage of Parliament's activities, and I thank the Leader of the House for taking such a positive stance. May I express the hope that the governors and chairman of the BBC will note what Parliament feels—and what I think people outside feel—before taking any irrevocable action?

Can the Leader of the House also tell us when a statement will be made, or a debate take place, about the roads review that is currently being undertaken?

Mrs. Taylor: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will make his voice heard during the consultations that I mentioned—and I am sure that the fact that the chairman of the BBC is to be in the House has not escaped his notice. Given the hon. Gentleman's reputation, I expect that he will be present then. I think that a positive stance has been adopted on all sides.

I am afraid that I cannot say anything about the roads review at this stage, but I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman is warned of when it will be completed.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If there is a statement or a debate about the implications of the march of the rural communities, will my right hon. Friend bear this in mind? I speak as someone who has been in the House for more than 20 years, representing a rural constituency 30 miles long and about 20 miles wide. One of the problems that we face in the rural villages—more than 20 altogether—is that they were utterly ruined by the last Tory Government, who shut every single pit in every single pit village, and created a BSE crisis that has hammered all the small farmers in my constituency. Almost all the ruin and breakdown of the social fabric has been a direct result of what was done by those Tories, many of whom will be cheering people on at the beacons and in Hyde park on Sunday. Let the country know where the trouble started, and let us remember that we shall have to mend all the problems created by that lousy lot.

Mrs. Taylor: I hope that my hon. Friend catches your eye during Tuesday's debate, Madam Speaker. As someone who has represented a rural constituency for more than 20 years, he is well placed to examine the problems that exist there. I think that rural areas gave their verdict on the last Government—and it is significant that there are now more Labour Members representing rural constituencies than Tories and Liberal Democrats put together.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the Leader of the House please arrange for a debate on the relationship between the House of Commons and the Government in the context of the extent to which the Government are increasingly refusing to answer questions tabled by Members of Parliament? Does the Leader of the House realise the number of occasions on which written questions in particular, but also oral questions, are met with what amounts to a point-blank refusal to divulge information that should rightly be in the public domain, not only now but particularly in the light of the oft-repeated claims by her Government that they believe in open government? Surely it is time for a debate on that matter, in order to get it out into the open and regularise it.

Mrs. Taylor: As a member of the former Government, the right hon. Gentleman is showing his usual lack of memory in these matters. There have always been holding answers and limited answers. More questions are being asked and, often, the quality of the answer reflects the quality of the question.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): I am sure that I speak on behalf of many colleagues from the Merseyside area if I once again appeal to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to give consideration to a full debate in the House on the Hillsborough disaster. My right hon. Friend will be aware that in the week since the publication of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's report, there has been intense and increasing concern and anger on Merseyside and in the wider region.

The whole affair gives rise to a wide range of issues relating to the management of disasters and their aftermath. A full debate in the House would, for once, give us a full and adequate opportunity to address the issues. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary might even welcome an opportunity to make a full response on the record. A debate would also provide a full opportunity to explore what could and should be done about what my constituents regard as an unclosed chapter of history.

Mrs. Taylor: There is to be an Adjournment debate, which has been secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), a week on Monday. I am sure that that will not be considered sufficient to cover all the issues that hon. Members would like to raise. We all have enormous sympathy for those involved, and we understand hon. Members' desire to raise those issues. However, as last week, I have to say that I do not rule out the possibility of a debate on the matter, but I do not want to raise false hopes that there can be an early debate in Government time.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Can the right hon. Lady grant the House an early debate on foreign affairs, so that right hon. and hon. Members may have an opportunity to hold Her Majesty's Government to account on their policy towards European Union enlargement, which is supposedly at the heart of their Euro-presidential efforts? That is particularly important in the light of early-day motion 827 on Estonia, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) and signed by 39 hon. Members.

[That this House notes the importance of the 80th anniversary of Estonian independence on 24th February; welcomes the decision to include Estonia in the first wave of European Union enlargement negotiations, due to start under the UK Presidency of the European Union in April 1998; notes that Tallinn, the capital, is a thriving city with a successful stock market, banking, business and insurance sectors, is a growing tourist destination and presents increasing opportunities for British business investment; notes the positive efforts made by Tallinn City Council to prepare for membership of the European Union and to promote the inclusion of the Russian minority; and calls on the UK Government to encourage British investment in Estonia and the UK's relations with Estonia.]

The right hon. Lady will be aware that the President of Estonia is in this country this week, and it would be a symbolic gesture and would be warmly welcomed if Her Majesty's Government could give that commitment.

Mrs. Taylor: I understand why the hon. Gentleman thinks that that is important, but he will know that I have announced the business for the next two weeks and that much of the following week is to be taken up by the Budget debate. Important though those issues are, it is not always easy to find time when hon. Members request it. I shall bear that in mind, but I cannot raise hopes of an early debate.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Can the Leader of the House squeeze some time out of the calendar to allow a proper debate and a Division on the BBC? All the protests have been made and the BBC continues to show complete contempt for anything said in the House. Putting "Yesterday in Parliament" on long wave is like sending it to Siberia—all we get on long wave is Radio Baghdad. Putting "The Week in Westminster" on Thursday means that no hon. Member is likely to be able to listen to it. Sending the chairman down here is not enough. He may be bland, but we are not blind. We do not want this public relations schmoozing; we want a proper debate. I think that a deeper strategy is involved, because I believe that certain senior BBC executives want to decouple the BBC from the public and the nation and possibly want to privatise it. The House must take this much more seriously than simply meeting the odd delegation or sending the odd letter of protest.

Mrs. Taylor: The action that I have already outlined—that the Select Committee will report on the matter, that the chairman of the BBC will be made available in the House to discuss it, and that he is to meet you, Madam Speaker—is not mutually incompatible with a debate: the problem is finding time for one. One way of securing a debate would be if many hon. Members were to enter the ballot for a one-and-a-half-hour Wednesday morning debate. By the law of averages, one of them might be successful.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the right hon. Lady find time for a statement next week by the President of the Board of Trade, in which she can clarify, once and for all, whether the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe, Lord Simon, has paid to charity the profit on the sale of his BP shares? Lord Simon gave a specific public undertaking to make that donation. The right hon. Lady will recall that I have raised that issue before. When I last raised it with her, she claimed that Lord Simon had done the right and proper thing. Did she mean by that that the donation had been made: yes or no?

Mrs. Taylor: As I have said before, my noble Friend has done the right and proper thing, by obeying all the established rules on the conduct of Ministers.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As we are not yet, alas, out of the Iraqi marsh, may I hark back to the questions of my hon. Friends the Members for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) and for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), and ask the Leader of the House to reflect again that it is not sufficient to say that we have no quarrel with the Iraqi people? As a letter from four recent ambassadors to Baghdad, Sir Donald Maitland and our arms negotiator, David Summerhayes, in today's issue of The Independent makes clear, there are real on-going problems. The Leader of the House replied to my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire that the Secretary of State for Health had made a comment during Health questions, at column 172, in reply to a question from me, but that was—necessarily—a very brief comment. Before Easter, could she not reflect on whether we should have a follow-up debate?

Mrs. Taylor: I do not think that we can have a debate in the near future on that specific point. My hon. Friend is a very experienced hon. Member and very often finds time to raise issues, regardless of the fact that there will not be a debate in Government time.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): The right hon. Lady will be aware that the Government have yet to respond to the report of the Procedure Committee in the previous Parliament on delegated legislation and its scrutiny. Does she propose to introduce measures to improve the scrutiny of delegated legislation? Does she not think that the time has come for a full debate on the scrutiny of delegated legislation, which is of great concern to many hon. Members?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government recently submitted a memorandum on the scrutiny of European legislation to the Modernisation Committee. We are considering also what has to be said about delegated legislation. The best course of action is for the Modernisation Committee to examine the issues. It may be appropriate for the House to debate those matters at some stage, but not in the immediate future.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): May I ask one more question on broadcasting? Although we have heard that the BBC's proposals to restrict parliamentary broadcasting are causing distress in the House, the proposals from all broadcasters effectively to withdraw party political broadcasting are causing distress across the nation. Those matters are important and involve not only party managers, broadcasters or even individual hon. Members: they are House matters and democracy matters. My right hon. Friend mentioned the Modernisation Committee, but we have no guarantee that its reports will be debated in the House. Will she give us an assurance that, in the near future, those matters will at least be debated by the House?

Mrs. Taylor: The proposal that I made for several hon. Members to enter the ballot for the hour-and-a-half debates might be the best way forward.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Is the right hon. Lady aware that there is considerable concern among professional providers of child care about suggestions by the Government that it may be possible rapidly to train large number of school leavers to engage in child care activities? Does she accept that child care is desperately important and that it should be done well? May we have an urgent debate on training for child care?

Mrs. Taylor: I certainly agree that training is important, as is child care itself. The steps that are being taken, in the welfare-to-work programmes, for example, are ensuring that quality training is available.

Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): May we have an early debate on the unfair competition represented by out-of-town shopping centres that provide free car parking? It is an issue which is particularly pertinent to my constituency, where the town centre is the vibrant hub of a local community. People there are working to provide an integrated and sustainable transport policy, recognising that car parking charges are an important factor within that.

Mrs. Taylor: There will be questions to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on Tuesday, and it might be possible for my hon. Friend to raise that issue then. Failing that, I can only recommend trying to secure an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): We have all seen the expensive television advertisements about the new deal, but I am concerned about the silent majority whose voice is not heard. May we have a debate on the impact of the windfall tax on people who work in the utilities and who may lose their jobs because of the utilities' inability to invest the money that they would otherwise have invested and because the utilities will no longer be able to peg their prices? I raise that matter following the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) about some hon. Members not being able to obtain proper answers from Ministers via the Table Office.

Mrs. Taylor: We debated the windfall tax last summer, and the House endorsed the Government's proposals.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Has my right hon. Friend had the chance to see the excellent exhibition by the Design Council in the Upper Waiting Hall, which covers some of the exciting products in the millennium product challenge fund? Is she aware that we have not had a debate on design innovation for a long time? Design innovation is at the heart of this country's competitive edge. Will she not only visit the exhibition, perhaps with some senior colleagues, but arrange a debate on that important subject?

Finally, would not it be better for the whole nation if the BBC spent a little more time broadcasting what we say in the House instead of spending so much time being anti the millennium and the millennium exhibition?

Mrs. Taylor: I think that the whole House will agree with my hon. Friend's last comment. As for the Design Council exhibition, I saw it briefly one morning this week. I am sure that my hon. Friend's comments will encourage other hon. Members to see it. As for a debate on design innovation, he will not be surprised to hear me repeat what I said before about parliamentary time and the difficulties that I would have in finding Government time for such a debate. Of course, there are Trade and Industry questions on Thursday and, as a regular attender at those, he might well find the opportunity to make some of the points that he has made today.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): May we have an early debate on the importance of local education authorities prioritising education spending, as the Government have done? I should like to inform my right hon. Friend of the situation in my local authority area of Essex, where the move from a Labour-Liberal Democrat administration to a Conservative one on 1 April meant a move from four years of consistently spending above the standard spending assessment to a proposed Conservative budget £3.5 million below the SSA. That has meant a complete, sudden and brutal cessation of discretionary awards to dance and drama students. There are six potential such students in my constituency who have gained places at prestigious dance and drama colleges but who are finding their life chances being taken away by the new Conservative administration. May I ask for an early debate on this subject and, through my right hon. Friend, ask Education Ministers to ask those Conservative councillors in Essex to rethink their decision, even at this late stage?

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend has made his point well and informed the House of the new priorities of the Conservatives in Essex. He will not be surprised at my saying that there is no Government time for the debate that he requests. He may be fortunate in securing an Adjournment debate, although we shall soon be discussing the remaining stages of education Bills, and he may find that he can raise some of the issues then.

[Mrs. Taylor]

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the multilateral agreement on investment is an issue of profound significance to trade and industry in this country and many others? The negotiations are currently taking place in Paris and the agreement may be signed shortly after Easter, so will she discuss the matter with her Cabinet colleagues and ensure that, before the Government sign any agreement, there is a full debate on the Floor of the House?

Mrs. Taylor: I think that there have been two debates on the matter—there was certainly one earlier this week—and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made the Government's position clear last week, if not the week before, at Question Time. If my hon. Friend wants to raise any outstanding points, he could try to do so during Trade and Industry questions on Thursday, but I do not think that a full debate on the matter is possible in the near future, simply because we are very short of time on the Floor of the House.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): At my surgery about a week ago, I met a father whose son urgently needed his tonsils removed but had been told that he would have to wait up to eight months on the national health service, even though the same surgeon could perform the operation privately the following week. Will my right hon. Friend reconsider her decision on a debate on the national health service, so that Labour Members can raise such issues as consultants' contracts and the deliberate manipulation of waiting lists to favour the private sector? We want to expose the dire legacy that we inherited from the Conservative Government, and correct some of the misinformation that Conservative Members are giving about what we need to do to rebuild the national health service.

Mrs. Taylor: Since the Government came to office, we have announced an extra £1.5 billion for the health service—£300 million for this year and £1.2 billion for next year—so it is extremely tempting to arrange such a debate. However, my hon. Friend is aware of our priorities in the legislative programme. I shall certainly bring his specific point to the attention of Ministers, but if he wants to take those local issues further, I can only suggest that he takes his chances with all the other hon. Members in the ballot for an Adjournment debate.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): May I thank the right hon. Lady for what she said about the BBC and associate the Opposition with the concerns that have been expressed this afternoon? Will she go one stage further and write to the chairman of the BBC today, enclosing a copy of Hansard containing the exchanges that have taken place, and ask him to see her personally when he comes to the House on 12 March? If she wants my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and me to be present, we should be glad to do that.

Will the right hon. Lady also clarify a point that she made in replying to my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk? She said that a senior Treasury Minister would reply to the debate on TESSAs and PEPs, but sidestepped the specific question whether the Paymaster General would reply. Will she assure us that there will not be another evasion, such as occurred when the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food sat in the Smoking Room while the House debated beef on the bone? The Paymaster General is specifically responsible for these matters, and we expect him to reply.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman protests too much. There will be two Government speakers during that debate: my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will open the debate and my hon. Friend the Paymaster General will close it. We are treating the debate as we treat every other—extremely seriously.

I am more than happy to ensure that a copy of the Hansard report of the exchanges is sent to the chairman of the BBC. How we take the matter further, especially as Madam Speaker has already planned to meet the chairman, should perhaps best be discussed through the usual channels.

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 24 February].

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Clause 1

NUMBER OF MEPS, ELECTORAL REGIONS AND ELECTORAL SYSTEM

Amendment moved [24 February]: No. 26, in page 1, line 24, leave out from 'region' to 'shall' in line 29 on page 2.—[Mr. Trimble.]

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I remind the Committee that with this we are discussing the following amendments: No. 9, in page 1, line 25, leave out from 'be' to end of line 26 and insert

'an open regional list system.

3A. An open regional list system is a system which complies with the following requirements, namely—

(a) each electoral region shall be divided into a number of constituencies equal to the number of MEPs to be elected for that region in accordance with subsection 2(4) above and Schedule 1;

(b) each candidate shall nominate on the ballot paper one constituency in the relevant region which he will represent, if elected;

(c) in the event of the same constituency being nominated by more than one successful candidate, the candidate elected first shall represent his nominated constituency;

(d) successful candidates unable to represent their nominated constituency for the reason given in sub-paragraph (c) shall, in the order of their election, choose another constituency to represent, and;

(e) if an elected candidate has nominated a constituency which no candidate elected before him has nominated, he shall represent that constituency even if a candidate elected before him, whose own nominated constituency has been taken, seeks to choose it.'.

No. 1, in page 2, line 1, leave out from 'cast' to end of line 2 and insert

'in one of the following ways:

(a) for a registered party;

(b) for a candidate listed as a member of a registered party; or

(c) for an individual candidate not listed as a member of a registered party.'.

No. 51, in page 2, line 2, after 'candidate,', insert

'whether or not the candidate is a member of a registered party,'.

No. 2, in page 2, line 4, after 'candidate', insert

'not listed as a member of a registered party'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 4, after 'votes' insert

', with votes for candidates listed as members of a registered party counting towards the total vote of that party.'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 8, leave out from 'number' to end and insert 'shown below.

Number of seats already allocated	Divisor
6	11
7	13
8	15
9	17
10	19.'

No. 5, in page 2, line 16, leave out from 'filled' to end of line 18 and insert 'as follows—

(a) a quota shall be determined which is equal to the total number of votes polled for all the parties, divided by the number of seats to be allocated, plus one.

(b) votes cast for the candidate at the top of the party list shall be compared with the number of votes cast for the registered party to which that candidate belongs.

(c) where the candidate has fewer votes than the quota, the votes for that candidate will then be topped up to reach the quota using votes from the party vote, reducing the number of votes won by the party accordingly.

(d) this process continues for each candidate on the list until the party votes have been exhausted, except where there are insufficient votes in the party vote to top up a candidate, in which case those votes are allocated to the next person on the list with sufficient votes, who moves one place up the list.'.

No. 6, in page 2, line 20, at end insert—

'(7A) The style of the front of the ballot papers to be used shall be in the form set out in Schedule (European Parliament Ballot Paper).

No. 10, in page 2, leave out lines 22 to 24.

No. 11, in page 2, leave out lines 25 to 28.

New clause 4—Evaluation by Secretary of State of open list system and method of allocating seats—

'.—After section 7 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978, there shall be inserted the following section—

"Evaluation by Secretary of State of open list system and method of allocating seats

7A.—(1) As soon as is reasonably practicable after the first election held under the regional list system set out in section 3 of this Act, the Secretary of State shall lay a report before Parliament, setting out what appear to him to be the principal advantages and disadvantages of conducting subsequent such elections by an open list system.

(2) A report under subsection (1) above may also contain proposals for changing the arrangements for the allocation of seats set out in this Act.

(3) In this section, 'open list system' means an electoral system in which the names of those candidates on a party's list are listed on the ballot paper and each voter can choose whether to cast his vote either—

(a) for a registered party, or

(b) for an individual candidate, whether or not that candidate is on a party's list of candidates.".'.

Amendment No. 27, in schedule 2, page 8, leave out lines 19 to 25.

Amendment No. 79, in page 8, line 25, at end insert—

'(3C) Regulations under this paragraph may make provision requiring party lists of candidates and nominations of individual candidates to be supported by signatures of electors in the relevant constituency, and may specify the numbers of signatures required.'.

4.20 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): After the debate had finished at 10 pm on Tuesday, I reflected that perhaps I had been too generous in taking interventions, because, had I not done so, I might have finished my speech and would not be standing here today. None the less, those interventions raised interesting points.

When the debate finished, I was responding to an intervention from the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) to correct what I thought was a misapprehension when he said of the single transferable vote system that "people lose the ability to make a clear choice when their vote is shuffled through the system".—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 272.]

I was about to tell the hon. Gentleman that he was wrong to suggest that votes are shuffled through the system under STV. If votes are transferred, it is because the elector has indicated a preference.

Votes are not transferred automatically. Under the STV system, it is common for an elector to plump—to mark only one preference. Consequently, the vote is never transferred. It is counted for the person in respect of whom the elector has indicated a first preference, and that is it. If a vote transfers to anyone else it is because the elector has indicated a preference.

As I was saying on Tuesday, when STV was introduced in Northern Ireland, the electors took it very seriously and considered very carefully the way in which they marked their preferences, in terms of voting not just for parties and candidates within those parties, but for other individuals on the list.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I understand what the right hon. Gentleman means. If I used the word "shuffled", I should be happy to alter it to "transferred". However, irrespective of whether a voter has preferences, he has a higher preference for one candidate as opposed to another. It is clear that the second preference has a much lower order of priority. The first-past-the-post system provides a real choice. Although we could debate the issue ad nauseam, there is something inherently unsatisfactory about the second preference being given the advantage over the first choice.

Mr. Trimble: I shall return to the merits and demerits of the first-past-the-post system and the elections for which it is appropriate.

Preferences and the expression of preferences in STV allow the elector to make a sophisticated judgment on individuals and parties. Those preferences can be used not simply to vote for candidates or parties, but to vote against others. It is common in Northern Ireland for people to shape their preferences—parties advise them to shape their preferences—to express positive and negative preferences. That gives the electorate a wider choice, enabling them to express things in a more sophisticated manner. That is part of the attraction of STV. All systems have advantages and disadvantages. I am dwelling on the advantages of STV, but I shall outline its disadvantages as well.

I emphasise that STV has resulted in quite keen electoral interest, which we must all bear in mind. Given the very large constituencies as a result of the Bill—even with the single transferable vote system, there will be large constituencies—something that excites the electors' interest is of value. In addition, political parties have to adopt their voting and transfer strategies. They cannot just sit back and leave it to the electorate. Parties have to consider responses and decide what to do.

One of the criticisms that we commonly make about STV—we are aware of its flaws—is that it encourages competition between candidates of a party. The normal strategy for a party under the STV system is to run one more candidate than the number of the seats that the party thinks it will win. If, by virtue of experience and opinion polls, it is considered that two of a party's candidates will be elected, the standard advice is to run three candidates. One must always allow for the possibility that the party will do better than expected. An extra candidate would take advantage of a movement of opinion in favour of a party.

Running an extra candidate above the number that the party expects will be elected means that probably at least one person will not be elected. That gives rise to competition between candidates. Ideally, one would hope that such competition attracts voters to the party, although candidates quickly conclude that it is easier to persuade people who are already committed to their party to switch from party candidate A to party candidate B than to persuade someone who is not in favour of one's party to switch their allegiance. Competition therefore develops between candidates, which can sometimes be taken to quite interesting extremes.

I remember the case of a former colleague who, back in 1982, stood as one of our six candidates in the 10-seat South Antrim constituency. Our most prominent candidate was then James Molyneaux, now Lord Molyneaux. The party poster listed all six candidates in alphabetical order. The gentleman in question decided to emphasise that his name was first alphabetically by excising from the poster—literally cutting out—the four names between his and Jim Molyneaux's. He tried to get on to Jim's coat tails by that device. I cannot remember whether it succeeded.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) indicated assent.

Mr. Trimble: My hon. Friend, who was elected in a different constituency in that election, is nodding, so the stratagem may have succeeded—although the success may also have been a consequence of one other feature of STV, which, in my eyes, although not in the eyes of others, is a serious disadvantage. It is thought to be a significant advantage if one's name starts with a letter at the beginning of the alphabet. However, that is not always an advantage; it depends on circumstances.

Although we consider competition between candidates a disadvantage of STV generally, such a cloud may have a silver lining in European parliamentary elections. It will help to open up the debate on Europe in parties, and enable the electorate to take part in that debate and express preferences for the views on European issues of particular candidates in a particular party.

On Europe, the debate is not between, but within, parties. Pro and sceptical attitudes exist within all three parties and, consequently, a transferable vote system—or a system that enables the electorate to distinguish between candidates for a particular party—will allow the electorate to distinguish between particular wings of a party on these issues. That will develop the debate within the parties and enable the electorate to take part, and their view might be interesting.

That might be of particular interest to the hon. Member for Stone, who is a vigorous participant in the debate within the Conservative party. He might welcome a system that enabled the electorate to join in. Obviously, it would be a stronger point for him if he believed that the electorate would join in on his side—and he may believe that. I commend the system to him on that basis.

4.30 pm

The hon. Member for Stone raised another point about the first-past-the-post system. It is generally known that our party has expressed a preference for that system for many years, and we must deal with the issue in case we are accused of inconsistency. We would never advocate a single transferable vote system, or any proportional electoral system, for elections to this House. We are endorsing STV as the electoral method for the proposed Northern Ireland assembly, and the amendment does likewise with regard to the European Parliament. However, we draw clear distinctions between regional assemblies and the European Parliament and this House.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I followed the right hon. Gentleman's speech on Tuesday through my magic machine. If we accept the position that he has just elucidated, there will be an inevitable move towards proportional representation in this House, whatever we say. Once the gate is opened, the arguments that are used constantly to encourage people to believe that proportional representation is somehow fairer will result in a push towards Members of the House of Commons being elected that way.

Mr. Trimble: The floodgates are already open. Proportional representation has been operating in Northern Ireland for more than 20 years, and is being proposed by the hon. Lady's party for Scotland and Wales. One can stem the tide for this House by the argument that I was about to make.

The reason why I draw a distinction between elections to this House and those to other places is that elections to the House are to elect a Government. There are arguments for having an electoral system that reflects a broad spread of opinion, and that is fine if we are dealing with a body where the premium is on having the broadest range of representation and where there is no need for clear policy decisions.

If—as in the House—we have to sustain a Government, that Government must make clear decisions. We want the electorate to be able to make choices, because a PR system will produce a range of representation and will result in coalitions having to be formed. The real policy choices are then in the construction of coalitions, and those take place after elections, rather than before.

The paradox is that PR—which represents a wide range of views—may result in the electorate not being able to choose a Government, which would be created after the event by the deals that people do. For that reason, I believe strongly that the first-past-the-post system must be retained for the House and for the formation of Governments.

Regional assemblies for the United Kingdom will be essentially administrative and will not make major policy decisions, although I know that will not be welcome news for the strong proponents of devolution. I recall the comments made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign when he likened the proposed Scottish Parliament to an English parish council. That was a bold comparison—the Scottish Parliament will go far beyond a parish council, but it will still be essentially an administrative body.

The Scottish Parliament will not have the power to take major policy decisions; nor will the Northern Ireland assembly. In the current inter-party talks, we constantly remind other parties—which are more ambitious in their views—of the realities of life, including the fact that the Northern Ireland assembly will not share the characteristics of a government.

Similarly, the European Parliament does not have to sustain a government. The European legislature is the Council of Ministers, and the European executive, in so far as there is one, is the European Commission. The European Parliament is a consultative body, and there is a strong argument for ensuring that a wide range of views is represented there.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman has, no doubt, studied the Amsterdam treaty in some detail, as some of us have. Has he noticed that it will grant extensive powers to the European Parliament, which have been minimised by the Government because they do not want people to know what is going on? The reality is that, under the procedures for majority voting and co-decision, the arrangements for an individual member state to achieve its objectives will be severely curtailed. The right hon. Gentleman's argument will be eroded by the Amsterdam treaty, because the Council of Ministers will be given increased supranational powers in the movement towards one country called Europe.

Mr. Trimble: I defer to the hon. Gentleman in his knowledge of the detail of the treaty. None the less, my point remains valid, because the legislature in Europe is the Council of Ministers. Provisions are made to give the European Parliament some influence, but it is still only a consultative body. The argument that I made earlier to justify the retention of the first-past-the-post system for the House of Commons does not, therefore, apply to the European Parliament, and I hope that it never will. I do not believe that European institutions will develop in such a way that the European Parliament will acquire the characteristics of a genuine parliament or will be required to support a government.

All electoral systems have characteristics and biases, and we must choose between them. They all produce representation to a greater or lesser extent, and we should be open about the effect that is sought for a particular institution. That is why I drew a distinction between the need for the first-past-the-post system for the House of Commons and a representative system for elsewhere.

The representative system that I have suggested for the European Parliament would place a premium on producing a proportional result and would give the electorate considerable influence in deciding the representation of the various parties. Although list systems may produce proportional results, they do not give the electorate the opportunity to choose. The closed list system, in particular, has the disadvantage of favouring party leaderships, which is, of course, why it has been proposed.

The system proposed by the Liberal Democrats is an unhappy compromise. I especially dislike the formula that the Liberal Democrats propose in amendment No. 4 for the allocation of seats. It has been deliberately chosen to favour small parties and departs from the clarity and simplicity of the d'Hondt formula. We debated that issue in some detail in 1996, and eventually chose the d'Hondt formula. If one is to have a list system, it is better to have the d'Hondt formula, rather than the proposal in amendment No. 4, which is designed simply to be advantageous to smaller parties. On that issue, the Liberal Democrats, like some other parties, want to get their thumb on the wheel.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The right hon. Gentleman is making a thoughtful speech and, later, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam

(Mr. Allan) will seek to deploy the case for the Sainte-Lague, rather than the d'Hondt, system—it is, after all, used in a great many countries. However, on his earlier point, does he not recognise that if we are to have a list system, which is not our highest preference either, it is much better to have one with open lists, whereby the public have some influence over the choice of candidates, than one with closed lists?

Mr. Trimble: As I said on Tuesday, it would be much better still to go the whole hog. If the Liberal Democrats were to go the whole hog and support our amendment, they would be supporting their first preference. At this stage, they ought to express their first preference; if they have to haul down their sights later, so be it. However, I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for providing the name of other formula—the one that is biased in their favour—which I confess I had forgotten.

On Tuesday, the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said that the legislation was providing a test run on proportional representation. I want to repeat a point I made on Tuesday, which is that test runs on proportional representation have already happened: they happened in Northern Ireland, and hon. Members should look closely at that example. Having looked at the two different systems that have been applied in Northern Ireland, we think that the advantage lies with the single transferable vote system.

The Liberal Democrats confirmed on Tuesday and again just now that the single transferable vote is their preferred system—the system which they would go for if they could, and if they were not scared of offending the Government. They should remember that the STV system was introduced into the United Kingdom by the Conservatives and, when it was reintroduced in modern times, it was the Conservatives who did that; the Labour Government who followed them endorsed and re-enacted the STV system.

Therefore, my amendment offers a proposal which is the first preference of the Liberal Democrats and has been introduced by the Conservatives and endorsed by Labour. On that basis and if rationality were to apply, I would expect all of them to rally round the amendment.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I shall speak to amendments Nos. 9, 51, 10 and 11, which stand in my name and the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends. I shall seek your leave, Sir Alan, to press for separate votes on amendments No. 9 and 10, which deal with important subjects.

I enjoyed the speech of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). He raised some important points and I shall touch on three of those, as they lend support to the arguments that I shall deploy in support of our amendments. The first point was about candidates' order of priority on the ballot paper. In a closed list system, the ranking of candidates is an important matter.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman made a thoughtful point about what happens under the new system when a Member of the European Parliament crosses the floor and moves from one party to another, but the response he received from the Home Secretary was not really satisfactory. The point is this: under the new system, MEPs will be elected under a party banner and not, in any sense, as individuals. If they cross the floor and join another party, it cannot be pretended that they are in the same position as a Member of this Parliament who crosses the Floor, which was the argument the Home Secretary used.

Members of Parliament are elected as individuals, but MEPs are not—they are elected purely on a party basis and that fact has implications that have not been sufficiently answered.

I was also interested in the right hon. Gentleman's arguments about the differences between, and the reasons for using, different systems for different assemblies.

4.45 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): On the point of people who switch parties, the situation is worse than my hon. Friend says. Under our current system, when people are nominated, the process ends with an election. Under a list system, people are nominated for four years—until the next election. A situation can arise where, although the next person on the list has long left one's party, that person may fill a vacancy.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend made some important points in earlier debates, and he has hit the nail on the head again today.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Upper Bann that the first-past-the-post system has served the House of Commons and this country well and has provided us with stable government. However, the arguments go further and extend in favour of using the first-past-the-post system for European elections as well. It is our belief that first past the post is the best way of ensuring quality representation on behalf of electors and a good quality of MEPs in Europe. All I say now in support of the amendments will be coloured by our conviction that the first-past-the-post system has served us well in this country and in Europe.

There is evidence of the first-past-the-post system earning wide admiration, not only in this country, but throughout Europe. Many MEPs from other countries view with admiration our first-past-the-post system. In order to dismiss that system, which has served this country well, the Government will have to do better than the bald statement in the Home Office press announcement, which stated:

> "The relationship between Members of the European Parliament and their constituents is by its nature different to the closer ties expected of a Westminster MP."

We accept that the work of an MEP is different—we have heard that from Members of Parliament on both sides of the House who have served as MEPs. In many cases, MEPs work for a different clientele, but they also serve individual constituents and we believe that a constituency system serves the interests of electors and helps MEPs to discharge their functions and form relationships with the different groups in the constituency.

Amendment No. 9 is designed to reintroduce the link between an MEP elected under the new system of voting—of which we do not approve, but there it is—and a constituency. We find it hard to understand arguments against that link, because it will help MEPs to serve their constituents.

[Mr. Clappison]

That answers the question posed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on Tuesday. He asked:

"Who will identify with what and how will they go about it?"

Under the new system, how will MEPs elected on a list of seven, eight or even 10 Members representing a giant constituency go about their task? My right hon. Friend asked about what would happen on the day after the election:

"Will it be a colonial carve-up with the appointment of divisional governorships of various parts of the region?"—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 230.]

Will the MEPs sit down and decide what each of them will do? Would it not be better if, from the outset, there was a known constituency system and a constituency link about which the electorate knew in advance? As a result, after the election, each elector would know which individual MEP was serving his or her constituency.

Mr. Beith: I recognise that the purpose of amendment No. 9 is to attach a constituency to a Member of the European Parliament, once that Member has been elected. That is a perfectly fair aim, but does the hon. Gentleman recognise that to describe that as an "open regional list system" is misleading? It is not an open list system in the sense that it would give voters the opportunity to change the slate of candidates put forward by the party. Perhaps, on reflection, it might have been better to describe it differently.

Mr. Clappison: I make common cause with the right hon. Gentleman's criticism of the list system. Our amendment is designed to combine the new voting system—which we do not like—with a constituency system. I certainly make common cause with criticism of the Government's proposal for a list system. In fact, I would go further. I think that it is difficult—almost impossible—for anyone to defend it. It has been widely criticised and is recognised as a system which leads to party placement. I shall deal with that in the debate on a later amendment, and I shall now confine my comments to support for this amendment.

Mr. Cash: While I recognise the difficulties inherent in having to keep pace with the times, and given that Labour has a massive majority and is determined to drive through a system of regional lists, may I invite my hon. Friend to accept that the long title of the Bill—whatever advice my hon. Friend may have received—does not appear to preclude the idea that we should insist on a first-past-the-post system?

Does my hon. Friend accept that we are getting dangerously close to accepting the principle of regional lists, and that that may be held against us in due course? I urge him to consider carefully the significance of the wording that has been adopted in amendment No. 9 and, for that matter, amendment No. 53.

Mr. Clappison: I accept my hon. Friend's comments. I thought that I had given a sufficient health warning, but if I have not, I make it even clearer now that we support the first-past-the-post system. We believe that the proposed system is a bad system, and we have tabled our amendment to improve the system a little bit. It will be an improvement to have a constituency link for individual Members.

There is common ground between this group of amendments and an earlier group. The amendments that deal with the size of the regions are based on arguments that link directly into the argument about constituencies. The regions that the Government have decreed are so vast, so incoherent, so lacking in justification and will be so difficult for electors to understand or MEPs to represent that we believe that it will be an improvement to divide them into constituencies. I have listened to the debate, and I have found little compelling argument in favour of the proposed regions and constituencies.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made some comments about a town in Scotland—I think it was Eyemouth. He chose it as an extreme example. Does it make it any easier or better to put that town into not just the south of Scotland but a vast region covering the whole of the rest of Scotland, with a list of MEPs to represent it? The town would be thrown in not just with the south of Scotland but with central Scotland, the highlands and islands—to which the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) referred—and so on. Does that make any sense? Surely it makes the problem even worse.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): We suggested that it could not make it any worse and would have the advantage of creating a team of MEPs working on a regional basis with other regional organisations. They would have a single voice in defending the interests of Scotland. The fundamental problem is that the constituencies are already so large that the connections just are not there.

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman must accept in all fairness that it is a pretty vast region. There is a problem with the argument that he and his right hon. Friend have advanced. It is a trap that people who argue on the basis of what they see as an extreme example fall into. The extreme example under the present system is infinitely better than the best of the new system. The new system will involve a group of MEPs—the hon. Gentleman called it a team—who will inevitably be more remote than under the present system and will be asked to do far more work.

We all tend in the House to argue on the basis of our own examples, so I give Liberal Members an example that is dear to my heart. My Westminster constituency is part of the European constituency of Hertfordshire, which includes most of the county of Hertfordshire. The European constituency is to be abolished and merged into the giant Eastern region, which will cover many other counties in what is described as the east of England.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) referred to the various organisations and interests in a region. Business and education interests are organised on a county basis. The chambers of commerce and the local Confederation of British Industry branches are organised on a county basis and speak for the county and nowhere else. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) knows that to be the case.

The local education authority is the Hertfordshire county council. Most of the voluntary groups in my constituency are part of a Hertfordshire group. Everything tends to be organised on a county basis. In the reorganisation of local government there was a vigorous debate about whether there should be a county council or a series of souped-up district councils with greater powers than previously. A strong argument was made on behalf of Hertfordshire. People identified with Hertfordshire and wanted to keep the county, and they did so.

Hertfordshire organisations speak for the people of Hertfordshire. This is just one example. In an earlier debate about regional identity, the Minister of State, Home Office said:

"It struck me as bizarre to introduce sub-regional divisions that seemed to have no coherence, and no historical or current justification."—[Official Report, 23 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 255.]

I do not know whether she suggests that the Eastern region has more significance for people in Hertfordshire than the county of Hertfordshire. I have to say that the history of the peoples of the Eastern region of England is a volume that has yet to be written. If a person from abroad asked my constituents where they lived, they would say that they came from Hertfordshire. If they were asked where Hertfordshire was, they would say that it was in the south-east of England, or in the home counties around London. Not one in 100 would say that they lived in the Eastern region.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): If the regional boundaries are so bad, will the hon. Gentleman explain why, in November 1993, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), the then Secretary of State for the Environment, came to this Dispatch Box with a great fanfare to declare the new regions not just for minor administrative purposes but as a major arm of government and representation of people at regional level?

Mr. Clappison: The Home Secretary is making a jump there which is not justified by fact. The regions were set up for administrative convenience to bring administration closer to people. They were not set up as electoral regions to represent electors or as an expression of any cultural or historical identity—specifically not. They were put there for administrative convenience. To their discredit, the Government have hijacked those regions and tried to turn them into something that they were never intended to be.

The right hon. Gentleman would be hard put to find any cultural or historical significance, fellow feeling or identity of purpose between all those people who live in the region described as the South East, stretching from Kent to Milton Keynes, or the Eastern region, stretching from Hertsmere to Norfolk.

I say nothing against the other counties in the Eastern region. My constituents like Norfolk. Many of them go on holiday there, but they do not think that they are part of the same region as Norfolk.

May I put it to the Home Secretary that the amendment is relevant not only to the ease of electors knowing what is happening and who represents them, but to the quality of representation that MEPs can provide? Westminster Members of Parliament are always emboldened in our dealings with the Government or whomever by the fact that we have a constituency link and speak on behalf of our constituents. I know of the affection and interest of the Home Secretary in all matters Belgian—[Laughter.] He is very interested in Belgium. He plays the admirable party game "Ten Famous Belgians". I have received a letter from a former ambassador to Belgium and to Austria. He writes with some knowledge of the European scene. I refer to a Mr. O'Neill, who writes:

"The party list system (or even multi-member constituencies) destroys the personal link between the member and the elector: the legislature becomes less responsive and more remote. The member no longer has any kind of authority or standing deriving from his personal mandate in his dealings with his Party, and he becomes entirely dependent on the Party for whether or at what point (sheep or goat) he appears on the Party list. The consequence is that the quality of candidates falls, and they come to be chosen almost exclusively from the ranks of career Party officials."

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Unlike us.

5 pm

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman speaks for himself and his party.

I turn from the defects of the Government's proposed system and how they would be remedied by amendment No. 9, to the closed list system, with which amendment No. 51 deals. There are Liberal amendments on the same subject.

The closed list system is extremely difficult to defend. When the Government unveiled it, it attracted almost universal criticism and concern. The Times stated in a leading article:

"This is bad for democracy and will be bad eventually for the parties too. The Government plans to introduce the worst possible kind of PR for the European elections. Its closed list system allows voters no say over which candidate they want. They can merely vote for a party which will then appoint its own placemen to the Parliament."

On Second Reading, there was scarcely a friend to be found in the House for the closed list system. It will be interesting to see whether any hon. Member will defend it. It did not win many friends among the Home Secretary's colleagues in the European Parliament. One Labour MEP is quoted as saying:

"The Prime Minister will not tolerate people who know about European issues, only authentic brain-washed Blairites."

That was the voice of Mr. Ken Coates.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth): He is an authority.

Mr. Clappison: Perhaps Mr. Ken Coates was in a good position to judge, and he may now be in an even better position to do so.

Whether among serious commentators or members of the Labour European group, few are coming forward to defend the closed list system. It was therefore not surprising that—possibly as a result of his interest in all matters Belgian—the Home Secretary told us on Second Reading that he was launching an interesting consultation on the Belgian electoral system.

In fairness to the Home Secretary, he made it clear—rather like a judge passing sentence—that he was giving no promises about what the eventual sentence would be, but he led us to believe that it was an interesting development. He was as good as his word and put a paper in the Library on the operation of the Belgian electoral system. I have a copy of that paper.

[Mr. Clappison]

I should be interested to know why the Home Secretary chose the Belgian system. He looks perplexed. I hope that he knows the answer—he chose it, not I.

Mr. Straw indicated assent.

Mr. Clappison: Good, the Home Secretary knows the answer. Perhaps he will tell us why he chose the Belgian list, rather than any of the other lists in the European electoral systems—the Danish system, for example, which he also mentioned in his speech. The open list systems are not strange in Europe. On Second Reading, the Home Secretary told us with pride:

"I am prepared to listen to the arguments for adopting a Belgian-type system and to give them careful consideration."

Since then, there has been a deafening silence from the Government for three months. We do not know what great debate has been taking place. We will be interested to learn what arguments the Government considered during the consultation and which argument clinched it for the closed list system, which was the Government's original preference. Did new facts come to light about the Belgian system that the Government did not know on Second Reading?

As a Belgian detective—Poirot, Simenon's Maigret, or Tin Tin—might say, it is all rather perplexing. Were those all red herrings that were thrown into the plot to mislead us, or have we yet to come to the final twist of the plot?

Mr. Straw: I shall deal in more detail with the Belgian system when I speak. Meanwhile, let me put the hon. Gentleman out of his misery about where the suggestion of the Belgian system came from. He has it in front of him. It was not my suggestion. As I said on Second Reading:

"It has been suggested, both by the constitutional group Charter 88 and by the Liberal Democrats, that we could introduce an electoral system of the sort that operates in Belgium and Denmark, whereby voters can vote either for the party list as a whole or for an individual candidate from the party list".—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 813.]

I then spelt out how that would operate and went on to say that we were willing to consider it, without giving commitments about our final decision until there had been a chance to consult the House, which is what we are doing.

Mr. Clappison: The Home Secretary has missed his vocation. He has thrown another red herring into the plot. We did not hear the argument that clinched it for the Government, but no doubt we shall hear that in due course.

I am fully aware of what was said on Second Reading. The Home Secretary said that it had been suggested that they could introduce an electoral system and, one could add, in many other European countries.

"of the sort that operates in Belgium and Denmark"—

Why did the Government chose the Belgian system, rather than the Danish? Is it entirely coincidental that those of us for whom the differences between European electoral systems are not the natural stuff of our reading now discover that, in Belgium, there is a history of the preferential voting system not making much difference to the order of candidates, whereas, in Denmark, which the Government did not choose as one of their examples, there is an established history of preferences being expressed by voters, and the voters' preferences making a difference to the final outcome of the election? We await an answer from the Home Secretary.

We have heard nothing yet from the Government, and the situation remains as unsatisfactory as it was on Second Reading. We believe that a closed list system is a bad system. One word that has been used to describe it is degrading. That is appropriate. It will not get our support in any circumstances.

The Home Secretary also told us on Second Reading that he was interested in the differences between various divisors and methods of election. I remind him of another point that he made. I refer to proportionality, which relates to some of the amendments tabled by the Liberals. The comments about Belgium and Denmark are not the only ones for which the Home Secretary owes the House an explanation.

The right hon. Gentleman told us on Second Reading why the Government had chosen the d'Hondt system in preference to the Sainte-Lague system. I am grateful to the Liberal Democrats for that pronunciation, of which I was previously unaware. The Home Secretary set out the reasons why he chose the d'Hondt system and said:

"Sainte-Lague does not necessarily produce more proportional results. I have already introduced the proportionality index to the House—I noticed how hon. Members listened with bated breath. By calculating the index score for six regions using the 1994 European election vote in the United Kingdom, we found that, on average, d'Hondt scored higher than Sainte-Lague."—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 812-14.]

Divisors are not my natural interest and I am not an expert in these matters. I have about the same level of interest in them as does the Home Secretary. However, this is an important matter and he explained why the Government had chosen that system. It has important consequences in terms of how many MEPs are elected from each region. Other people are more interested in this subject, and one of those is Professor Ian Maclean of Oxford university.

Mr. Beith: A Liberal Democrat.

Mr. Clappison: He may well be. He is certainly an expert on electoral systems, and he knows his stuff on these matters. The Home Secretary's comments came to his attention and he suspected that something was wrong—in fact, it was a bit more than a suspicion. It was impossible for the Home Secretary to be right, because the Sainte-Lague system is never less proportional than the d'Hondt system and is frequently more proportional than it—contrary to what the Home Secretary told us on Second Reading. The good professor thought that there had been a mistake—I am glad that the Home Secretary admits it now—he carried out simulations and he found that he was correct. I am glad that the Home Secretary has realised his mistake.

Mr. Straw rose—

Mr. Clappison: Before the Home Secretary intervenes again, I must advise him that it would have been a good idea for the Government to answer my written question on that subject.

Mr. Straw rose—

The Chairman: Order. Mr. Clappison has the Floor.

Mr. Clappison: I shall certainly give way, but the Home Secretary might also like to respond to my next point. I asked the Government last week whether they had made a mistake, and I received the answer earlier this week that they were still thinking about it. The Home Secretary has obviously thought about it, so perhaps he can give us an answer.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman's implication is preposterous. He should know that, because I wrote to the shadow Home Secretary, his right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney)—just as I wrote to the Liberal Democrat spokesman and other party leaders—as soon as we were aware that an error had been made. I apologised for that error and I have placed in the Library the details of the revised calculations. Furthermore, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), put on record in the Official Report of 20 January exactly what the situation was, and he repeated my unreserved apology to the House.

Mr. Clappison: I welcome that apology, and I accept the Home Secretary's explanation. However, he will understand that some issues flow from that mistake—not least what the Home Secretary said about comparisons between this country and Europe. He knows that, if we dismiss the argument in favour of the d'Hondt system that he gave us on Second Reading, there is little left to support the Government's chosen system. The Government say that they believe that the d'Hondt system is fair—that is a subjective opinion. They say that it is simple—I leave it to the Committee to judge whether any of these electoral systems are simple.

The Government also say that d'Hondt is commonly used in Europe, but it would appear that they have not used the system to calculate the relationship between seats and regions. According to those who are expert in such matters—I am not one of them—the Government have apparently used a different form of divisor for that calculation, which looks very much like the Sainte-Lague divisor that the Government dismissed for the purposes of electing MEPs. Perhaps the Home Secretary will explain that. What is the basis of the system that the Government have finally adopted for determining the relationship between seats and regions?

That decision has important consequences. The Home Secretary will know that the system that he has chosen for electing MEPs—the d'Hondt system—gives the Labour party an extra seat in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman is looking quizzical: he would do well to take up the issue with those who are authorities in such matters. The different system that the Government have chosen to allocate seats between regions produces one fewer seat for the south-east and one more seat for London. That is an important consideration. In those circumstances, the Home Secretary owes it to the Committee to confirm whether there is a difference between the divisors, what divisor relates seats to regions, and what the justification is for those decisions.

We hold no brief for any of those issues. We have some sympathy with the Home Secretary because we know that it is not his natural terrain.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. There is a legitimate argument about whether d'Hondt or Sainte-Lague is the best and fairest mechanism of allocating seats according to votes. It has nothing to do with the allocation of seats to regions.

5.15 pm

Mr. Clappison: The Government must explain why they have chosen different systems for those two functions. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has not heard my reply; I ask him to do me the courtesy of listening to what I have to say. The Government must explain why they have chosen different systems. The hon. Gentleman is a fair man and he must accept that, as the different systems apparently produce more favourable results for the Government in both cases, they owe the Committee an explanation.

It is no use the Government's claiming that the divisors are used commonly in Europe. As I understand it, the system that the Government have produced is unique in Europe: it is the only system that has a closed list at a regional level. Perhaps the Home Secretary will identify any other European country that has a closed list at a regional level. I am not aware of such a country within the European Union.

The Home Secretary is looking hopefully to his box: I suggest that he will find no other country with that system within the European Union. There may be another such country elsewhere in Europe. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) provided the example of Bulgaria earlier. I am sure that the old Communist rulers of Bulgaria would recognise that system, but it is not recognisable to hon. Members.

We have some sympathy for the Home Secretary, and we recognise that a mistake was made about the electoral systems. We always accept an apology, and we are aware that this is not natural terrain for the Home Secretary. He does not compare too badly with certain other members of the Government—I am thinking specifically of the command of arithmetic demonstrated by the Minister for School Standards and the command of theology exhibited by the Minister for the millennium dome. I do not intend any disrespect to the dome. The Prime Minister has told me that I must visit the dome, and I am looking forward to that almost as much as I am looking forward to my guided tour of the Lord Chancellor's apartments.

There are serious matters for hon. Members to consider. We cannot approve of a system that is based on a mistake and on a closed list that we believe is undemocratic and which destroys the link between candidates and their constituencies. They are bad features of the system, and our amendments are designed to set them right.

We are also concerned about the important subject of party registration. We are alive to the concerns that have been expressed in this place about the registration of parties and party names. We know of the problems that were caused in the last election, and we treat the subject seriously. We regret that the Government have approached the registration issue in this way and introduced it into the Bill at this stage, after two important pieces of constitutional legislation have passed through Parliament and when this Bill is in Committee. It is rather late in the day for the Government to announce their ideas on registration. We believe that there should have been wider consultation at an earlier stage.

I know that the Home Secretary recently wrote to my right hon. Friends giving details of his plans. We would have preferred to receive those details much earlier—certainly before the Bill reached its Committee stage and before the consideration of important constitutional legislation. A subject of such seriousness cannot be dealt with in this way, amid the shambles of the Government's plans for different electoral systems and against the background of this Bill, which destroys links between Members and their constituencies, and damages and degrades our electoral system. We are not happy about that, and we shall register our unhappiness in due course.

As I have said, we shall seek a separate vote on the question of party registration in order to signal our concern about the Government's plans. We shall also seek a separate vote on the constituency link, because we do not believe that the Government have offered sufficient arguments to support their proposals. We believe that our constituency link would slightly improve a bad and an inferior system.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): My speech may be a brief interlude in the melodrama being played out opposite. During the many hours that we have considered this legislation, we have heard about the Opposition's unwillingness to embrace electoral reform and their absolute hatred of regions. One wonders why that hatred is so strong. Some of us believe in regions, have regional accents and look to building up regions. As we look to the next millennium, one wonders whether there is a present or a future, as Conservative Members always seem to look backwards.

Mr. Syms: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Drew: I shall take an intervention, but I must first make some progress.

I rise mainly to support new clause 4 standing in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg). We feel strongly that whether it is an open list or a closed list system, it is right and proper that an investigation is made at an appropriate time after the first elections are held. I am very much in favour of an open list system, but if a closed list is chosen, it is right and proper that an appraisal is made of how well it operated. The clause allows that to happen.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): If the hon. Gentleman is arguing in favour of the open list system, will he join those in the Division Lobby who wish to vote for such a system for the election, when it happens, and not just conduct a post mortem on it afterwards, which he appears to want to do?

Mr. Drew: We do not know whether a Division will be called, and, if so, which way we shall vote. Many of us have worked long and hard for reform of the electoral system.

There are other reasons why it is important that there is an investigation after the first elections using the regional list system. We could look again at the allocation of seats. As always, we on the Government Benches are open to persuasion that it might be possible—[Laughter.] The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) laughs, but that is what those of us who have supported electoral reform over many years believe. We are prepared to take on board the different opinions of others from outside the party, and, as I said on Second Reading, those who represent no party. It is important that we understand. We are not all electoral reform "wonks" on the Government Benches. We genuinely want to open up democracy. We want a different form of democracy—one that has been a long time in coming in this country, which we shall see in due course.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I noted what the hon. Gentleman said about openness and his readiness to embrace other opinions and to see them represented. Will he therefore explain whether in his judgment it would be acceptable if an open list system secured the return of Labour Members of the European Parliament who were fundamentally opposed to the European single currency?

Mr. Drew: Of course. That is one reason why I support an open list system. If the electorate choose to elect a person with a different policy from that of the leadership, that is a strong reason why it is a better system, and it is one for which I shall argue.

Another reason for a revision—this is not something about which I feel strongly—is the tabulation system, the use of divisors. It might be useful, after the first regional list system, to look again at divisors. It was put to me by a representative of a party that is not represented in the House that it is important that its point of view is heard. It feels strongly that national tabulation is preferable to regional tabulation. I have an open mind on that point. When we form the legislation, as we will, it is important that we have an opportunity to look again at whether particular parties or individuals have been discriminated against. That is a strong reason why the clause has been introduced.

I shall talk now about the benefits of an open list system—the main reason why I support the proposed change. There has been much argument about breaking the constituency link. There are those who strongly support the constituency link for the Westminster Parliament, but there is no constituency link for the European Parliament. It does not exist. There is no rapport between the Member and the constituency, because it is too large.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Drew: Yes, but I must make progress afterwards.

Miss McIntosh: I can identify on the Government Benches a number of colleagues who have served, as I have, in both Parliaments. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, now that it has been reduced to a mere 500,000, the existing constituency of a Member of the European Parliament is the same size as that represented by a congressman in the United States; that most of the work is done through channels similar to those of a congressman and a Member of Parliament; and that it works effectively?

Mr. Drew: I bow to the hon. Lady, who must be superwoman, because she represents a European Parliamentary constituency and is a Member of Parliament. She represents different parts of the country.

The very nature of the point that she made proves that it is possible to change the way in which we elect our MEPs. It is a different system with different jobs.

Opposition Members made the point on Tuesday about functional specialism, which is quite different for an MEP. That point was not lost on me. It is a strong argument for having a regional list system. MEPs do a totally different job, and therefore can be elected in totally different ways. That adds to the checks and balances, about which I spoke at great length on Second Reading. We feel strongly that the advantage of a regional list system must be put across.

Mr. Burden: Like my hon. Friend, I hope that the Home Secretary will look closely at the advantages of an open list system, but would my hon. Friend care to comment on the fact that, contrary to the impression that we are getting from Opposition Members, in a recent survey undertaken by three academic institutions—the London school of economics, Birkbeck college and the university of Essex—more than two thirds of voters revealed that they would like a regional list system for elections to the European Parliament, whether a closed list or an open list?

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend. I am not aware of that study, but it is important that we listen to the electorate. When they are polled on the change, they seem to like the idea of being able to vote for a person or party or, indeed, an individual who does not represent a party. The open list system presents the best of both worlds: it gives an elector the chance to vote for a person—that person will usually represent a party—but if the elector just wants to elect a party, he or she can do so. That is the best thing about the system.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I counsel caution. Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, when polled, 70 per cent. of the Welsh electorate supposedly supported a Welsh assembly, yet, when the judgment came, only 25 per cent. voted for it and 75 per cent. did not? One has to be cautious about polls showing supposed attachments to prospective systems in which they have not been involved.

Mr. Drew: I accept the hon. Gentleman's observations. The proof of the pudding is always in the eating, but we are starting from such a low participation base anyway. That is a strong argument for change. People do not vote in the European elections.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) rose—

Mr. Drew: I cannot give way any more; I must make progress.

The open list system can and will allow people to participate differently.

On Second Reading, I spoke about people who, year in, year out, vote for a party that has never represented them. Under this system, they can be assured—if that party is one of the major parties—that, with good fortune they will be represented. That is not unimportant. That gives a whole new opening to the democratic structure of this country.

Such a system brings us into line with Europe, most of which now elects MEPs through a regional list system. There may be a difference between an open list system and a closed list system, but if we adopt the system that some Labour Members want, we shall be in the mainstream—[Interruption.] Some Conservative Members obviously would not want to be in the mainstream, but that would tie us to the good will that exists, which is not to be frowned on.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my hon. Friend agree that the turnout at European elections in this country so far has been deplorably low and that it is important to consider mechanisms that will lead to a much higher turnout at future elections?

5.30 pm

Mr. Drew: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why it is so important that we try to improve our democracy. I look forward to increased participation.

This forms part of the constitutional changes which the Labour party was elected to deliver. It is not a whim; it concerns a stated policy in our manifesto and comes about through the joint consultative committee with the Liberal Democrats, to which we signed up. I admit that we are being asked to compromise; as I said on Second Reading, some of us would have considered STV, but that was not to be. It was more important that we found a system that introduced proportionality into the election of MEPs as the first and foremost principle. Whatever system it was, it had to be an improvement on the awful first-past-the-post system under which people do not participate in the European elections. There are many good reasons why the constitutional changes that are afoot will improve our democratic basis.

My noble Friend Lord Plant did much good work in terms of electoral reform when he chaired the Plant commission on behalf of the Labour party, which formed a large part of the work that we were able to take into the joint consultative committee with the Liberal Democrats. The Plant commission identified a check list of the measures that would result in a good electoral system. The first on the list was representation. We hope that MEPs will be a different sort of elected representative and will pursue a different role from that pursued in the past because they will play a regional role. That is to be welcomed. This issue is about checks and balances; it is about a system whereby people can be elected in different ways and pursue different roles.

The second item on the list was the nature of the elected bodies. No one can pretend that the European Parliament is not fundamentally different from this place and from the representation that we shall have at a regional level. The system used to elect those people can strengthen rather than weaken those bodies. The third item on the list is legitimacy. The proof of the pudding will be in the eating. We want to increase voter participation and we strongly believe that an open list system will result in a higher turnout because people will see the benefit of electing their representatives in that way.

The fourth point was stability. The system is robust, and whether we come up with an open or a closed list—I argue strongly in favour of an open list—whether by the d'Hondt or the Sainte-Lague method, there will be stability because the system's transparency will increase the electorate's interest and involvement.

[Mr. Drew]

The fifth item on the list is the key principle of proportionality—making votes count. Those of us who have always supported electoral reform feel strongly about that. Under the first-past-the-post system, people build up huge majorities, which may do wonders for their egos, but for those who vote time after time for a party that has no chance of getting to power, the system is disillusioning. Under this system, there is a proper relationship between the votes cast and the seats delegated. If we can achieve that in the European elections as well as in the Welsh and Scottish elections, we shall have proved that we can improve this country democratically.

We should like to think that the list system would reflect society, and result in the election of more women and people from ethnic minorities. People who would not normally be elected would have a chance to be elected. I support the open list system and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on staying open-minded, despite Opposition Members' taunts that he must come up with this or that system. He has had an opportunity to hear the debate and has allowed hon. Members, including Labour Members, with different opinions to state their case. We think that this is a better system which will lead to a much more representative set of people in the European Parliament.

Mr. Beith: I warmly commend the speech of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). I hope that it has made a strong impression on the Home Secretary, as he made his point very clearly.

The breadth of the debate under this group of amendments is illustrated by the fact that it started a couple of days ago with a thoughtful speech by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), who gave a perceptive analysis of the single transferable vote system and put to bed some of the misconceptions harboured among Conservative Members. His preference for Westminster is the first-past-the-post system, but today we are discussing how we elect MEPs and I share his view that the best system for doing that is the one used and endorsed in Northern Ireland—STV.

As the hon. Member for Stroud pointed out, we have all had to reach compromises in trying to find a system that will command sufficiently wide support in the House, secure proportionality and ensure that the electorate play a significant role in determining who is elected. The amendment turns on the latter point.

Amendment No. 4, on the merits of the divisor system, will be dealt with later by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), in a characteristically short and well-informed speech, if he manages to catch your eye, Sir Alan. I hope that you will agree that we can, as I have requested informally, have a separate vote on amendment No. 4 on the d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague systems, unless the Home Secretary says that he has at last realised, following the understandable miscalculations that were made earlier along the line, that this is the better system.

Amendment No. 79 simply flags up a point about which the Home Secretary may need to think—whether we should have signatures as well as a deposit. We have seen what happened at some by-elections with the Buy the Daily Sport party. For example, if there is a free-post delivery, the electoral system and public funds may be commercially abused by people using the ballot paper to promote a product. Having a significant number of signatures would be a way of dealing with that danger. There is provision for six, 10 or 12 signatures, but a significant number—several hundred signatures—would be a barrier against that abuse.

I do not particularly favour amendment No. 9, but it has a genuine purpose, which is, in a slightly artificial way, to attach a constituency to someone elected under this system. I disagree with its description, an "open regional list system", which is misleading, but I understand what it is getting at. That problem would be resolved informally by candidates in a constituency. It would be in a party's interest to ensure that the candidates whom it put forward came from various parts of the constituency. It would be in the candidates' interest to ensure that they had a strong basis of support in that constituency. If there were several Members of the same party, they would want to agree on some specialisation when attending events and maintaining contacts. It would also be in their interest, whether as the only Member of that party or one of several, to ensure that there were sufficient contact points throughout the large constituency that they represented.

The key issue is the question of open and closed lists, which can make a big difference to the quality of the system. We welcome the Home Secretary's offer on Second Reading to reconsider the issue. He has taken a long time over that, but I shall not complain if he comes to the right decision. Allowing voters to express a preference for particular candidates is an essential part of the Bill, and ensuring that voters continue to be involved in the choice of individual candidates helps to validate the system.

Few people like the idea of a closed list of party candidates, but the current system, against which we are judging the proposed system, is a closed list of one. People who do not like a party's candidate have to vote for another party, which most electors do not want to do. That usually happens only extreme circumstances such as those that led to the election of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell). Under the current system, people must accept the party's choice or vote for a different philosophy or set of beliefs, which most electors do not want to do.

Electors could at least be presented with a slate of party candidates, one or more of whom they might like, but our view is that they should be able to influence which of a party's candidates is elected. That is the purpose of our amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5 and 6 and new schedule 1. Voters would be able to choose whether to use their vote as a simple party vote, as many people would. Hon. Members are deceiving themselves if they think that most voters vote for individuals, because the evidence is that they vote for a party.

Mr. Allan: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the detailed work of Dr. Patrick Seyd of Sheffield university's department of politics clearly shows that the vast majority of voters vote for a party and that the personal vote is tiny in all normal electoral circumstances?

Mr. Beith: All the evidence points in that direction. I take the romantic view that we should encourage people to vote for individuals. It is an incentive for Members of this Parliament or of the European Parliament to know that electors see them as individuals. I am strongly in favour enabling people to vote for individuals, but hon. Members must recognise that most electors have a different preference. They want to vote for the party philosophy in which they believe or in line with their party allegiance. The system that we propose would ensure that they have the further option of influencing which candidate is elected.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): If people vote for a party, not a candidate, why does the right hon. Gentleman's party perniciously focus on personal issues, rather than policies, at elections?

Mr. Beith: Hon. Members of all parties sometimes focus on the personalities of candidates. I have heard extraordinary exchanges at the Dispatch Box in which the personalities of individuals within the parties have been criticised. Reasonable argument about a candidate's views is relevant to an election. It is proper for people to decide whether they want the Euro-sceptic or the pro-European element in the Conservative party to predominate, but they do not have that opportunity. The decision is made through the Conservative party's selection procedures, not by the electorate. Many Conservative voters would prefer to vote for a pro-European rather than for an anti-European candidate, but would not vote for another party. The merit of the system proposed in our amendment is that voters would become involved in that process.

Mr. Burden: The poll to which I referred was of course dismissed by Conservative Members, but it was undertaken by ICM, the pollsters often used by the Conservative party.

Mr. Syms: Sack them.

Mr. Burden: Yes, ICM got it wrong.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that poll showed that, when a large number of voters were presented with the type of ballot paper used in the Belgian list system, three fifths crossed just the party box and two fifths voted for individuals? That bears out his point that, although the majority go with the party line, a significant minority want a choice.

5.45 pm

Mr. Beith: Exactly. More people would want to influence the choice of individuals if a party nominated a candidate who was extremely unpopular with some voters or did not represent their views and aspirations. We all know of circumstances in which that has happened, or would have happened if people had had the opportunity to exercise a choice.

The public should be able to influence the range of candidates who are elected to the European Parliament. Under the electoral system in Norway, the ability to influence which candidates are elected by crossing out a candidate from a list has significantly increased the number of women in Norwegian politics. Indeed, it has transformed Norway's political system. We sorely need that in our system. Despite legal complications, parties are at the moment trying to include enough women on the voting papers to ensure that more are elected, but why should the voters not be involved in that process? Voters may disagree, but they should be involved in such decisions. The system that we propose would enable them to be so.

The limited voter choice system which would result if the Bill were amended as we suggest would still require voters to mark only one cross on the ballot paper, which is no more complicated than the system proposed in the Bill. People could vote for a party, a candidate on the list or an independent candidate. By using their vote to strengthen a candidate's chances, people would have a role in the choice of candidates, but the parties would still be able to put their preferred order of candidates before the voters.

Some people—I know that it is true in the Labour party—think that electors should not be left in total ignorance of who the party thinks are its strongest candidates. I understand that point of view, which is not entirely met by the STV system. One of the reasons we like it is the slightly anarchistic tinge to our thinking, but I understand the view of those who want the parties' preferences on the ballot paper. The system that we propose would allow that. It would make a difference only if there were significant swings of public opinion or a large element of the public was dissatisfied with a party's order of preference.

We are discussing the first national election in this country to be held under a proportional system. It is vital to use a system that can carry the confidence of the electorate. There is a genuine danger that a closed list system would not have their confidence and would not produce a better turnout than that at the 1994 European Parliament election, when about only a third of the electorate voted. Voting under the closed list system proposed in the Bill would be by party, but, as the mock ballot paper produced by the Home Secretary shows, all the candidates' names would have to be listed.

Our proposed change would not make the ballot paper more confusing, and our mock ballot paper in new schedule 1 provides a clear layout. The Home Secretary has suggested that our ballot paper would be improved if professional designers refined it by making it simpler. The Home Office's first proposal for the new police caution to be used during an arrest was extraordinarily complicated. I suggested employing two subeditors from The Sun to tighten up the wording. Experienced professionals could probably improve our suggested ballot paper.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The right hon. Gentleman is making an interesting case which we have heard from both sides of the Chamber. The problems with the turnout at European Parliament elections are not to do with the electoral system. There are much higher turnouts for Westminster elections on exactly the same system. People do not vote in European Parliament elections because, sadly, they find the European Parliament and their representatives distant. Will not huge electoral regions make them seem more distant?

Mr. Beith: I think that there is a combination of factors; but, if the hon. Gentleman consults the figures relating to the existing Westminster system, he will find that the turnout tends to be lower in areas where the outcome is entirely predictable. For instance, Conservatives in County Durham, feeling that their votes will make no difference to the outcome, are less inclined to vote. The system is one of the factors influencing the position. It is clear that all the publicity surrounding national elections and the possibility of a change of Government induces a higher turnout, but we need to look for ways in which we can secure a better turnout in European elections, and I think that this is one of those ways.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): The question of whether a list is closed or open does not appear to affect the turnout. In European elections, countries such as Germany and France, which have closed lists, achieve a far higher turnout than this country. The essential difference is that those countries have proportional systems in which every vote counts. To say that we have higher turnouts in Westminster elections is to miss the point. If we compare general elections with general elections, we see that this country has by far the lowest turnout, as it has in European elections. Both low turnouts are caused by the voting system.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman makes my point far more eloquently than I did. The key factor is whether the elector feels that his or her vote counts and makes a difference. Proportionality—which is what the Bill is essentially about—gives the elector the message that the vote will count, but to blur that message by saying, "You will be able to vote only for a party, not for an individual," would undermine the value of the change. Let me make it clear that it would not undermine it to the extent that I would prefer the present system to continue—a closed list of one with no proportionality.

A number of hon. Members have cited evidence from surveys showing support for open lists, and also showing that the system is easy to operate. This month, Professor Patrick Dunleavy of the London school of economics published a survey of more than 1,000 people on behalf of the Joseph Rowntree reform trust. It demonstrated that 80 per cent. of respondents required no additional explanation of ballot papers, but understood immediately how the system should operate—and that the majority preferred the open list system.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): The right hon. Gentleman might add that the social group most strongly opposed to that system were the ABs. That may suggest that the managerial and professional classes, who have a better chance of understanding the system, rejected it.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman is wrong: it is the other way around. The AB classes most favoured the open list system, and were keenest to choose between individuals. That reflects a social reality. In much of the country, those categorised by other letters in the social class system—which is a rather uncomfortable part of our history and culture—have tended to vote for the parties that represent their interests rather than for individuals. I should like to change that; I would like more people to be concerned about individuals. As I said earlier, most people are concerned with their party preference—but the fact that people who are familiar with making choices of all kinds wanted to make choices about individuals when voting is quite significant.

There is no evidence that the complexity of our proposals, as opposed to the Bill as it stands, makes them indigestible. They are perfectly manageable. As the right hon. Member for Upper Bann made clear, people in Northern Ireland are well used to the STV system, which is slightly more complex from the voter's point of view. They seem to experience no difficulty in using that system—and, moreover, in using it to maximum effect, to ensure that their votes have the maximum value. At a time when the Inland Revenue is telling people that they can fill in self-assessment forms and that they will be fined £100 if they do not get it right, it comes ill for anyone to suggest for a moment that people are incapable of dealing with a ballot paper of this kind to make their votes as effective as possible.

We urge the Home Secretary to amend the Bill to provide for open lists. After we told the Home Office about its error in calculation, it pointed out a technical defect in amendment No. 5. It was almost tit for tat. We are happy for the Government to include the provision in whatever form they choose, as long as it meets our criteria. The normal procedure would be to do that on Report. Between now and Report, the Home Secretary must reach a decision—a decision on which he has received unanimous advice, from hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. Opposition Front Benchers have made it clear that they do not like proportional representation or lists, but that, if there are to be lists, they should be open rather than closed. The right hon. Member for Upper Bann made it clear that he wanted the individual to be involved, which is achieved through STV and would be better achieved by open than by closed lists, and other Opposition Members have said the same.

The message to the Home Secretary is clear, and it is now for him to act on it.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): I have supported proportional representation since the mid-1970s. Unlike my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, I have also supported the conspiracy theory of history. I know that my right hon. Friend tends to support the cock-up theory. However, I subscribe to the growing consensus in the House of Commons that, in his passion to retain the first-past-the-post system, my right hon. Friend came up with the most appalling system of PR in order to maximise public opposition to it.

I, too, favour an open list, and—as a Labour Member—I have an additional reason for doing so. We know that, if the proposed system comes to pass, the Conservatives and Liberals will arrange for some form of membership participation—perhaps "one member, one vote"—in the ranking of candidates. We know that, following a meeting of the national executive committee, Labour is consulting members throughout the party on a proposal for us not to allow our members to determine the ranking of candidates. That, I think, makes a much more powerful case for an open list.

I understand that we have a problem. Given that we won so many European seats last time, given the need to ensure balanced representation of women in the European Parliament in the regions and given the determination to get rid of any MEP who signed the clause IV statement a few years ago, there will be a lot of shuffling around, and we cannot trust party members to come up with exactly the list that we would like.

That is unlikely to happen, as the NEC favoured the proposal by 10 votes to two, with three abstentions. Every Minister was absent, whether because of the pressure of work or because of a general distaste for what was being asked of them. I think that it would be completely unacceptable for a party that is considering saying to its members, "You may make nominations, but you must trust the leadership to sort out the ranking order" then to deny the electorate any influence. I do not know about Belgian or Dutch systems, but this is beginning to sound very much like the old Albanian system, in which public influence was minimised.

I am glad that the Home Secretary has been open-minded. I genuinely believe that the issue has not yet been determined, and I am not so outraged at this point that I will vote against my party tonight; but, unless the proposals are changed to give the electorate the right to vary the order of election, I shall find it almost impossible to support my party on Third Reading.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to have been called. I also thank the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) for describing me as superwoman, and hope that I can live up to that badge in the fulness of time.

I have a number of problems with the proposals. I hope that the Home Secretary will comment on amendment No. 9. Perhaps, like many women, he can do two things at once. The amendment does not satisfy the provision in the treaty of Rome—which remains unamended by subsequent treaties—for us eventually to be bound by a uniform electoral system.

The problem with the system that has been chosen is that it is not in keeping with systems currently in operation in other member states. Therefore, we may have to change it again to meet our obligations under the treaty of Rome. Would it not be better to be more patient and to look at the broader picture? If the Government decide at some time in the future to introduce proportional representation in the House—if we are not to have PR for this House, so much the better—will they choose this system or will they choose a system more in keeping—

6 pm

Mr. Beith: The trouble I have with the hon. Lady's argument that we should be patient in case the system does not meet the uniformity requirement is that it was advanced by the Conservative party when it opposed a proportional system when the direct elections were first introduced 20 years ago. I foresee the British electorate being permanently denied an opportunity to achieve a fair outcome to the election on that basis.

Miss McIntosh: The right hon. Gentleman is strengthening my argument. My argument for the Committee is that, if it was the wish of the House to have a system of proportional representation, the time to have adopted that would have been 1977. However, the House voted by an overwhelming majority to continue to operate elections to the European Parliament on a first-past-the-post system and I see no reason to change that.

Liberal Democrats and Labour Members have talked about how to increase the number of women on the eventual list. Female Conservative Members are confident that we are mainstream candidates and that we were elected on merit and not because of our gender or anything else. Perhaps that is a challenge that we can throw open to the Labour party and other parties.

Democracy is all about increasing voter choice. The present system for elections to the European Parliament is heavily constituency based, identifies a clear voter choice and allows candidates to be elected to represent a particular area. It would be a severe blow to democracy if voter choice and the democratic link were lost, as would happen under the system proposed by the Government.

Closed lists are deeply undemocratic because voters will be presented not with a choice of candidate but with a party label. There will be no named candidate except for independents. It seems curious that independent candidates will be named when mainstream candidates will not. It gives them an advantage over candidates from the three main parties, and perhaps the Green party, who knows? I wonder whether that was the Government's intention.

Mr. Burden: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: I should like to make some progress.

On closed lists, we find ourselves in strange company. Closed lists are common to Argentina, Colombia, Costa Rica and Uruguay—perhaps not first-rank European democracies. Perhaps the Government will say why we have aligned ourselves to such a closed list system.

Having been elected, on merit I believe, to the European Parliament, I am concerned that the voters' choice would be removed from the choice of candidate and that the party list would not provide a possibility for changing the preference or priority of candidates on the list. There are two problems with the closed list system, which I believe amendment No. 9 goes some way towards rectifying. The first problem is the election itself, which I have already explained. The second problem, which has been mentioned by a number of distinguished colleagues, particularly Conservative Members, is what happens after the election. Who takes up the casework under a closed list system? Who will answer the mail, who will take the surgeries and who will take up cases? Removing the constituency link creates a break that is regrettable.

Seven Members have been allocated under the list in the region of Yorkshire and the Humber. How will those seven Members on, for example, a Labour, Conservative or Liberal Democrat list campaign for voter recognition when their names will not be on the ballot paper that will be outside the election halls on the day?

I find some comfort in amendment No. 9 and I will certainly vote for it. It allows for an open regional list system. It allows for an open list and revives the constituency link. There are advantages in that from which I hope the Government will take comfort. It provides a recognisable link between a candidate and, subsequently, the elected Member. Amendment No. 9 would allow a candidate to be nominated for a particular constituency. That means that in that constituency an elector could vote for an individual candidate and, having identified a candidate with whom they wish to be associated, could change the priority of candidates on the list.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: I should like to conclude my argument because I have a short memory span.

The proposed system would remove the democratic link which would be revived by amendment No. 9. In mother and child terms, with which Labour Members can respond, it would revive the umbilical cord between the elected Member and the candidate and the constituency. I believe that all hon. Members accept that that goes to the heart of democracy.

The Government's proposal would destroy the electors' choice and remove the power to state a preference for a particular candidate. As I have said, it is not in keeping with the treaty of Rome provision that we should submit a uniform electoral procedure. Also, it is not in keeping with the proportional representation already operating in one part of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland.

I have asked the Government—I hope that they will reply today—whether the proposed system of proportional representation would be that chosen in the event that it was decided in future to change the system for general elections.

The greatest difficulty I have with the Government's proposal is that it confuses the electors and will make them less likely to vote. Those of us who wish to promote democracy would like more people to vote at every election, including European elections. As I have said, it is not in step with the procedures of the majority of member states and, therefore, would require an amendment in the future.

At the risk of being provocative—I should like to think that I am not known for that, at least not yet—I must say that the greatest danger posed by the system presented is that it smacks of federalism. The one thing that distinguished the Conservative party from the other two main parties at the general election was that we wanted to elect candidates and elected Members to the lowest common denominator. It was said earlier that Conservative Members do not like the regions. I must remind the Committee that it was a Conservative Government who created Government regions for administering policy. We believe that there is a place for the regions. I would prefer that parish councils be given more powers but that we keep borough, district and county councils. The endless drift towards regionalism in the United Kingdom is removing the elector from the elected person. I was delighted that, in presenting to the House the White Paper on regional development agencies, the Deputy Prime Minister announced that the Government would postpone direct elections to those agencies, which they had promised.

Conservative Members are against federalism. I oppose the electoral system proposed by the Government. I hope that, by supporting and passing amendment No. 9, we can put the Government's proposals to bed.

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: No; I should like to conclude.

A closed list system would not only promote federalism but allow the creation of a socialist super-state, and it would give the party hierarchies complete control over which candidates appear on a list.

Mr. Straw: I hope that, in the light of that final comment by the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) will reconsider his comments on our system and realise, with the passion of a convert, that there is much in it to commend itself to him.

I should like to deal with one calumny uttered by my hon. Friend. He suggested that the system proposed in the Bill was introduced by me—whose views on the electoral system for Westminster are well known—as part of a scheme to discredit proportional representation. That is not the case. Moreover, I should like him to know that the Labour party approved that change in forums in which I had absolutely no involvement. The change was recommended by a Labour party committee chaired by my noble Friend, Lord Plant; it was approved by the 1993 Labour party conference; and, subsequently, it was approved by party conferences throughout the previous Parliament. Although I was at those conferences, I did not have a vote on the change, and neither did I participate in any of the debates on it.

The hon. Member for Vale of York made an interesting speech. I am very grateful to her for saying, right at the end, that the Conservative party created regions. That is a very important statement. We have been accused—quite falsely—by the Opposition of inventing regional boundaries and the regions listed in schedule 1 to the Bill. That is not so. Those regions follow the regional boundaries established by the previous Conservative Government.

When those boundaries were first announced to the House, on 4 November 1993, by the then Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), he did not say—in the prosaic terms suggested by the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison)—that they were simply for "administrative convenience". The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal elevated the case for regional offices to a very much higher level. He said:

"He"—

that is me—

"will see that we are devolving responsibility from Whitehall"—

by implementing those changes and establishing those regions. He continued:

"We are cutting back red tape and bureaucracy. We are making it easier for local people, business men, local authorities and training and enterprise councils to talk to Government . . . I want the civic and business leaders to get together with their public and private-sector partners to define their vision and to set up what practical steps can be taken to build on the strengths of their areas and on the things that they believe most command their areas."—[Official Report, 4 November 1993; Vol. 231, c. 518]

The areas that he was talking about were those regions.

Mr. Clappison: Like the Home Secretary, I enjoy the prose of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), and I have spent some time listening to it—[Interruption.] It is very good prose. Surely the important point—which the Home Secretary is missing completely—is the purpose for which the administrative regions were established. In the statement that the Home Secretary of State is quoting, did my right hon. Friend say that he wanted regions to be used for electoral purposes?

Mr. Straw: No, he did not. However, in the passages that I have quoted, he was arguing—this is the point—that they were coherent regions in which people could come together and represent all the interests of those regions. That was the precise point that he was making, and that was the case in favour of those regions.

This group of amendments takes us to the heart of the Bill. If nothing else, the amendments demonstrate that there is no real unanimity on which system should be adopted. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) wants a system that is similar to that used in Belgium. The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) would like us to adopt the single transferable vote; whereas the official Opposition, in amendment No. 9—which I shall, for the elucidation of the Committee, deal with in more detail later in my speech—have produced a system that does not have a name, but which is of such stunning complexity that I can only assume that their intention is entirely to baffle the electorate.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere and the official Opposition have also tabled amendment No. 51, which seems to be an endorsement of the Liberal Democrats' position on Belgium. It is therefore clear that they have succeeded in baffling themselves in addition to everyone else.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Is there not a real difference between devolving power to regional agencies, as the previous Government did, and taking power from, for example, the rural development commissions, which have their roots in the countryside, and giving it to the Government's regional development agencies, which have their roots in the towns?

Mr. Straw: Mr. Cook, who is our Chairman at the moment, would very quickly rule me out of order if I were enticed down the path suggested by the hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, I do not accept for a moment what the hon. Gentleman said. Conservative Members really should look in the mirror before speaking about support for the countryside. I remember that, in 1977, my noble Friend Lord Shore—who was then Secretary of State for the Environment, while I was working as his special adviser—published, against Conservative opposition, a policy document to control the siting of hypermarkets outside town and city centres. In the early 1980s, that policy document was torn up by the Conservatives—by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). More than anything else, that is what has destroyed the countryside and led to the flight from the towns.

Miss McIntosh: The Secretary of State may have been distracted when I asked whether he would answer the point on treaty obligations. As hon. Members will know, the treaty of Rome obliges us to sign up to a uniform electoral system. The majority of member states have signed up to an open list. Would it not be better for the United Kingdom to adopt an open list, if that is the wish of the majority of the House?

Mr. Straw: I had planned on dealing with that point later in my speech. However, I believe that the hon. Lady is misinformed on two matters—first, on the degree to which the treaties to which she referred create an imperative on us to accept a single, uniform system. The treaties talk about common principles and allow considerable variation.

Secondly—as I was coming on to deal with the Belgian system—it is not the case that a majority of other European countries use so-called open systems. On page 33 of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill research paper, which is in the Library, the hon. Member for Vale of York will see that it is recited in the second paragraph that "Germany, Greece, France, Spain and Portugal have party lists where the order cannot be changed by the voter."

In other words: they have closed lists. If she reads the schedule to that appendix, she will see that the details of the systems within each of the member states vary considerably and, in some cases, by a wider margin than our proposed system will vary from the commonality of mainland European systems.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): The Home Secretary may recall that, on Second Reading, he and I had an altercation over the wording of the Amsterdam treaty. I made the very point that he has just made in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). I said that the existing treaties provided for a uniform procedure, but that the Amsterdam treaty contained the additional words:

"or in accordance with principles common to all Member States."

From that I argued, as I have no doubt that Lord Shore would have argued, that that would be a perfectly good reason for adopting the first-past-the-post principle, because the common principle to which we are referring, as distinct from the uniform electoral procedure, would be a proper system of democracy, and we regard the first-past-the-post system as a proper system of democracy and as a common principle.

I now come to the matter on which I should like the Home Secretary to comment. When I made that point, which is the point that he has just made in reply to my hon. Friend, he said:

"I do not accept that for a moment."—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 807.]

The Home Secretary has just contradicted himself. Will he explain that?

Mr. Straw: I am always happy to confess errors that I have made, as I have done in respect of the proportionality of the d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague calculations. What I said on 25 November was exactly what I have said now. I said that I did not accept the hon. Gentleman's point and went on:

"The arrangements that we are putting in place . . . are extremely similar, and in some cases identical, to those that are in place in the majority of other European countries."—[Official Report, 25 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 807.]

That is exactly the same point; I do not understand what the hon. Gentleman is trying to say.

[Mr. Straw]

I deal now with the so-called Belgian system. I hope that I have explained to the satisfaction of the Committee, if not to the satisfaction of the hon. Member for Hertsmere, how it was that on 25 November I told the House that, although we had proposed the closed list system in the Bill, I was willing to consider representations in favour of the so-called Belgian system. I had not decided to recommend it; it arose because of representations made to us—separately, as it happened—by the Liberal Democrats and by Charter 88, the constitutional group.

I appreciate that Conservatives find it difficult to cope with our style of government, which is not to go into a huddle, make decisions about the detail of the Bill and then refuse to listen to any representations, however strong they are. That is not our approach. Yes, of course, we are bound to reach reasonably settled conclusions before we come to the House with propositions—that is the duty of the Government—but it is also our duty to listen to representations. I have not yet made up my mind; nor have my colleagues—there is a particular reason for that—and I will not do so until next week. I happen to believe that it is important that we take into account the views of the House and weigh up the balance of argument.

Mr. Stephen Twigg (Enfield, Southgate): I welcome what my right hon. Friend has just said. Of course, the initial requests were made by the Liberal Democrats and Charter 88, but is he aware that there is substantial support among those on the Government Benches for the adoption of an open list? Many of us who favour electoral reform for the European parliamentary elections and believe that there are significant advantages in greater proportionality nevertheless feel that the reform will have greater legitimacy if it is done according to the Belgian model rather than a closed list system.

Mr. Straw: I understand what my hon. Friend says and will take note of it. As I said, we have not made up our minds, but will do so in due course.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere asked what were the advantages of the closed list system. I spelt them out in the debate on 25 November, but I shall summarise them now. First, the system is self-evidently the simplest one. Secondly, we need to take account of the fact that, within the European constituencies, even the existing ones, voters are much less likely to know the candidates by reputation—this is a self-evident truth—than within the smaller, more compact and more personal Westminster constituencies. Therefore, the argument that voters can size up the candidates as well as the party—an argument which favours first past the post and the single-member constituency system—is less strong. Another point that needs to be borne in mind is that an open list system could discriminate between women and members of the ethnic minorities.

The Conservatives should find two other aspects of the closed list system particularly appealing. The first is that the Conservatives chose the closed list system for the elections to the Northern Ireland peace forum in 1996, a point made eloquently by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann. If this plan was without any merit whatsoever, one would assume that the previous Government would not have touched it, but there was a serious debate about it. It was not as though they suddenly came across it by chance—they went through all the alternatives and decided to use that system. The hon. Member for Hertsmere may shake his head, but he is as ill-informed about this aspect of the Conservatives' history as he is about so much else. The Conservatives decided in favour of the closed list system and, by the by, they also decided on the d'Hondt rather than the Sainte-Lague system.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere said that one of the major objections to a closed list was that it would encourage parties to pack the lists with party careerists. It was at that moment that I noticed that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) wince, as did a number of his colleagues. If we consider the albeit relatively short list of new Conservative Members elected in 1997, it is noticeable that their single most common occupation was party apparatchik. That list includes the hon. Members for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), for Ashford (Mr. Green), for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and, above all, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). The crowning achievement of his career before he entered the House was that he was special adviser to Jonathan Aitken. Whatever the merits of the first-past-the-post system might be, it does prevent parties from packing the Benches with party apparatchiks if they so choose.

Mr. Clappison: I think the Home Secretary was struggling with that line of argument. I do not know what his background is, but, if I were he, I would tread carefully. For the record, the views that I was putting to the House and the quotation that I used were from the former ambassador to Belgium. They were not mine, but I am happy to endorse them.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman rather spoilt his comments by that final point. There is no question about my background—people know what it was. It was the hon. Gentleman's point, not mine. [Interruption.] My presence also proves the point. The hon. Gentleman was saying that only a closed regional list would attract apparatchiks, but that is utter nonsense.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not want to interfere in the contest that my right hon. Friend has just won game, set and match—said he, hoping to get on the party list. My right hon. Friend's mental processes are much faster than mine—said he, with the same motive—but I question whether an open system would discriminate against women and ethnic minorities. In an open system such as the Belgian one, the electorate could make substantial changes to the list's order of candidates and also use their power to vote against women candidates. He is surely wrong.

6.30 pm

Mr. Straw: I can best explain by reference to ethnic minority candidates. My experience of three-member wards in local elections in my constituency and elsewhere, shows that, if one party puts up two white candidates and one Asian with an obviously Asian name, even if the Asian is higher up the ballot paper in alphabetical order—in a position that would usually benefit the candidate—the two with English names are almost always elected and the one with an Asian name is not. I am not saying that that is conclusive, but it needs to be weighed in the ballot. The same may apply to women, although I refute my hon. Friend's point on that less strongly.

Under the Belgian system, electors would be free to vote for a party list, for an individual candidate from the party list or, of course, for a candidate standing as an independent. As drafted, the Bill provides for votes to be cast either for a party list or for an independent candidate, and does not provide for votes for individual candidates on party lists. The amendments would also provide for the allocation of seats to each party, the system of allocation of those seats between the party's candidates on the list, and the form of ballot paper to be used.

On Second Reading, I said that I believed in the simplicity and other attributes of the closed-list system. I also pointed out—I reinforce my reply to the hon. Member for Vale of York—that the countries that use the closed list system comprise two thirds of voters in Europe; the system is, in terms of voters, the most commonly used. However, I also said that I was prepared to consider the arguments for adopting a Belgian-type system. This debate, and much else, provides the opportunity for doing so.

One of the reasons why I do not want to make a decision until next week or the week after is that I have commissioned a small study to find out electors' views on the two systems, the results of which will be available at the end of this week. I shall make a decision in the light of that evidence and all the views that have been expressed.

The Committee will want to take into account the findings of research that was carried out by the democratic audit, which some hon. Members have been sent by Charter 88 and which my officials have discussed with its authors. Pages 14 to 17 of Library research paper 98/29 contains a useful summary of the results of that research, to which the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred.

Mr. Clappison: Will the right hon. Gentleman make that research publicly available?

Mr. Straw: Yes, of course; I was just about to say that I would.

Miss McIntosh: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is a complete anomaly that, on a closed list, independent candidates can be named on the ballot paper whereas party candidates cannot?

Mr. Straw: It would be an anomaly if that were the case, but it is not. The draft ballot papers, which we deposited in the Library, make it clear that individual candidates and the order of ranking will be on the ballot paper as part of the closed list. If we choose the closed list system, it is essential that people should, in making their judgment, see not only the party's name but the candidate's name.

Mr. Lansley: The right hon. Gentleman did not, I think, say that he would refer to the McDougall Trust research published by the Electoral Reform Society. The trust ran a number of focus groups—I know that he is aware of their value—and concluded that

"although voters claim to vote on the basis of a party, they react strongly to the removal of the right to select a candidate for themselves."

Mr. Straw: I am also aware of that research; all those matters will need to be taken into account.

It has been announced provisionally that the Bill's Report stage will take place not this Thursday, but Thursday week. If that remains the schedule of business, I intend on Tuesday morning to inform hon. Members, and the official spokesmen of all the main parties, of the Government's decision whether to choose the closed list or Belgian system, so that hon. Members have time, if they want, to table amendments.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): May I ask the Home Secretary a favour? He has until Monday or Tuesday week in which to make a judgment. As he knows, if he does not let us know until Tuesday morning, we shall have to work hard to table amendments that would be unstarred by Thursday. As a courtesy, will he let the official spokesmen know his decision on Monday rather than Tuesday?

Mr. Straw: In the light of what the right hon. Gentleman says, yes.

The right hon. Member for Upper Bann spoke elegantly and thoughtfully about the single transferable vote. As he rightly pointed out, STV was introduced by the then Conservative Government and endorsed by the Labour Opposition—we cannot disclaim parentage. STV is appropriate for Northern Ireland; because it works well there, we shall not change it. However, we do not think that it is appropriate for Great Britain; we think that the most appropriate system for Great Britain is the one proposed in the Bill, regardless of whether it is modified.

We have always taken the view that electoral systems should be appropriate to the nature and functions of the body that is being elected, and to the circumstances of the election.

Northern Ireland is a single region, and its 1.2 million electors return three MEPs. By contrast, the south-east region of England contains some 6 million electors, who will return 11 MEPs. If, in one of England's larger regions—this is not too fanciful to imagine—four parties put up a complete list of candidates and several independents stand, there could be up to 50 candidates. Under the STV system, the electors would be faced with the prospect of having to rank those 50 candidates.

We must also imagine the counting of the votes. STV is a complex system to count, as candidates drop out, surpluses are transferred and votes are given fractional values. In the larger regions of England—the right hon. Gentleman may say that we should not impose such large regions, but we judge that we should—the process could take up to a week, with all the costs and disruption that would ensue. The regional list system is common in Europe, and we believe that we should choose it in Great Britain, where circumstances are different from those in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Trimble: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman's reason for rejecting STV is valid or that the example that he chose is appropriate. We have experience, admittedly only in one election, of STV applying to constituencies as large as 10-seaters—under the Government's regional proposals, the largest constituency would be an 11-seater. It is not inevitable that there will be as many candidates as he thinks. An intervention does not give me enough time, but I could explain why the number of candidates would be much smaller than he suggests. In that 1982 election, there was no significant difficulty in running the count in a 10-seat constituency. Counts take a couple of days, but rarely longer. The right hon. Gentleman's argument does not stand up.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman and I will have to disagree on that. It is my judgment that, during the first election under the STV system in a 10 or 11-vacancy region in Britain, each of the parties would put up nine, 10 or 11 candidates. I understand his point, but I do not agree.

Amendment No. 9, which was tabled by the official Opposition, is quite remarkable. It purports to create an open list system for the election of MEPs, but does no such thing. The proposed system would destroy the flexibility of the regional list system proposed by the Government.

I invite right hon. and hon. Members to read the amendment, which is on page 2070 of the amendment paper. It proposes that elected MEPs are allocated a constituency within each region. It states:

"each candidate shall nominate on the ballot paper one constituency in the relevant region which he will represent, if elected;

(c) in the event of the same constituency being nominated by more than one successful candidate, the candidate elected first shall represent his nominated constituency;

(d) successful candidates unable to represent their nominated constituency for the reason given in sub-paragraph (c) shall, in the order of their election, choose another constituency to represent".

The Conservatives have proposed a quite remarkable arrangement.

It is fundamental to our democracy that voters choose their constituency and their representative. Under the system proposed in the amendments, the representative would choose the voters, even if the voters would not have chosen that representative. A successful MEP might have to choose a constituency that he or she did not want to represent or might be forced to represent a constituency that he or she might not want. It would be the most extraordinary situation.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister explain to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) that the amendment does not do the one thing that she thought it would do—provide open lists and give the elector an opportunity to alter the order of the parties' ranking?

Mr. Straw: It certainly would not do that. Nor would it give the electors choice over the constituency MEP. That choice would not made until after the election on the basis of the choices made by successful MEPs, not by the voters.

I am conscious of the time, so let me deal with the issue of divisors, which took up a great deal of time in the debate on 25 November. As I have already explained, I inadvertently misled the House about the d'Hondt divisor rather than the Sainte-Lague divisor. I should also explain that, even on the basis of accurate calculations, the difference is very limited. It is worth the right hon. Gentleman bearing in mind the fact that d'Hondt is used most widely across Europe. Sainte-Lague, which has been proposed by the Liberal Democrats, is not used in any European state for the election of MEPs. The only state that uses Sainte-Lague is Sweden where, instead of the initial divisor being three, it has been modified to the square root of two, which is 1.4.

Mr. Clappison: Surrender.

Mr. Straw: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says and I shall not go on about Sainte-Lague any more except in one respect.

Mr. Allan: Does the Home Secretary accept that, when making comparisons with other European countries, the critical factor in respect of the divisor is the size of the constituency? As most European countries use whole country constituencies, d'Hondt may be more proportional elsewhere, although it would not be here, given the regional lists and the sizes of the constituencies.

Mr. Straw: I do not accept that. The Library appendix makes it clear that a number of European countries use regional list systems, and the difference is very small.

Let me pick up the point made by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann. The Liberal Democrats ought to be straightforward about why they want Sainte-Lague, although it is not used anywhere in Europe. They want it because they think that it favours smaller parties. It is not fairer and the fact that we would be the only country to use it in the whole of Europe, given its great diversity, proves our point. If we are to have a divisor, the best system is simply to follow the serial—one, two, three, four, five. That is what the d'Hondt system does, and it was used by the Conservatives in 1996.

Mr. Linton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, in supporting the Sainte-Lague system, the Liberal Democrats are not supporting a system that favours small parties, as they claim? Indeed, the modified Sainte-Lague system that they favour was modified deliberately to exclude small parties. The system that they support favours middle-sized parties, particularly parties that receive 15 to 20 per cent. of the vote. A particular aspect of the Sainte-Lague system is that it rounds up to the nearest number parties that do not have a complete entitlement. That would benefit no party more than the Liberal Democrats.

6.45 pm

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The two words that he was looking for are self-interest. No one could accuse the Labour party of self-interest in introducing the system. I do not deny that self-interest sometimes plays a part in our decisions and I am glad that the shadow Home Secretary accepts that. However, the system of proportional representation that we are introducing is bound to lead to the loss of a number of seats that the Labour party would otherwise have held.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere asked whether we used divisors to allocate seats between regions. Those whom the gods wish to make mad they first introduce to divisors. I was not the only one to make errors in calculation under d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague. So did Professor Ian Maclean, who wrote a learned letter claiming that the system that we had used to allocate MEPs between the different regions was based on the system of Sainte-Lague divisors. That is wrong. If Professor Maclean or the hon. Member for Hertsmere had consulted page 5 of the Bill, they would have seen that we set out exactly the system to be used for the allocation of those seats. It is a very simple system which does not need divisors.

We divided the electorate in England by 71, which is the number of English MEPs. That produced an average figure of just over 521,000 electors per MEP. MEPs were then allocated to regions in such a way as to ensure that the sum of the divergences in each of the nine regions—ignoring plus or minus signs—was as low as possible. The minimum divergence is 146,012. Any future changes in the number of MEPs allocated to the different regions will be made automatically according to the arithmetic on page 5 of the Bill and not according to either Mr. d'Hondt or Mr. Sainte-Lague.

Mr. Syms: The Home Secretary said a moment ago that the system divided up the 71 seats in England and allocated the other seats—in other words, the division was not on a United Kingdom basis.

Mr. Straw: That is because Scotland and Wales have been treated as separate regions. There was a debate on that the other day, when the matter was dealt with pretty well.

Let me deal with three further points that have been raised by right hon. and hon. Members. The first is registration. Amendments Nos. 10 and 11 in the name of the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) deal with the registration of political parties. The amendments would remove a definition of a registered party and of a party's list of candidates. The Bill would continue to provide that only registered parties could put forward lists of candidates, but there would be no explanation or definition of the terms in the legislation. I cannot honestly see what purpose the amendments would serve.

We believe that registration is important to ensure that, for example, only votes cast for legitimate party candidates are used in the calculation of the allocation of additional member seats. Registration is also a practical solution to the problem of misleading descriptions on the ballot paper, such as candidates describing themselves, as they did in the 1994 European elections—with quite inappropriate results—as Literal Democrats. In a separate Bill, we are bringing forward proposals for the registration of political parties. Obviously, we shall explain those proposals in greater detail when the Bill comes before the House.

I want to pick up on the point made in the eloquent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on new clause 4. We shall of course review the operation of the 1999 European election, which we hope will be the first to be conducted using a regional list system. Under the new clause, I, as Secretary of State, should, in conducting such a review, speculate on whether there would be any advantage in conducting further European parliamentary elections using what the new clause calls "an open list system". Unless two elections are taking place, one using the system proposed in the Bill and the other the system suggested in the new clause, I am afraid that I cannot see how any Secretary of State could be expected to make any useful comparison. There would have been a trial run with only one system. A report such as the new clause would require would therefore be of doubtful value. As I said, there will be a review; I promise that we shall put it before the House. I hope that, in the light of that, my hon. Friend will see fit not to press his new clause.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed mentioned amendment No. 79. I understand the point that the Liberal Democrats are making, but, frankly, the amendment is unnecessary. Candidates for election in each parliamentary constituency are required to be supported by the signature of 30 electors in that constituency. The Secretary of State can retain, abandon or amend the provision for future parliamentary elections. It does not need to be included in the Bill. To require registered parties to provide 30 signatures from the new larger regions would therefore seem a rather pointless exercise. However, a requirement to provide a larger number would impose a significant burden on those required to check the signatures.

Although we have not yet decided to retain in part or abandon altogether the signature requirement for future parliamentary elections—we shall of course consult the parties about this—there is no need for the provision to be inserted in the Bill. I hope that, in the light of that explanation, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will consider not pressing his amendment.

This group of amendments addresses important issues that go to the heart of the Bill. Although I apologise to the Committee for doing so at great length, it is important to put the Government's position clearly on the record. As I have made clear, we believe that the system of election provided for in the Bill is the most suitable for electing Britain's Members of the European Parliament. However, we are prepared to listen—as the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) and I have today—to the arguments for moving to a Belgium-type system. All the arguments that have been made today will be given the most careful consideration. I look forward to the rest of the debate with great interest.

Mr. Cash: I should like to explain my objection to the whole concept of list systems. I am not terribly concerned about whether the system is closed or open. My objection to it is tied up with the fact that there is a proper link between the constituency and the Member, which we have established over many centuries. Conservative political giants, such as Edmund Burke and others, have set out principles over an extended period on such a link. It has worked and has a great deal of support on both sides of the House and throughout the country. I unambiguously state my objection to the concept of proportional representation in whatever shape or form it appears.

Having said that, I should point out that, when the Labour party was last in government in 1977, it stated in paragraph 17 of its White Paper on electoral systems:

"To abandon our traditional method in this way"—

by going to a list system—

"would be a major constitutional innovation, the consequences of which are difficult to foresee. It would mean the absence of the sort of constituency link with which we are familiar and could lead to changes in Party organisations, including giving the central or regional Party organisations a bigger role in nominating candidates. The electorate might take time to become accustomed to the new system and might be confused by the existence of separate procedures for national and European elections".

On the principal questions that I am addressing, nothing has changed since those days. The Labour party gave a perfectly convincing reason why a list system was unacceptable. It remains unacceptable—regardless of whether it is closed or open. It is objectionable and would be an abomination of the democratic electoral system which we have become used to and which could serve us well in future.

I fear that the gradual spreading of the fungus of the Bill's proposals on to the amendment paper in the name of my much respected right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), the shadow Home Secretary, is a kind of Euro-osmosis, which is entering the House in so many different ways. For the reasons that I shall give, I am concerned that we have adopted a proposal which, in many respects, is similar in principle to the Government's. I fear that the process is growing and that it will cause us more and more difficulties.

Just because the Government have such a massive majority and times have changed is no reason to go down their route. I can almost hear the Home Secretary, when talking about the open list system, subsequently saying, "Well, after all, the Opposition were rather in favour of it. This is the kind of amendment that they tabled." Therefore, if the Home Secretary changes his mind, which is likely, he can say that there was agreement across the Committee.

The region is given enhanced stature under the proposals. It is impossible to maintain the constituency link with the tyranny of the party list system, which gives so much power to the centre and the party leadership, as in Germany and France, rather than to local associations. That point needs to be reaffirmed, over and again. The ever-increasing expansion of powers in the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers through majority voting and co-decision procedures is eroding the principle of our ability in this House to make decisions. More power is being given to the centre.

I turn to the brilliant speech that my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), the Leader of the Opposition, made only two days ago in which he dealt with the question of proportional representation. He said:

"The doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty gives the party the political power it needs to govern."

Before anyone thinks that that is a reference only to the Westminster Parliament, I should remind them that Euro-osmosis, which is spreading into our constitutional arrangements, could so easily end up effecting a transfer of thinking from the European dimension to our own Westminster system.

The reference that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition made to "the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty" is directly related to the political power which is inherent in this House at the moment, but which is being eroded by the provisions of Maastricht and Amsterdam and the increase of co-decision, which has given the European Parliament power over our institutions. When we add the proposals in the Bill for proportional representation and the list system, we can see how our system is being eroded.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said that the Conservative party would fight the Prime Minister

"every step of the way. PR is a system of unfair votes. It takes political power away from the electorate and gives it to small parties, who can use their seats in Parliament to make or break Governments."

We should remember that, in the 1930s, the Weimar republic's system of proportional representation gave enhanced credibility to Adolf Hitler. It is not to be underestimated. Erich Fromm made this point in a book called "Fear of Freedom" and said that the real reason why Hitler came to power was primarily because the politicians refused to take responsibility for their own actions.

7 pm

It is absurd to imagine that this system will produce better government. In present-day Germany, the Free Democrats, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, have acted as kingmakers in almost every election since the basic law was introduced, despite the fact that the party has barely 5 per cent. of the vote. The same applies in New Zealand, where the first party has faced similar difficulties following that country's adoption of PR. My right hon. Friend predicts, rightly, that that would happen in the United Kingdom as well.

This is a matter of fundamental importance, not only to the Conservative party but to the Labour party, and we must reflect on the implications of the Bill. It accompanies a vast increase, under the Amsterdam and Maastricht treaties, in the power of Europe over this House and this country. It is creating regions and an undemocratic system. We should vote against the clause, but, in addition, I would find it impossible to support proposals which included an open list system.

Mr. Mitchell: I intended to speak in support of the amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for Berwick–upon–Tweed (Mr. Beith). It may be boring, like the Liberals, but I was going to opt for Belgium.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on a careful and sustained analysis, which I enjoyed. He was convincing on some of the points that I wanted to raise. He may be coming late—and somewhat reluctantly—to proportional representation, but it is clear that he has a thorough understanding of it.

My right hon. Friend said that he would listen to the opinion of the House, and that he had an open mind. I rise to express my personal preference for a system which is proportional, but which has an open list—rather than the closed list system originally proposed by the Government. That may be the least of several evils, but then the whole Bill is the least of several evils. My perfect Bill on the European Parliament and European elections would be the "European Parliament (Obliteration and Total Destruction) Miscellaneous Provisions Bill". Since we are not dealing with such an enlightened and far-seeing Bill, but with this one, I have to choose on the basis of what is offered. What is offered is not the most attractive form of proportional representation. A list system, whether regional or national, gives too much power to the party.

I view this matter in the light of the eternal question we politicians ask: under the first-past-the-post system, it is, "Will I get elected in this constituency?" Under PR, the question is, "Will I get selected in this system?" I fear that, under a party list system, I probably would not be selected. As soon as my application disappeared into the Millbank mixmaster for sanitising, the answer would be sent to the Mitchell family, clustered in our humble dwelling in Grimsby—"Sorry. Application lost in processing. Reapply in 2005."

The party list system is all that is on offer, and I therefore I welcome it as a major step forward. We can improve it by making it an open list on the Belgian pattern. The most open list is STV in itself, but there is a range of openness in Europe. Perhaps Denmark's system—in which seats are allocated to candidates on the basis of individual preferences—is more desirable and open. It results in more changes in the placings in the list submitted by the party. At the last election, seven of the 16 MEPs elected were changed by the electorate. In Belgium, where there are much tighter restrictions, only one was changed. I would prefer Denmark, but the least of several evils again—Belgium—is all that is on offer from the amendment and the Government. Therefore, we should accept Belgium.

Why? First, the people would prefer an open list to a closed list. The ICM survey carried out for the Rowntree trust—a survey of 1,130 electors—showed that there was a narrow majority in favour of an open list. When they were asked to choose candidates on the basis of an open list, two fifths opted for the individual candidate. Three fifths plumped—in 18th century poll books, they used to say, "Get a plumper"—for the party. A substantial proportion of electors want to choose on the basis of the candidates.

The Electoral Reform Society's own survey was based on eight focus groups, and was conducted by NOP. I keep applying to get on one of those focus groups, as I want to be a person of influence in this country and on the Government. My application is constantly rejected. I cannot understand it—it is a form of discrimination that the Home Secretary should investigate. The people in the focus groups preferred an open system, because they resented the restriction on their freedom to choose a candidate if they wanted to, which is implicit in the closed system. It is not that most would choose on that basis, but they want to be free to choose. They feel that anything else is a restriction.

Moving to an open list, following the Belgian precedent, will not produce drastic changes. People will not totally reverse the order that the party puts down, but the fact that the voters have the ability to make changes is a pressure on the party to present the most acceptable and attractive list of candidates—selecting candidates for voter appeal, rather than for machine appeal. That is an important difference. It would force the parties to offer more women candidates. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary raised a serious doubt in my mind about ethnic candidates, and he was probably right about that. However, the list system would advance the cause of women. Indeed, I do not know why we could not adopt the European zipper system, under which voters must zip from male to female candidates. We seem to prefer our women unzipped in the Labour party. I am digging myself into a hole, so I shall move on quickly. However, the Labour party should think seriously about how the open system would require it to adopt a more attractive list, instead of dominating the closed list as currently proposed.

I have been a longstanding advocate of proportional representation. The first-past-the-post system kept Mrs. Thatcher in power in a minority Government—the dictatorship of the minority. We should change the system as quickly as possible—in the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly and in the European elections. I would prefer a better and more popular system for the European elections, but the one proposed is the best that we will get. It is an important advance for the cause of proportional representation, fairness and democracy.

Mr. Allan: I wish to return to the subject of divisors—the mathematical sort that are infinitely less interesting than the small Wiltshire market town represented by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). When my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) asked me to talk about d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague, I thought that their most interesting aspect was their pronunciation. As it is not yet time for bed, I do not intend to go into the mathematical calculations, especially as I would probably get them wrong—something of which the Home Secretary has no little experience.

We do not need to consider the workings of the divisors so much as their outcomes. In particular, we need to examine how proportional the results are. In other words, how accurately do the divisors reflect the votes that were cast? The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) cited the academic support for Sainte-Lague as the more proportional of the two. Indeed, the study by Professor Maclean begins:

"Mr. Straw's remarks were entertaining and generally well informed."

That is a good start, but Professor Maclean makes the point that all systems need a rounding procedure and produce lucky and unlucky parties. He states:

"on average, and by any proportionality index, the Ste-Lagüe algorithm will always be the one that distributes luck most evenly among the large and the small."

Contrary to the allegation made by a Labour Member earlier, the professor also states that the Sainte-Lague formula

"does not 'favour small parties' . . . it is neutral among parties of all sizes."

In other words, the Sainte-Lague formula will distribute the luck according to the votes cast. If a party happens to receive a number of votes that falls midway between representatives, it will be lucky in some instances. If it improves vote share or loses votes, the luck will fall elsewhere.

Our research, based on the 1997 general election results, showed that the d'Hondt formula applied to Wales would have given the Labour party 80 per cent. of the representatives for 55 per cent. of the vote. The Sainte-Lague formula would have given the Labour party 60 per cent. of the representatives for 55 per cent. of the vote. It should be clear to the Committee that the latter is preferable to the former and I ask the Home Secretary to accept the evidence and adopt the fairer divisor. We should not adopt the easy option, but the more proportional option.

[Mr. Allan]

If we are to adopt a proportional system—I am pleased that the Government have accepted that—we should adopt the most proportional system, instead of a divisor that will lead to disproportionate results.

Mr. St. Aubyn: As the hon. Gentleman point out, proportionality is a relative term, not an absolute term. Will he consider the St. Aubyn system, which says that the first-past-the-post system is a form of proportional representation and gets rid of the need to use divisors?

Mr. Allan: It is clear, from the comments by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—or the Great Grimsby Member as he is often described in my local media—that the first-past-the-post system gave hugely disproportionate results in the 1980s. The proportionality index between the number of representatives and the number of first-past-the-post votes cast is wider than any of the other systems proposed today.

The Home Secretary should consider Professor Maclean's evidence. He should overlook the small technical errors made by both sides and reflect on the fact that Sainte-Lague is significantly more proportional, and therefore fairer, to all parties irrespective of size. It simply distributes the luck evenly, instead of in favour of larger parties.

7.15 pm

Mrs. May: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate. I wish to point out to the Home Secretary that I am a new Conservative Member who has never been a party apparatchik. Moreover, I am a female Member who was not selected from a closed, all-woman shortlist, like so many of his hon. Friends. I was selected on merit from an open list of both men and women. The female Members on the Conservative Benches do not need the patronising attitudes of the Home Secretary and his hon. Friends.

Mrs. Helen Brinton (Peterborough): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I am sorry, but I am limited in the time I have to speak.

I do not want a system of proportional representation, because it would lead to fragmented and unstable Governments. It would also give increased power to fringe parties. My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) is the only Member to have mentioned the danger that a proportional representation system would give power to extreme parties, but I am sure that many hon. Members would not wish to see some of those parties with such power.

Proportional representation would sever the link between the elected representatives and their constituencies. That is especially true of the system proposed by the Government. PR also gives increased power to the centres of parties. Labour Members have claimed that Members of the European Parliament do not have that link with their constituencies. I refute that and the contrary point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who has experience as a representative of a European parliamentary constituency. I can tell the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who claimed that Members of the European Parliament did not have a link with their constituencies, that the Member of the European Parliament for Thames Valley—my European constituency—is well known and active in his constituency. He takes up issues of interest for individual constituents and of general interest for the whole constituency.

The vital link between elected representatives and their constituencies is the fundamental basis of our parliamentary democracy and our electoral system at all levels. That link means that elected representatives can take up the interests of their constituents and of the constituencies as a whole. That link will be severed under the Government's proposals and our democracy will be the poorer.

I hope that the Home Secretary will listen to the debate, as he claimed he would. I trust that he will listen to the debate in this Committee and not only to the focus group that he has commissioned to produce proposals by the end of next week. The view has been expressed across the Committee that any list system adopted should be an open system, not a closed system. One of my concerns about the Government's proposals is that they will take power away from the electorate. They will sever the link between the elected representatives and their constituencies. Constituencies will no longer be able to judge how effective their representatives have been and vote on that basis. We know why the Labour party came forward with proposals for the closed regional list—it did that because it wanted to have the power in the centre. We in the Conservative party are ensuring that it is the members who have the democratic right to choose.

I close my remarks by quoting from the paper by Professor Dunleavy, Dr. Margetts and Stuart Weir, which has been quoted by several hon. Members. What their research showed was not that two thirds of people wanted a regional list system, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) suggested, but that, although people were reasonably happy with the ballot papers, open and closed list, with which they were presented, when they looked closer, a majority of voters would prefer an open list. The paper states:

"If a closed list system is adopted, then the parties will have to look carefully at the processes by which their candidate lists are created, to ensure that they are seen as legitimate. At present, Labour looks to be most at risk".

Mr. Syms: I should start with the usual health warning given by Conservative Members, which is that I am very much in favour of first past the post. Having said that, I do not believe that we can completely disaggregate this debate from the one we had on Tuesday, because every excuse for not changing the system is based on the fact that the regions do not suit any change.

We heard the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) telling us that, if one has to have a proportional system, STV works reasonably well in constituencies of three to five members. However, that would be difficult in the south-east of England, given its size. Several hon. Members have argued in favour of having open lists, yet the Home Secretary himself has said that an open list would be difficult in the south-east of England. Of course it would: in an area containing 5 million or 6 million people, it would be extremely difficult to differentiate between potential candidates.

The real problem and the crux of the Bill is the size of the regions. We need to marry up the constituency size with the electoral system and take both together if we are to strike the right balance when deciding which electoral system to use. The Bill fails to do that, which is a great pity. I am opposed to the closed list system that has been proposed and I believe that an open list system would be better. However, in terms of the Bill, that would be like trying to turn a pig into a racehorse. The Bill is not well balanced in terms of either the regions or the electoral system proposed.

Among the points raised in the debate was the allocation of seats between countries. As the Home Secretary said, England was divided into 71 seats and the rest of the seats were allocated. That means that it was not done on a United Kingdom basis and so there is a degree of over representation in Scotland and Wales. That is an important matter.

On Tuesday, the right hon. Member for Upper Bann asked the relevant question of how parties purge lists when those on a list or elected on a list system leave that political party. In an earlier intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), I raised the issue of how, when a party has nominated five candidates on a list and four are elected, the fifth has to stay on that list—the list has to remain relevant until the next set of nominations are drawn up. That is four years and a lot can happen in four years. What happens if a vacancy occurs and No. 5 on the list has gone to the Bahamas, or joined another party, or is out of favour within the party? Those matters need to be addressed, or there will be difficulties.

The passage of time tends to change people's political priorities, but, with a closed list system, we do away with by-elections. One of the advantages of STV is that it allows for by-elections, albeit under an alternative vote system, or sometimes a first-past-the-post vote as they have in southern Ireland. A closed list system means that the next person on the list moves up and the electors do not get the benefit of a by-election, in which they can express their opinion on the political parties of the day.

Mr. Clappison: The Committee will be pleased to hear that I do not intend to engage in analysis of divisors and so forth. The Home Secretary was fairly brave to go once more down that route, but I prefer to deal with broad propositions which I can make with a reasonable degree of assurance.

The first of those propositions is that the Government have been proceeding on a mistake—that, seeking proportionality, they have mistakenly chosen a system that is less proportional than another. The Government have got it wrong. I make that proposition with a reasonable degree of assurance. My second proposition is made with complete assurance. It is that the Liberal Democrats will seek a system that benefits the Liberal Democrats' self-interest. I can say that with complete assurance.

With an equal degree of assurance, I can state that the constituency link is a far better system from the point of view of the interest of electors than the system proposed by the Government. The Government's system was not designed for the benefit of individual electors or of individual MEPs; it was designed for the benefit of the party machine, and we put that on the record. The Bill would be much better if it were amended to reintroduce a constituency link. We are in favour of such a link in principle and we are not persuaded by the Home Secretary's arguments, especially as even he did not go so far as to say that he was against a constituency link in principle.

We are also deeply worried by the Government's approach to registration and by the way in which they have introduced the subject of registration at this late stage and with three major constitutional Bills on the go. We are concerned about that, especially given that the question of registration comes against the background of a Bill that is becoming increasingly tatty. The Bill shows all the signs of fraying at the edges and of mistakes being made. To be fair to the Home Secretary, I know that he is not the greatest enthusiast for the legislation and, to a certain extent, I acquit him of responsibility for it. Nevertheless, we think that this is a bad Bill and we shall support our amendments.

Mr. Trimble: It has been an interesting debate. Looking back, what stands out in my mind is the cowardice of the Liberal Democrats in not supporting what they said is their first preference.

Mr. Beith: If the right hon. Gentleman had listened to my speech, he would know that I praised his and said that we strongly supported his passionate commitment to STV.

Mr. Trimble: This was intended to be a short summing up, but if the right hon. Gentleman comes with that again, I might be tempted to push my amendment to a Division to see whether he will support it. That support should have been shown by signing the amendment and being prepared to vote for it and the Liberal Democrats' failure in that sense is what I was referring to.

I was astonished by the Conservatives' audacity in attacking a closed regional list system, without explaining why they had changed their minds since introducing such a system in the House less than two years ago. I must commend the Home Secretary on the open-minded approach he has adopted and I hope that he will move toward an open list system before the Bill completes all its stages. I should have liked to have a uniform system throughout the United Kingdom, but it is clear that there is no support for that in the Committee and there is business to be done. Consequently, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 9, in page 1, line 25, leave out from 'be' to end of line 26 and insert

'an open regional list system.

3A. An open regional list system is a system which complies with the following requirements, namely—

(a) each electoral region shall be divided into a number of constituencies equal to the number of MEPs to be elected for that region in accordance with subsection 2(4) above and Schedule 1;

(b) each candidate shall nominate on the ballot paper one constituency in the relevant region which he will represent, if elected;

(c) in the event of the same constituency being nominated by more than one successful candidate, the candidate elected first shall represent his nominated constituency;

(d) successful candidates unable to represent their nominated constituency for the reason given in sub–paragraph (c) shall, in the order of their election, choose another constituency to represent, and;

(e) if an elected candidate has nominated a constituency which no candidate elected before him has nominated, he shall represent that constituency even if a candidate elected before him, whose own nominated constituency has been taken, seeks to choose it.'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

8 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 3, line 5, leave out 'at' and insert 'in respect of'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 37.

Ms Quin: These are simple drafting amendments that make no substantive alteration to the Bill, but ensure that the status quo is not altered as regards an aspect of the franchise.

As members of the Committee may know, it is quite common for members of the armed services to be registered to vote in the constituency that contained their last civilian address, even though neither they nor any members of their family live there any longer. Such people are, technically, registered not at a specific address but in respect of their previous address, which is why the Bill is being amended.

[Ms Quin]

I stress that these minor amendments do not change the status quo. Indeed, they confirm it with regard to existing rules on the franchise.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 37, in page 3, line 17, leave out 'at' and insert 'in respect of'.—[Ms Quin.]

Ms Quin: I beg to move amendment No. 29, in page 3, line 40, leave out

'representatives to the European Parliament'

and insert 'MEPs'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 35.

Ms Quin: These are also simple drafting amendments, which, again, make no substantive alteration to the Bill.

Everywhere else in the Bill, MEPs are referred to as just that. However, one rogue reference to the former description of has crept in. Amendment No. 29 corrects that. I was elected to the European Parliament in 1979 and can remember that various documents referred to us by a variety of names, for example, Member of the European Parliament. I remember getting a letter addressed to Joyce Quin, MEA—Member of the European Assembly. Another was addressed to Joyce Quin, REA—Representative of the European Assembly. That experience was shared by the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), who was one of my MEP colleagues. Amendment No. 29 will stop such confusion and ensure that the proper title, MEP, is used.

"representatives to the European Parliament"

Amendment No. 35 removes an unnecessary reference. Schedule 1 to the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978, which schedule 2 to the Bill amends, permits regulations to be made on aspects of the conduct of elections. Among the things that it will be possible to do by means of regulation is to prevent individuals from standing more than once. As drafted, the Bill talks about standing more than once at a "general election of MEPs".

On reflection, and having considered the view of Parliamentary Counsel, we concluded that the last two words are unnecessary, as they are implicit in a measure that deals specifically with the election of MEPs.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 3, line 41, after 'State' insert

', provided that the poll shall always be held on Thursday.'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 73, in page 3, line 41, at end insert 'except a Sunday'.

No. 13, in page 3, line 42, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (3) below,'.

No. 15, in page 3, line 43, at end add—

'(3) An order under subsection (1) shall not be made unless a draft thereof has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The effect of the amendment is that elections to the European Parliament under the new system will be held on a Thursday, and that the designated date should be subject to affirmative approval by Parliament.

The amendment is necessary because of the attitude that the Government have taken on the issue. It is clear that new Labour, new Europe, new harmonisation is the agenda. As the Minister knows, most of the countries in the European Union hold their elections on a Sunday. It is clear to Opposition Members that part of the Government's hidden agenda is to harmonise our elections with those of the majority of countries in Europe and to move from our traditional Thursday to a Sunday.

There is no statutory requirement for general elections or, indeed, European elections, to be held on a Thursday, but in this country they have been held on Thursdays since 1935.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): As my right hon. Friend knows, like the Minister, I was successful in the first direct elections to the European Parliament in 1979. In that year, the elections in the United Kingdom were held on the Thursday and the votes were counted on the Sunday. Is there a way to square that circle?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. These amendments deal with the electoral process. My understanding of European law is that, although there are four days on which elections can be held, the counting must take place simultaneously. That is why my hon. Friend was elected on the Thursday but did not know it until the Sunday.

I stress the importance that we attach to continuing the tradition, and our concern that the Government have a hidden agenda to undermine it. Indeed, in our legislation, Sunday has always been excluded from the electoral timetable. Since 1981, Saturday has also been excluded. I am led to believe that to have elections on a Sunday would require primary legislation. No doubt the Minister will be able to tell us whether that is true.

There is no question but that, were elections to be shifted from Thursday to Sunday, they would become a much more expensive process than at present. Given the money that the Government plan to spend on holding the regional list elections, we see no justification for that expense, as we have made clear, or for the additional expense incurred by requiring people to work from early morning on the Sunday to the later hours of Monday. It would be a huge imposition on all those who had to help to conduct the election.

We all know from our parliamentary experience the number of people involved in, and the complexity of, organising a parliamentary constituency election with some 60,000 to 70,000 voters. The House has still not come to terms with the complexity that will be involved in running an election for 5 million or 6 million voters in a particular region. The manpower demands will be enormous. The cost consequences of holding an election on a Thursday will be huge, but they will be even worse on a Sunday.

Many of us have always judged Sundays to be special. We have had many a debate about the importance of separating Sunday from the rest of the week, for religious, workplace and family reasons. If the Minister replies that the Government will not push for elections on Sundays and undertake never to do so, that will satisfy us and would be welcomed by the Committee. However, unless she rules out such an option, it would be a grave misjudgment on her part to believe that there might not be a reaction across the country. Even if she says that it will not happen in 1999, that will simply increase the concern of those who will then wonder whether it will happen in subsequent elections. The issue should not be partisan; a commitment to rule out Sunday elections would satisfy the Committee.

I guess that the Minister will say that she wants to keep open the option of voting on a Sunday, because it might help to increase turnout. In anticipation of that argument, I looked at some statistics. I compared and contrasted the percentage turnout at the most recent general election with that at the most recent European election in 1994. The Minister will probably say that the number of Britons voting in that European election was considerably less than the number of those voting in the general election, and she will be right. The figure for last May was 71.5 per cent., which was a low turnout by our normal general election standards, and it was only 36.4 per cent. in the European election in 1994.

In Ireland, which also votes on a Thursday, the last general election turnout was 65.9 per cent., but it was only 44 per cent. in 1994. There is a case to be made that voting on Thursdays results in a percentage reduction in the European election turnout, but the same happens when voting is held on Sundays.

I offer the hon. Lady two countries' statistics. In the 1995 general election in Portugal, 66.5 per cent. of the electorate voted, but in the European election only 35.6 per cent. of the electorate voted. In Germany, which is frequently held up to us as the dynamo or the motor of the European Union—[Interruption.] I select my words carefully—the general election turnout in 1994 was 79 per cent., but in the European elect on it dropped to 60.1 per cent.

The point that I seek to make is that in virtually every country there is a drop-off, sometimes a significant drop-off, between general election turnout and European election turnout, irrespective of the day of the week on which the election is held.

8.15 pm

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the right hon. Gentleman deal with what happens in this country? Because of the rules governing postal votes, people may be unable to vote if they are called away from their constituency at extremely short notice to work on election day, which is a growing trend. Most people still do not work on Sundays, but if we enabled people to vote on Sundays, more of them could vote.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The hon. Lady seems to have forgotten that postal vote applications close some two weeks before election day, so the argument that moving to a Sunday would somehow enhance electoral turnout has no validity.

Mr. Loughton: My right hon. Friend will be aware that the busiest times at polling stations—I have sat outside polling stations during many elections—are when people are on their way to work in the morning and when they return from work in the evening. Most people do not go to work on a Sunday, and the incentive for them to go out on a Sunday specifically to vote is less. It is more convenient for them to vote on the way to or from work.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend makes an important point, and I am grateful to him for the clarity with which he made it—[Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. There is far too much background noise in the Chamber.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: At the heart of the amendment is our concern that the Government plan, either next year or subsequently, to harmonise policy with the majority of European countries and shift elections from Thursdays to Sundays. I remind the Minister that Sunday legislation has traditionally been given a free vote in this House. If she does not like the way in which our amendment is framed, we should be perfectly content for her to take it away and bring it back on Report appropriately framed, if that would help. Unless we get from her a commitment that European elections will continue to be scheduled to take place on Thursdays, we shall press the amendment to a vote at the appropriate time.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I wish to speak gently and constructively on amendment No. 73. I raised this matter on Second Reading, when it was given a sympathetic response by the Secretary of State, who said that he would look at the issue.

In two of the European seats in Scotland we do not count, let alone consider voting, on a Sunday. That is in respect for those who hold strong Sabbatarian views. If we move to vote on Sundays, we shall disfranchise a substantial number of people, especially in the highlands and islands and the north-east of Scotland, but also in other areas of the United Kingdom. If we want an inclusive society, we must respect the views of those who would feel that such a move was contrary to their beliefs.

Having always been involved in the European elections, I know that waiting from 10 o'clock on a Thursday night to a Monday morning when we start the count is not the easiest of weekends to live through. A great deal of nail biting and filling in of time goes on.

The Committee should treat this as a matter of respect. We should not disfranchise people with strong religious beliefs, which we should respect, irrespective of our own views. I am a member of my Church and a practising Christian. I would have difficulty with voting on a Sunday, as would many of my constituents.

Mr. Allan: Liberal Democrat Members believe that there should be no automatic presumption that elections should be held on Thursdays. However, some of my hon. Friends, like the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), represent people who hold strong Sabbatarian views, and others have strong views of their own. They expect a free vote on Sunday elections, and my party is committed to such a vote on the Scottish National party amendment. We are less supportive of the proposition that the Bill should specify Thursday as the day on which elections are held. We have no problem with the other four days, and there is a strong case for using Saturday for weekend voting. Schoolchildren would benefit from not having their education disrupted by schools becoming polling stations on weekdays.

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green): I take the point that was made about Scotland, but we should take into account the fact that voting on a Saturday would be wholly unacceptable to Jewish people.

Mr. Allan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for reminding me of the sensitivities of various groups. Whatever day we choose, there will be problems. We shall hold a free vote on the amendment because people hold strong religious beliefs. I have misgivings about using Thursdays, because people who work or who have family responsibilities have problems voting then.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): I oppose the Government's proposal and support amendment No. 12, for two reasons. First, many people have a conscientious objection to voting on a Sunday. I do not, but I would be sad if the Committee, directly or indirectly, put in place a proposal that would have the practical consequence of disfranchising a substantial number of people.

Secondly, I am against giving Governments the power to make laws without having proper recourse to the House. The Minister will say that an order will have to be laid, I suspect under the negative procedure. There would be no proper debate; only, at best, an hour and a half of discussion of an unamendable order. A debate in the Chamber is unlikely. I am against giving to Governments powers that do not have to be conferred on Governments.

For those reasons—conscientious objection and the impropriety of the proposal—I support the amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney).

Miss McIntosh: I shall speak against amendment No. 73 and be specific about why European Parliament elections can be held on a limited number of days.

There is a Council of Ministers agreement that an election must be held within an envelope of days, between Thursday and Sunday. The treaty and regulations govern the handling of elections.

I support amendment No. 12. My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) put powerful arguments in favour of holding elections on Thursdays, not Sundays, because of the additional expense. I fear the consequences of changing the day on which elections are held and caution against that. It would be difficult for the very young and the very old to adapt to such a change. If an election were not held on a Thursday, some people might think that it was of no consequence. If elections in this country are always to be held on a Thursday, that day should also be used for the European Parliament election.

Mrs. May: I support amendment No. 12, and the comments of the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) about religious objections that would prevent people from voting. Her amendment refers to Sundays, and the hon. Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis) reminded us of the problems with Saturdays. I understand that both days are ruled out because some people are unwilling to vote then.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) seemed to be against voting on Saturdays and Sundays, but appeared not to favour weekdays because people were working. It is inevitable that a weekday will be used because Saturdays and Sundays are unacceptable to some people as polling days. As my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) said, if we are to use a weekday, we should stick with the one that we have always used, because people know that important elections are held on that day.

The Bill does not state the hours during which polling stations will be open, perhaps because they are specified in the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978. I assume that the polling hours will be as they are at present.

We must encourage people to vote and make it easier for them to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) said that many people vote on the way to or from work. The hours during which polling stations are open are crucial to enabling people to vote. What hours will polling stations be open on European election day?

Mr. Loughton: I want to reinforce the case against voting on Sundays instead of a working day. Just as people may not be available to vote on a Thursday, they may be unavailable on a Sunday for a host of reasons. If the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) is concerned about getting a 100 per cent. turnout, she should suggest that polling stations get in line with supermarkets and open 24 hours a day, or open not just on Thursday between 7 o'clock and 10 o'clock, but all day on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday. People could choose the day on which to vote according to their religious convictions or business and family commitments.

The Bill does not make such changes, but it changes enough. We are discussing fundamental constitutional changes, the like of which have not been seen since we began electing Members to the European Parliament in 1979. We are not even making these changes to fall in line with the rest of Europe. Much has been said about not only how candidates will be selected differently by different parties, but how countries across the European Union use different electoral systems and vote on different days according to different types of regional government, different party structure and different party list. If Labour Members cannot even agree with that, can we not at least specify Thursdays? In the past, people have known where they are and have been able to make arrangements to vote. That has been the case for many years.

If people are serious about voting—if they are really interested in a democratic process—and, in this instance, if they are interested in electing MEPs, they will find a way of voting on a Thursday. Can we at least keep that link with the past?

8.30 pm

Mr. Lansley: I did not intend to speak, but, having read the amendments and listened to the debate on them, I feel that they point compellingly to the argument presented by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney). I also think that the argument has developed during the debate.

We should be grateful to the hon. Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis) for reminding us that it is incumbent on us to respect the views of minorities, and minority faiths in particular, whatever may be our personal view. I share the feeling of my right hon. Friend: although I am a practising member of the Church of England, I would not have any difficulty in voting on a Sunday, but I know and respect others who would. I also think that people with different faiths—Jewish or Muslim—might not want to vote on a Saturday. We should strain not to impinge on the views and interests of minorities. After all, as the debate has made clear, it is far from obvious that there is any benefit to be derived from holding elections at weekends.

Moreover, leaving aside the objections to which I have referred, weekend elections would be a significant constitutional innovation. Such an innovation should not be entered into lightly or ill-advisedly, and—as my right hon. Friend said—it should certainly not be entered into on the basis of an order laid by the Secretary of State without debate in the House and an affirmative resolution. I stand to be corrected by the Minister if I am wrong, but I think that my right hon. Friend was right in saying that, under the Bill, the order would be made under the negative resolution procedure.

If the election is not to be held on a Saturday or a Sunday, I see no reason to give Ministers discretion to choose a day other than Thursday. I do not think that anyone has argued today that one weekday is better than, or different from, another. I think that we are all accustomed to voting on Thursdays. Returning officers, party organisations and, indeed, voters probably consider it normal to vote on Thursdays, and would think it abnormal and unconventional to do so on any other day. We are all creatures of habit, and I suspect that, as voters, we are all very much the same. I think that we might see a lower turnout on a weekday other than Thursday. If Saturdays and Sundays are excluded, therefore, there is everything to be said for accepting the proposal to specify Thursdays.

I dare say that any order presented by the Secretary of State will refer to a day within the normal confines of the election of MEPs on a Europewide basis. That has already been mentioned. Nevertheless, I feel that any discretion used by Ministers should involve an affirmative resolution of the House. It should be customary in the House for electoral matters to proceed as far as possible by way of consensus between parties, and as little as possible by dictate of the majority party. I hope that no Government would want to feel that they were contriving an electoral process—including election day—that was advantageous to that Government rather than to democracy.

Ms Quin: This short debate has raised a number of issues.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), the shadow Home Secretary, seemed to want to be North-West Cambridgeshire's Mystic Meg. He tried to predict what I would say, and I am not sure whether he will be disappointed.

All the amendments deal with the day on which European general elections are held. Let me provide some background information about how the day is selected. As I suspect the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) knew, the key document is the one entitled "Act concerning the election of representatives of the European Parliament by direct universal suffrage annexed to the decision of the Council of the European Communities dated the 20 September 1976". It provides that a European parliamentary general election must be held five years after the last election; but, should it prove impossible to hold an election on that exact day, the Council is empowered—if there is unanimous agreement—to vary the date by one month in either direction.

As the hon. Member for Vale of York said, the election period runs from the Thursday morning to the following Sunday. Under the legislation, each member state is free to pick the day within that period on which it wishes to hold its election. It is possible, therefore, to vary the day now, although we have no plans to do so.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) and some of my hon. Friends, pointed out that it was theoretically possible to vary the day. The pros and cons of holding elections on Saturdays were discussed. Elections to the European Parliament are generally held on Sundays in many of our partner countries, but the Government have no plans to switch from our traditional Thursday polling day, and we certainly intend the 1999 elections to be held on a Thursday.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me to rule out other days for all time, but, as we all know, Parliament cannot bind its successors, and it would be very foolish of me, as a junior Minister, to try to bind my successors for all time. I can only offer the right hon. Gentleman the reasonable proposition that we have no present plans to change.

Mr. Hogg: If that is the case, why not include it in the Bill?

Ms Quin: What is being suggested is no different from the arrangements that obtained during the 18 years for which the right hon. and learned Gentleman's party was in power. The Conservatives saw no need to change the arrangements in this way. I have said what the legal position is, in terms of all parties being able to vary the day, but I have also made it clear that we do not intend to do so.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire said he did not feel that the voting day was a partisan matter, and there is considerable merit in that view, in regard to our own general elections as well. We are, however, dealing in this debate with the European elections and their legal base. I accept that, if we were tempted to go down such a route, there would be difficulties. Hon. Members have commented on that. Certainly, people in Britain are used to voting on Thursdays. As for the European elections, I think that the combination of a new voting system and a new voting day would be unfortunate. We hope and believe that the new voting system will encourage more people to vote in European elections, for many of the reasons that have been advanced during our debates. If we changed the voting day at the same time as we changed the electoral system, it would be extremely difficult to know what contribution each of the two innovations had made to the change in turnout.

[Ms Quin]

As the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) has pointed out, there would be problems in certain parts of Scotland and, no doubt, in other parts of Britain where there would be strong religious objections to trying to introduce Sunday voting. I am tempted to say that Scotland pioneered Sunday trading, which I voted against, but the hon. Lady's points were well made in terms of the area to which she referred. As I have said, the Government have no plans to introduce Sunday voting for elections to the European Parliament and, because of that, I hope that the hon. Member for Moray will recognise that her amendment is unnecessary.

I hope that the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will see that the first of his amendments is unnecessary and that it could cause problems in the future. As I have already outlined, member states do not have a free hand in setting election dates. The election has to be held in a Thursday-to-Sunday period. It is possible—I accept that it is highly unlikely—that, at some time in the future, that could be changed to a Sunday-to-Wednesday period. In that case, the right hon. Gentleman's amendment would cause real problems and I urge him to withdraw it.

The right hon. Member referred to turnout. I listened to everything he had to say, but he seemed basically to be saying that turnout in the European elections tends to be lower than in national elections—we all know that. We hope and believe that the system we are introducing will encourage people to vote. Whatever the merits or demerits of our present first-past-the-post system, many votes do not count towards the final total. That will not be the case in the system that we are introducing for the European elections. We hope that the turnout for the next European election will be higher than in the past.

Mr. Syms: If the turnout is lower, will the Government reconsider their future position?

Ms Quin: The hon. Gentleman will have heard my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary say that after the elections we will look at what has happened and evaluate it. That was in response to a suggested amendment from a Labour Member. Obviously, we will look at the result of the elections and I hope that we will look at all the factors that obtained in the European parliamentary election period.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire began with a few snide comments about new Labour, new harmonisation. In case there is any doubt, let me make it clear that the Government have no interest in harmonisation for harmonisation's sake. I am more than happy to celebrate the diversity of the regions and the member states of the European Union.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I will not detain the Committee because I think that we should draw this issue to a conclusion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said that we could vote either at the weekend or during the week. For reasons that many hon. Members have adduced, voting at the weekend creates real difficulties. The hon. Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis) made a valid point which helped to strengthen the argument about religious diversity in our country. This issue is important not only to Christians but to a whole variety of religious groups who hold their beliefs strongly and whose lives and life behaviour are influenced by those religious beliefs. That point was also made by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing).

8.45 pm

All were offering me encouragement for my point when I stressed that the House advances any issues involving Sunday activity on the basis of a free vote because it recognises that there are employment, family and religious consequences at weekends. It would be a sad day if the House, which is the ultimate defender of our freedoms, should seek to impinge on religious freedom.

The speech made by the Minister of State, was disappointing. I say that not in a partisan spirit but because she was not able to sense the mood of the points being made to her. The Minister said that no Government or House can bind its successors. She is right, but, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said, that is not an argument for not putting this in the Bill. All it means is that some future Government or Parliament would have to change the legislation. That is a more major step.

The Minister said that the previous Government did not do this and implied that, because of that, we have no right to make an issue of it now. We did not introduce this sort of legislation. We did not introduce legislation that was designed to produce a degree of harmonisation with the other countries in Europe in this electoral process.

What most concerned me about the Minister's speech was that she talked about two sets of innovations—the new system and the possibility of moving to Sunday voting. She said that the two changes would not take place in 1999 because we would not know which innovation had affected the turnout. That is slightly chilling. It seems to indicate that there was, in Government, a consideration of moving to Sunday right now and that there is certainly active consideration to look at that for a subsequent election.

The Minister has made her position clear, and she is not going to change. She has made it clear that she does not think that she has the freedom to change. The mood of the House and the mood of the debate has been quite clear. We think that there should be a clear commitment in the Bill that elections will continue to be held on a Thursday and a clear commitment that they will not be on a Sunday. The Minister will not give us that commitment on behalf of the Government so we will have to press the amendment to a Division.

Mrs. Ewing: In light of what has been said, the speech of the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) was rather depressing because it was ungracious. I respect the points made on behalf of the Jewish faith. There are other minority faiths in the United Kingdom that we should consider, because we are an inclusive society. Given the good-natured and sensible response from the Minister, I wonder whether it would be possible to ensure that, on Report, it could be written into the Bill that the next elections will be held on a Thursday.

Ms Quin: I am grateful for the tone in which the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) put her question. I am happy to take advice, but I believe that that would not keep us in line with the original legal base on which the European parliamentary elections are founded. I have said that there is to be no change for these elections and that we have no plans to change the day and I would have hoped that that would be sufficient reassurance for the hon. Lady.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 3, line 43, at end add—

'3E.—(1) The Secretary of State shall by regulations prescribe the form of the ballot paper to be used at the poll for the election of representatives to the European Parliament.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, the ballot paper shall include, separately from the list of candidates, a brief explanatory statement describing the method of election and the procedure to be followed by each elector in casting his vote or votes.'.

I do not think that I should be courting too much controversy if I said that the simplicity which has been alleged on behalf of the new electoral system for the European elections is not invincibly self-evident to everyone. If the Committee has at times struggled with divisors, proportionality and so on, the electors will have even more of a struggle when confronted with the system.

We owe it to the electors to explain to them what is happening. We should not just present to them the choices that they are offered, but explain how the system works and what will happen after they have cast their votes. That is a fairly simple proposition which ought to be adhered to in a democracy.

We hope that the Government will welcome the amendment. It requires the ballot paper to include, separately from the list of candidates,

"a brief explanatory statement describing the method of election and the procedure to be followed by each elector in casting his vote or votes."

That would be helpful to electors.

There are grounds for suspecting that the Government themselves feel that the system needs more explanation. There has been talk of expensive advertising campaigns. Apparently, there is an internal debate in the Government about how best to explain the system to the public. The amendment provides one way of doing just that. Perhaps the Government should think carefully about providing reading rooms or something similar where electors could go to study the new system and see how to go about casting their vote.

The amendment is intended to be constructive. I shall be interested to hear the Minister's comments on how the Government intend to explain the new system to the electorate and whether the names of the candidates will appear separately on the ballot as the amendment suggests.

Mr. Hogg: I agree with the spirit of the amendment, but not with the precise form. The real issue is the complexity that flows from the changes that the Committee is considering. I do not think that the problem can be addressed by an explanatory statement attached to the ballot paper—if only because people going to a polling station do not expect to have to sit around for a long time reading an explanatory statement—but that we need an explanatory statement to be sent to the electorate is self-evident.

My suggestion is that the Minister agree to the principle set out in the amendment and agree further that an explanatory statement should be sent to all electors in good time for the relevant election. That would be most desirable and helpful.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): The amendment provides the opportunity to raise the question of access to voting stations for blind and partially sighted people, a matter which I am sure concerns many hon. Members. I have raised this issue in debates on other Bills that will change our voting system. I should be interested to hear what plans the Government have to ensure that, when the new system of voting is introduced for the European elections, the maximum opportunity is provided to blind and partially sighted people to enable them to exercise their right to vote unaided and in person at the polling station.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I had not intended to speak to this amendment, but I am very interested in what the hon. Gentleman says and would like to extend the discussion to include access for people with a range of disabilities, not just those that he mentioned. It is a matter I have raised in the all-party disablement group. The European elections provide us with an opportunity to consider the question of access. I could not miss the chance to say that, because it is such an important matter.

Mr. Burstow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He and I have attended meetings of the all-party disablement group at which "Polls Apart 2", the report published by Scope, has been discussed. That report highlights concern about access to polling stations during the most recent general election. Several of Scope's recommendations should be considered so that we increase the turnout at the next European parliamentary elections.

I want to find out how the Government will ensure that blind and partially sighted people can vote unaided and in person at the polling station. They are often expected to use a postal vote instead, but I want to disabuse people of the idea that that is acceptable. Blind and partially sighted people have a fundamental right to exercise their vote on the same day as everyone else. Will the Government experiment with braille templates and larger print formats, so that more people can exercise their vote in person in future European elections?

Miss McIntosh: The arguments for the amendment are self-evident and have been sufficiently rehearsed. My concern is that the local elections will be held on one system, but, within a month, the electors will be asked to vote under a novel and rather complicated system. If the Government are not minded to accept the amendment, what efforts will they make to explain the new procedures before electors enter the polling booth?

Ms Quin: I have listened carefully to hon. Members' comments in this brief debate. I shall respond in the spirit of the concerns that have been expressed, although I do not believe that the amendment is necessary or entirely helpful. On the aim and spirit of what has been said, there is little between the Opposition and the Government—I particularly endorse the comments of the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg).

I assure the Committee that the form of the ballot paper will be set out in regulations which will be made by the Secretary of State and subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The Government firmly intend that the names of all the people included on party lists should appear on the ballot paper. The Committee will know that we arranged for four sample ballot papers to be placed in the Library. Those hon. Members—including, I presume, Opposition Front Benchers—who have examined the sample will have seen clearly that candidates' names appear. I hope that there are no doubts about the Government's intentions on that.

Obviously, as happens currently, a ballot paper will contain straightforward instructions to the elector about how to fill it in. The new system will continue to be simple—the instruction will be "Place one cross on the ballot paper". No doubt we can consider whether that wording could be improved or amplified, but there will certainly be something of that nature on the ballot paper.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) suggested that the ballot paper should contain a description of how the electoral system works. Such a move would be unprecedented; it is a surprising proposal from a party that has argued against electoral reform. We do not believe, for the reasons given by the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham, that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is particularly helpful.

We do not have a description of the method of election on the ballot paper. I do not accept that there is less need to do so for elections conducted by the first-past-the-post system, as everyone, including first-time voters, is assumed to understand how it works.

Plenty of first-time voters may be unclear about the mechanics of the existing system. Equally, EU citizens can vote in local elections here, although they may not be familiar with the system. However, we do not provide them with explanations on the ballot paper, and with good reason. As the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham said, the design of a ballot paper should be as simple and clear as possible, with no information that might confuse voters or cause unnecessary delay in the voting process. It is significant that in Northern Ireland, where the more complicated STV system is used for all elections other than parliamentary ones, the ballot paper merely gives directions on how to vote, without further explanation of the system.

The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) raised an important point. Other hon. Members also referred to the importance of explaining to the electorate in the immediate run-up to the election how the system works. I am sure that there will be great interest in and discussion about the new voting system. The media, too, will play a part in explaining how the new system works. The Government will explore ways of explaining the new system to the electorate and everything will be done to ensure that there is no shortage of information detailing the mechanics of the new electoral system.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) made some interesting points with which I have great sympathy although they were not directly relevant to the amendment. As he knows, because he has raised the issue in Adjournment debates, a working party under the chairmanship of the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), is examining the issues, which are important, as I know from my own constituency. I am sure that all hon. Members are aware of the difficulties faced by blind, partially sighted and disabled people in gaining access to polling booths and participating properly in elections.

In the light of what I have said, I hope that the hon. Member for Hertsmere will ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Clappison: I have listened to the Minister's response and I can assure her and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) that my suggestion that reading rooms be set aside was slightly tongue in cheek. However, I am still concerned about the complexity of the new system which will be presented to the electorate. I share my right hon. and learned Friend's concern that it should be properly explained to the electorate. He made an important suggestion in that regard.

I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which she framed her reply. I listened carefully, but I did not hear a great deal about how the Government proposed to explain the system to the electorate. It is all very well for the electorate to be invited to vote, but people will want to know what happens next. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) is concerned about that, I can assure him that the same issue perplexed the Home Secretary, who suggested that we embark on an expensive publicity campaign. The amendment would be one way to avoid that.

We still have not heard exactly how the Government propose to explain the new system to the electorate, but, in view of the lateness of the hour, although I am disappointed in some respects, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

9.15 pm

Sir Brian Mawhinney: We have spent a long time debating this clause because it is at the very heart of this rather unacceptable Bill.

Thus far, under the Government's leadership, we have deprived the people of Gibraltar of a vote and created regions that are neither recognisable nor manageable. We are to have a voting system, but the Government do not know what it will be. We are to have registered parties, but the Government have no idea what sort of registration there will be. The Government are setting aside the boundary commission and will not consult.

That is a brief but accurate summary of clause 1. It is for that reason that we shall vote against its standing part of the Bill.

Mr. Hogg: I have been in the House for 19 years, or thereabouts, and this is the most objectionable constitutional Bill that I can recall. There are four reasons for that.

The first is this: there is no convincing reason why we should make any change whatever. The only reason which has been given is that some other European states want us to make a change. I do not regard that as either a good or a sufficient reason. I have heard no other sustainable reason why we should make a change.

The second and different point is this: I regard a constituency-based form of election as essential to our democratic system. It has huge advantages. It provides for real accountability. Members of Parliament know precisely to whom they are accountable—first and foremost, their constituents. That will not be so under the proposed system. Under our system, electors know precisely to whom they can go for advice and representation, but under the proposed system for the European Parliament, they will have not a clue. There will be a very large list, and electors will not know to whom to look.

There is another point, too. Under the regional system, we are talking about large, complicated areas. The probability is that large urban areas will dominate the regional selection, with the result that particular issues, such as rural interests, will not be properly represented. Members of any elected representative body get to have a speciality because they are closely identified with the interests of a particular locality. That will not happen under the regional list system. We will be diminishing the accountability, knowledge and authority of the representatives. That is thoroughly bad news.

The last point is the one about which I feel most strongly. We should not give to the central institutions of any political party the right to govern so precisely the character and identity of the people who are to be elected. Be sure about this: nobody will be able to stand for any length of time, far less survive, in the European Parliament unless his or her views are accepted and compatible with those of his or her central political institutions. That cannot be right.

Where will be the free thinkers? Where will be the people who vote according to their conscience? Where, indeed, will be the eccentrics? They make a contribution. We can be certain that nobody will be adopted who does not share the dull conformity that for one moment happens to be the accepted wisdom in their party. If they happen to be adopted, they will not be readopted. That will create a Parliament of clones.

Mr. Beith: I reassure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I am absolutely confident that, in the Liberal Democrat party, some people whose views do not correspond to those of the central party organisation will be elected, because it will be for ordinary party members to vote for whom they choose. I understood that his party was seeking, through the hustings, to make a similar arrangement. Although I welcome his support for open lists, I hope that he will pay some respect to the internal democracy that his party is cultivating.

Mr. Hogg: It is perfectly true that the Conservative party—and, to be fair, the Liberal Democrats—will choose from the membership, but that can change; the system will be what the Front Benchers of the time wish it to be. The Labour party is explicitly giving the power to its central institution, which will choose the representatives. I believe that that is a derogation from democracy. Once we start with the European Parliament, we may find that, by precedent, we move to other institutions, and ultimately to this House. I regard this as one of the worst Bills I have seen in 19 years in the House, and the clause encapsulates why it is so bad. I very much hope that the Committee votes against it.

Mr. Lansley: We have had debates in which we have won the arguments, but the Government have won the votes. One thing has arisen from our debate on Tuesday. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) was wont to criticise my recommendation of the local Member of the European Parliament for Cambridgeshire. She fell into a trap, because I found that, on Monday evening, the MEP was in the hon. Lady's constituency, meeting his constituents. When she said, "We do not see him," she meant that she did not see him—his constituents do.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole): The MEP may have shot his own fox, because that proves that no one recognises him.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman is clearly ignorant of the facts.

There has been no reflection on the impact of the Bill on incumbent MEPs. In respect of the incumbent MEP for my area, there would be a differential vote in his favour under a first-past-the-post system or an open list system because he is an excellent MEP. The Government are pursuing a closed list system, designed to make it an irrelevance to the electorate whether one is an incumbent MEP or not.

The first-past-the-post system—and particularly the open list system—should benefit incumbents, yet the Government do not go down that path. There are two reasons why that is so. First, they do not believe that incumbent MEPs from the Labour party would attract any preferential vote in their favour. Secondly, and perhaps more significantly—I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg)—Labour wants to control who are presented to the electorate and in what order they are presented.

Labour wants to censor and censure its MEPs for ideological or other reasons. That highlights the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham about the damage that will be done by the Government's proposal to put party control before democratic control.

Ms Quin: As the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) pointed out, we have had an extensive debate on what is the heart of the Bill. Because we have had that extensive debate, I can be brief.

Some strange claims have been made in this brief debate. The Conservatives claimed that the Government were introducing the system only because some other countries wanted us to make the change. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary pointed out on Second Reading and earlier this evening, there are clear reasons why the Government are making the change, including the work of the Plant commission and decisions at Labour party conferences from 1993 onwards. It was also a manifesto commitment.

There is a real basis for making the change in the Bill and carrying it out for the next European parliamentary elections. Some of the comments suggest that the electorate are somehow clueless and could not cope with change. I have a higher opinion of the electorate—they will cope successfully with the change. They will be able to understand and grapple with the Bill. They will do so not just because of the Government's explanations, but because our media—which are organised regionally—will help to provide a clear exposition to voters in the run-up to the election.

It is odd that, during the debate, Opposition Members have run down the very regional structure that they created. The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said that it would be impossible for eccentrics to be elected under the proposed system. As I am sure the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) will agree, even though most European countries use a list system we are not short of eccentric Members in the European Parliament.

I reiterate the point made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that he would consider arguments advanced by hon. Members about the system that operates in Belgium—the open list, as opposed to the closed list—and then make an announcement. The Home Secretary, both on Second Reading and today, has listened carefully to the arguments, as have my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), and I. We will consider them carefully and, in the meantime, I hope that the Committee will agree that clause 1 should stand part of the Bill.

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

ELECTORAL REGIONS IN ENGLAND

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Clause 2 sweeps away the existing European constituencies and imposes instead the European electoral regions, which we shall discuss again in the debate on schedule 1. There has been no public consultation on the matter, and no reference to, or consideration by, the boundary commission, in spite of the Prime Minister's expression of such strong support for its doing so.

My reason for rising at this point is to say that the Bill, and certainly clause 2, provides no real mechanism for reviewing the regional electoral boundaries on which constituencies are based. As people were not consulted, it would not be surprising if people in future wanted to change the boundaries. There is in schedule 1 a small reference to local government changes, but we should like to ask the Minister how the electoral regions can be changed. The Bill makes absolutely no provision for it.

Mr. Hogg: I support what my hon. Friend has said. Lincolnshire has been grouped with the East Midlands. It has much more affinity with the Eastern region. There has been no recent consultation on the grouping of Lincolnshire with the East Midlands. Lincolnshire is essentially a rural county. Its interests are not likely to be represented by grouping it in the East Midlands, where there are many large urban concentrations and the representatives ultimately elected are likely to have much more to do with those urban areas than with the rural areas of Lincolnshire.

The point that I make is similar to the point that I made in the debate on clause 1 stand part. The specific interests—in this case of rural areas—will be prejudiced. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that it is important that a system is in place whereby the House and other bodies can reconsider the groupings so that if one grouping is seen to prejudice the position of any county, that matter can be looked at and dealt with. I see no mechanism in the Bill to do that. I ask the Minister to be good enough to tell us what she has in mind.

Mr. Beith: There should be a boundary commission or a standing electoral commission to examine those matters after the first elections, but the Bill is so constructed to ensure that the next European elections, relatively soon, can be fought by a fair system. Therefore, we think that the Bill should proceed in its present form and that the clause should stand part of the Bill, but that we should return to the matter after those elections.

Ms Quin: The effect of clause 2 is merely technical. It provides for schedule 2 to the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 to be replaced with schedule 1, to which the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) referred. We shall discuss the provisions of schedule 1 later in our proceedings. Some of the matters that were raised by Opposition Members relate to amendments that we have already discussed in our debates on the regions, the regional structure of the Bill and the role of the boundary commission, or to subsequent amendments referring to a referendum and other aspects relating to schedule 1.

I am grateful for the comments of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). He seemed to understand that this was simply a technical amendment to make sure that the elections could take place as foreseen.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

AMENDMENTS AND REPEALS

Ms Quin: I beg to move amendment No. 38, in page 4, line 5, after 'enactments' insert 'and instrument'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 39, 43 and 44.

Ms Quin: These are minor drafting amendments, like those that I moved earlier, which make no substantive change to the Bill.

Amendment No. 43 removes a reference to consent to nomination, which reflects the fact that, under the new list-based system, an individual standing for election does not consent to nomination in the traditional way.

Amendment No. 44 adds the statutory instrument relating to consent to nomination to the list of repeals. Statutory instruments are technically instruments rather than enactments, and are revoked rather than repealed, which explains the words used in amendments Nos. 38 and 39. The amendments together make no substantive change to the Bill.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her explanation, but I am still slightly perplexed about amendment No. 38. It refers to an instrument, but I look at schedule 4 and I cannot find an instrument. To what instrument is the amendment directed?

Ms Quin: I do not immediately have an answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question. I am advised that the drafting amendment does not make a substantive change. I am happy to write to the right hon. and learned Gentleman—

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, but we are being asked to amend the Bill. The premise of the amendment is that there is an instrument in the schedule. There is not an instrument in the schedule. That being so, why are we being asked to amend the Bill?

Ms Quin: Inspiration has just struck me. The regulation referred to is the regulation to which amendment No. 44 relates.

Mr. Hogg: With respect, that is not right. We are told that amendment No. 38 relates to clause 3. Subsection (3) of that clause reads:

"The enactments listed in Schedule 4 are hereby repealed to the extent specified."

The Committee is referred to schedule 4. I see in schedule 4 only enactments, no orders. To what does the word "instrument" relate?

Ms Quin: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman looks at amendment No. 44, he will find the answer to his question. It refers to a change in schedule 4. The amendments are taken together as a group—I thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to appreciate that fact.

Mr. Hogg: That is not good enough. We are talking about a particular amendment. Amendment No. 38 amends clause 3. Clause 3 relates to enactments in schedule 4. It can make sense only if there is an instrument in schedule 4, but there is no such reference in that schedule.

Mr. Beith: Amendment No. 44 inserts an instrument into schedule 4.

9.45 pm

Ms Quin: I think that the penny has dropped and the right hon. and learned Gentleman has realised that amendment No. 44 refers to schedule 4. I alluded to amendment No. 44 and the change that it makes to schedule 4 very clearly in my remarks.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 39, in page 4, line 5, after 'repealed' insert 'or revoked'.—[Ms Quin.]

Clause 3, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5

COMMENCEMENT

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 4, line 22, at end add—

'(3) An order under subsection (1) shall not be made unless a draft thereof has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 53, in page 4, line 22, at end add—

'(3) No order shall be made under subsection (1) above unless such an enactment as is mentioned in section 3(8)(a) of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 for the registering of political parties has come into effect which—

(a) takes account of any relevant report from the non-statutory Committee on Standards in Public Life; and

(b) requires the democratic approval at regional level of party lists and of the order in which names appear on such lists by members of the registered party concerned.'.

[Sir Brian Mawhinney]

No. 70, in page 4, line 22, at end add—

'(3) No Order shall be made under subsection (1) above unless—

(a) a draft Order under section 2(6)(c) of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 has been approved by resolution of each House of Parliament; and

(b) the report of the non-statutory Independent Commission on the Voting System, established on 1st December 1997, has been published.'.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Before dealing with the amendments, I must inform the hon. Lady that we shall not reach tonight the selection of amendments made by the Chair concerning election expenses. As a courtesy, I must inform her that, when we consider those amendments next Thursday, we should be grateful to hear from her or the Home Secretary at the beginning of the debate regarding the Government's reaction to the Bowman decision recently announced by the European Court of Human Rights. That decision is absolutely central to the discussion that we shall have about election expenses. I hope that that will help the hon. Lady.

First, the amendments represent our concern that several activities running parallel to our consideration of the Bill should conclude and that the House should have time to debate and consider those conclusions before a commencement order is put in place with respect to this legislation. We have already agreed that the Bill represents a fundamental change. I agree very much with the point made earlier by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) that Parliament, and not the Government, should make a judgment about the commencement of the electoral process.

Secondly, this is a complicated process. We shall be focusing on new and extensive training measures that must be put in place for handling the legislation. We believe that the Government should report back to Parliament when those measures are in place and that both Houses of Parliament should decide on the commencement.

In addition, the Committee on Standards in Public Life is undertaking a review. The Government have also established an inquiry under Lord Jenkins of Hillhead as part of the secret Lib-Lab deal to change out of all recognition the constitution of this country. If anyone doubted that the inquiry was part of the Lib-Lab deal, the choice of Lord Jenkins to chair it would have laid those doubts to rest. It would be hard to find a former Member of this place—now a member of the other place—who had a more flexible constitutional interpretation at the heart of his political career than Lord Jenkins.

Mr. Beith: I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the deal was not in the least secret; it was public from the day that it was concluded.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Oh no. What was public from the day that it was concluded was that there was a deal. The terms of the deal are slowly coming to light, and the more we see of them, the less we like them.

The third element of the amendments relates to our belief that there should be democratic accountability within the parties at a regional level before the election can proceed. As has been made clear, the Conservative party will choose its regional candidates democratically, as will the Liberal Democrats, but the Labour party will not. I am grateful to someone, who will remain un-named, for letting me have a copy of the Campaign for Labour Party Democracy's response to the Labour party's consultation paper on European parliamentary selections. It is absolutely relevant to the amendment before us, because it makes clear the opposition of many Labour party members to the fact that, although local members will be able to select one man and one woman, party apparatchiks will determine the candidates. That is typical of new Labour: new Labour, new control.

I tabled the amendments to ensure that voters throughout the country can have confidence in the democratic nature of the selection of candidates in all the parties. I commend them to the Committee.

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney). One of the most objectionable features—there are many—of the Bill is that it potentially gives control over the selection of candidates to the central institutions of the party. The Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats are not falling victim to the temptation to do that, but the Labour party is. It is reserving to the central institutions of the Labour party the power to adopt and re-adopt candidates. That is profoundly undemocratic. The advantage of my right hon. Friend's amendment is that it enables the Committee to consider the desirability of putting into commencement the Bill. It may sound improbable, but the Labour party will repent of its folly. At least it should be given the opportunity to do so. That is the great charm of my right hon. Friend's amendment.

Ms Quin: Amendment No. 16 would require both Houses of Parliament to affirm that legislation, which both would have passed, should come into force. If either House is not content with the provisions in the Bill, it can refuse to approve and enact them.

I accept that there are precedents, although they are few, for the affirmative resolution procedure to be used to bring Acts, or parts of Acts, into force. That procedure is usually reserved for situations where the commencement of the provision is contingent on some other event and Parliament needs to be satisfied that the contingent event had taken place.

There are no contingent events relating to the Bill that would justify the use of the affirmative resolution procedure for commencement and transitional procedure orders.

Amendment No. 53 would prevent the Secretary of State from bringing into force the provisions of the Bill until Lord Neill's Committee on Standards in Public Life has produced a report. That Committee is not looking at issues relating to elections to the European Parliament; its main concern at the moment, as we know, is party funding. The Bill allows the Secretary of State to make regulations that would include regulations to limit the national expenditure of political parties in relation to European elections.

That is necessary because, with the elections proposed for the European Parliament, candidates would campaign not on their behalf but on behalf of their parties and the party list on which they are represented. It is therefore necessary to provide for expenditure limits on parties as well as on independent candidates. Those regulations could take account of any recommendations that Lord Neill's committee might make in relation to the national expenditure of political parties during elections.

Amendment No. 53 would also impose a condition on political parties requiring democratic approval at regional level of the party lists and the order in which names appear on such lists. Although, on several occasions during our debates, we have welcomed the Conservative party's conversion to party democracy, it is not for the Government to interfere in political parties' internal affairs.

It was interesting that, during our debate on Tuesday, a Conservative Member complained bitterly about his party's approach to organising the European elections and said that it would disadvantage his party. He referred to the meetings arrangements for which the Conservative party was responsible. However, each party must decide for itself how, within the limits of its constitution, it selects candidates for public office. However, the electorate will take account of how parties determine their lists when they vote.

Amendment No. 70 introduces two further conditions before the Secretary of State can bring into force the provisions of the Bill. The first relates to a report of the boundary commission. However, as we discussed on Tuesday, there is simply no need to involve the boundary commissions in the dividing of the country into established regions—the Conservative party is familiar with those, as it established them—which can be adopted with little amendment. The amendment is therefore simply a delaying tactic on behalf of the Conservative party. Why else would the Secretary of State have to wait a further four months after the boundary commissions complete their task before making the relevant order giving effect to their work?

The Opposition now want us to wait for the outcome of the independent commission on voting reform for this Parliament as well, before we introduce the new system for the European elections. We have always made it clear that there should be different systems of elections for different public bodies, and that each electoral system should be appropriate to the body concerned. As has been said many times, unlike this Parliament, the European Parliament does not determine a Government, so the issues that we need to consider are different from those of the Westminster Parliament.

The Government considered this issue carefully in bringing before the House a system based on regional lists, so I ask the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: We shall not withdraw the amendment. The contingent event to which the Minister refers is the complicated nature of this Bill. The electorate will have confidence in a centralised regional list system only if they can be sure that the people have been chosen democratically. For that reason, we shall press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Local Government Finance (Devon and Cornwall)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

10.9 pm

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the important matter of this year's local government settlement for Devon and Cornwall. The settlement will impact on the lives of all my constituents and those of my hon. Friends in the Chamber and every other person living in Devon and Cornwall.

It is worth noting that, although local authorities in many parts of the country have faced a tough financial settlement this year and have had to raise council taxes above the rate of inflation, the people of Devon and Cornwall are living in the two poorest counties in England and are, therefore, the least able to afford that. For example, in the newly shrunken Devon county council—after reorganisation it will no longer include Plymouth and Torbay—the increases will average about 20 per cent.

There is plenty of evidence that people are happy to pay more either in local government taxation or national taxation if they are getting better services and better value for money. However, no such compensation can be offered to them when receiving their bills this year. The fact is made worse by the cuts that will have to take place in many local government services throughout the two counties. Devon has had to make reductions in its service budgets of £8.5 million and Cornwall has had to make reductions of £7 million.

Devon has had the additional complication of having to cope with the reorganisation—slimming down after the loss of Torbay and Plymouth. Many of its problems in setting its budget for the coming year are in no small part due to the costs incurred through that reorganisation process. That is highlighted by the disaggregation of last year's spending in Devon being considerably different from the disaggregation of the coming year's standard spending assessment. That has left a £13 million shortfall which, shared out between the council tax payers in Devon, means that they will each be paying an extra £52—that is just to cope with the reorganisation.

One of the biggest regrets that I have is that there has not been a transitional relief programme such as that provided for Scotland when it went through its local government reorganisation, to cope with the costs that the county council has had.

The Government have allowed the capping limit this year to rise by £817,000 because they accept that the education administration costs should be based on the number of schools, not on the number of pupils. That is an important point which should be borne in mind for the future in terms of any review of the formulae used to divide funds being allocated to local authorities.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I wonder if my hon. Friend has considered whether it would assist the funding for Devon and Cornwall if the formulae for apportioning central Government funds between different county councils were made more equitable. I am referring specifically to a sparsity factor as it affects school transport. Does my hon. Friend agree that if that were added to the formulae, it would assist Devon and Cornwall county councils?

Mr. Harvey: I have no doubt that further work needs to be done in reviewing the formulae used for the distribution of funds. I am grateful that the Government have acknowledged some of the difficulties, but there is no doubt that there is a need for further significant work to be done in revising the formulae used. I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State has said that there will be further work in this area and I am convinced that it is necessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) mentioned school transport. It would be a very good thing if the cost of school transport were to come to local authorities through their highways and transportation budgets and not to be seen as a function of education. Doing so would enable transport and highway authorities far better to plan the transportation that they must provide across many different service areas and the costs incurred and tasks involved in managing their highways network.

Education costs are a particular problem in two counties that have so many small schools. Costs are much higher, for example, in keeping 300 pupils in six different small schools than in having them in one larger school. In Cornwall, one in 10 primary schools has fewer than 50 pupils, and two thirds of them have fewer than 200 pupils.

The discretionary parts of the education budget will suffer in both counties. In Devon, post-16 transport will start costing more because it is a discretionary part of the budget. Transport to denominational schools also will suffer. That issue has been cropping up not only in my postbag but in those of other hon. Members.

Other services also will be affected by the rurality factor mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon—such as maintaining fire services that are able to reach people across the many miles of our road network, and road maintenance. In the county of Cornwall, traffic volume has increased annually by an average of 3 per cent., yet spending on highway maintenance has fallen in real terms by 14 per cent. Moreover, the impact of tourism, particularly in Cornwall, has not been considered adequately.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I am glad that my hon. Friend has mentioned the sparsity factor in the formula. However, one other aspect of the formula has impacted very heavily on some resort towns in Devon and Cornwall—the part that recognises bed nights and people who move into one area from another. That part of the formula has gone. The review has therefore begun already, as decisions have been taken that have adversely affected constituencies such as mine. The remaining part of the review, which has not yet been conducted, will have to re-examine that matter in the light of the sparsity factor. It has affected severely our ability to meet discretionary spending, although we are spending up to cap and will have the lowest council tax in Devon. We still suffer from cuts.

Mr. Harvey: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I do not think that many hon. Members will weep about the affect that that change in the formula has had on the city of Westminster—not even hon. Members who pay council tax on flats in London that we use so that we can attend to our parliamentary duties. In—quite rightly—doing something about the situation in the City of Westminster, the Government have caused a knock-on effect in areas such as those of my hon. Friend. The matter will be another priority for any review. I very much hope that the tourism element of the economies of Devon and Cornwall will be given due weight, and that the point that he raised will receive the recognition that it deserves.

The issue of rural deprivation also is in need of serious attention. There is deprivation in both rural and urban areas, and one certainly would not want to suggest that the rural deprivation problem is qualitatively or quantitatively different from that of urban deprivation. Nevertheless, some of the criteria that are used in assessing deprivation fail to recognise the differences between living in the countryside and living in towns. Although some of the measurements used appear to be appropriate, they are not when considering people who dwell in rural areas.

For many years, we have been bedevilled, for example, by the use of car ownership as a measure of deprivation. If people live in particularly remote rural areas, it does not matter how poor they are, because they will simply have to have some type of car. People may not have a particularly elegant or modern car, but they will have a car of some description, as it is the only way of getting around. Simplistic measures of deprivation can therefore distort the emerging picture. That is not unique to local government finance. It is astonishing that although the south-west region has 9 per cent. of the population, it gets only 3 per cent. of the total national spend under the single regeneration budget. That is because of exactly the sort of problems that have bedevilled the local government formula. It is the same in the health service. We need a review whose impact will be felt across all public services, not only those delivered by local government.

Many of the other problems that have to be dealt with have been inherited from the previous Conservative Government and, indeed, from the Conservative administrations of many shire counties. For years, they failed to see the necessity, and still fail to see the necessity, of providing adequate services in shire areas. Perhaps some Conservative Members would be here to participate in the debate if—

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Look behind you.

Mr. Harvey: Oh, I am delighted that there is one Conservative here, but I regret that he does not represent Devon or Cornwall.

The record of Conservatives in running counties shows that they have not spent adequately. Part of the funding formula is based on the historic spending pattern. By the time more enlightened administrations, whether Liberal Democrat, Independent, Labour or a mixture, finally won control of some of those authorities, it was against a background of central Government by clamping down and not allowing them the latitude that their predecessors had. That simply perpetuated the failure of local Conservative administrations to provide proper local services.

This year, central Government's contribution to Devon's overall spend has fallen from 73 to 67 per cent. That reduction is equivalent to £27 million, slightly more than the increase in council tax receipts. In other words, if the Government's support this year had been sustained at the same level, the council tax would not have had to go up at all, and band D tax payers would have been saved increases of £92.

We quite understand the Government's position. We have heard in this context, as in many other contexts, about the need for responsible stewardship of the public finances and the need to avoid boom and bust. I am sure that we shall have the benefit of hearing those points again this evening. No one is calling for reckless spending, but it was with great interest that I heard the Prime Minister acknowledge during Prime Minister's questions last Wednesday that the Conservative's spending plans had been wholly unrealistic. It seems highly unlikely that, had they won the general election last year, they would have stuck to them, so I implore the new Government not to feel that they should do so.

Last year, the new Government set in train various tax measures in the Budget which, as this Parliament unfolds, will result in a huge improvement in public finances. I am sure—at least, I hope—that the local government settlements made later in this Parliament will be very much more generous and that that will result in council tax payers getting much better value for money. However, for children receiving their education now, there is but one chance. It will be too late to hear that the education system in the two counties has been much better funded in years to come. One hesitates to say it, but, for those at the other end of the age spectrum who rely on social services, it will literally be too late if the improvements come in two or three years' time.

On Sunday, perhaps as many as 30,000 people are expected to come up from Devon and Cornwall to take part in the countryside march. I understand only too well that some of them are motivated by the hunting debate, while the farmers, quite rightly, will want to highlight the plight of their industry, but many of the people taking part in the demonstration will do so out of a sense of frustration with the lot of the country dweller. Despite the hopes of the Conservative party, they will not for one moment think that all the problems started on 1 May last year.

Many people to whom I have spoken understand only too clearly that the problems are the legacy of 18 years of disastrous policies which stripped the countryside of many of the services on which country dwellers depend. People have seen rural transport fall away, the number of village schools decline and so on. I hope that the new Government will listen to what is being said and not believe that the marchers are concerned only about hunting. I hope, too, that the Government will recognise the plea from the heart of many who live in rural areas that something absolutely has to be done to improve their lot. All councils face problems, not only because of the Conservative Government's legacy, but because of the new Government's stance on public finances. People did not elect Labour to carry out the Tory spending cuts, and people in Devon and Cornwall should not be expected to pay so dearly in the coming year for an even lower level of service than they were offered last year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) on securing the debate and on taking the opportunity to plead most effectively the case of his county and the adjoining county of Cornwall. Before I come to specific issues that he raised, it would be appropriate to make a few general points about the Government's approach to relations between central and local government—indeed, the hon. Gentleman anticipated that I would make a few such remarks.

The Government have a new agenda for Britain's future, and a vision for local government's place in that future. We want to reinvigorate local government in ways that encourage increased democracy, so that local people can have more of a say in their council's affairs. We want increased autonomy, so that authorities have more freedom to take their own decisions, and increased accountability, whereby elected representatives are more visibly accountable for their actions. We also want increased emphasis on partnership, not only between central and local government, but between local authorities and local people, businesses and groups.

As part of the process to achieve our aims, a review of local government finance is being carried out by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, which is working closely with local government, business and other representative organisations. Consultation papers on possible changes to aspects of the local government finance system will be issued over the next month or so, as part of the wider consultation on the modernisation of local government.

We have already published the first of our consultation papers, "Local Democracy and Community Leadership", which sets out proposals covering four broad themes. The first is the importance of modernising electoral arrangements to improve councils' accountability and to increase participation in local elections. We explore options such as annual elections, electronic voting, rolling registers and the use of new days and ways of voting.

Secondly, we suggest a number of new ways in which councils can listen to their communities and involve local people in their decisions, policy planning and policy review, through, for example, citizens juries, focus groups, referendums and the rather unattractively named techno-democracy.

Thirdly, we have encouraged new ways in which councils can work, giving them clearer political and management structures. We have, for example, explored the possibilities of executive mayors, cabinet systems, lead member systems and single-party executive committees.

Fourthly, we have set out the case for strengthening councils' roles as leaders of their local communities and for giving councils the powers that they need to meet community priorities and aspirations. For example, we have considered community planning, whether to impose a new duty on councils to promote the economic, social and environmental well-being of their areas, and the option of developing a scrutiny role. Follow-up consultation papers will cover best value in service delivery, a new ethical framework for local government, and the reform of local government finance.

I come to the specific issue of local government funding. All public expenditure programmes have to be examined rigorously each year—local government spending, which accounts for a quarter of all public expenditure, is no exception. Decisions on local government spending must look not only at the pressure on local authorities, but at the scope for greater efficiency and effectiveness within local authorities.

As the hon. Gentleman stressed, we are committed to sticking to the public expenditure plans. Although we shall keep within existing spending targets, we have reorganised priorities. The hon. Gentleman rightly stressed the educational needs of Devon and Cornwall and the importance of prompt action; he said that we could not put off for several years dealing with the educational needs of the current generation of schoolchildren. He will recognise that we have put an extra £853 million into education, every penny of which will be covered by this year's revenue support grant. It is a better, fairer, more flexible settlement than in previous years, although it has been agreed within a framework of tight control on public finances. We have increased total standard spending by 3.8 per cent. and provided an extra £350 million for community care. We have also provided £1.3 billion to improve the state of school buildings through the new deal for schools.

In addition, although not within the general ambit of local government spending, we have released £800 million of additional capital spending power for housing through the capital receipts initiative—£174 million to be released in 1997–98 and a further £569 million plus £41 million in revenue support in 1998–99. Of course, part of the money will go to Devon and Cornwall. We have already released more than £10.5 million in additional expenditure in those two counties, for housing and housing-related regeneration.

Mr. Sanders: The Minister is talking about approvals to borrow more money, not cash in hand. The problem that the authorities face is that they need cash in hand for services that they are not under a statutory obligation to provide. That is where the funding gap exists for local authorities in Devon and Cornwall.

Mr. Raynsford: With respect, I have been talking about a range of different issues, including education. I made the point that the £835 million of additional spending was covered entirely by revenue support grant. I have also touched on other developments, including the capital receipts initiative, which has been warmly welcomed by authorities all over the country, as they were asking for additional borrowing capacity to meet important housing needs.

Standard spending assessments are the basis for the distribution of revenue support grant. They are based on measures of spending need that apply to all local authorities and are discussed with local government representatives. The SSAs for 1998-99 were debated in the House on 5 February, and the local government finance settlement has now been agreed.

Having said that, we are committed to a fair distribution of Government grant among authorities, and we believe that there is scope for improvement in the arrangements in future years.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I appreciate that this is a short debate, and I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to make one simple point. Does he agree with a number of his distinguished colleagues that, at the end of the day, Ministers have to make decisions and that even when we improve the formulae to near perfection, they will not be perfect? One of the current problems in Devon and Cornwall is that we are still suffering from the backlog of many years of inadequate formulae, so the cumulative effect on all authorities in Devon and Cornwall, whatever their political control, is that there is a formidable backlog in terms of capital expenditure and revenue support. Does the Minister agree that, at the end of the day, there must be a political decision to assist us?

Mr. Raynsford: I accept readily two of the hon. Gentleman's propositions: first, that Ministers must take decisions, and secondly, that there is a problem inherited from the previous Government, which we cannot expect to overcome immediately, but which we are seeking step by step to improve.

The standard spending assessment review this year was designed to make some changes. In respect of tourism, there was a general view that it was correct, despite the knock-on consequences for authorities that have been highlighted in tonight's debate. We have already said that we shall be looking at other indicators for the forthcoming year, as we believe that there is scope for improvement. There should be proper and full discussion with local authorities to assess the impact of changes before decisions are taken, but I accept absolutely the hon. Gentleman's point that Ministers have to take decisions in the last analysis, and we shall do so.

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government have already moved quite a long way in that direction, as this year Devon has received an increase in funding that is above inflation and above the national average? Despite that, the Liberal Democrat-controlled county council is imposing cuts and a 20 per cent. increase in the council tax. By contrast, the Labour-controlled local authority in Exeter received a far smaller increase in funding, yet services are being maintained and there is a zero increase in council tax.

Mr. Raynsford: I congratulate my hon. Friend and, indeed, Exeter council on its achievement. I am delighted to know that the council is able to manage so well with the resources available to it. I shall deal with the wider issues of funding for Devon and Cornwall in a moment.

We shall look further at the standard spending assessment system. We shall listen to local government views on how SSAs might be improved, both for 1999-2000 and in the longer term. If the hon. Member for North Devon feels that the SSA system does not treat Devon and Cornwall fairly, I should be happy to examine any proposals that he has for different methods of calculation.

I noted the hon. Gentleman's comments about the number of small schools in the counties, which is a particular concern. That issue might be looked at if he feels that we should do so. Any system of this nature has to be universal, and any changes must apply to all authorities equally. When making changes, we must therefore be sure that they produce a fair impact across the whole country and that there is a sound assessment of needs.

I shall say a brief word on capping. We again gave clear signals that, although we propose to replace the current crude capping system, capping will continue in 1998–99. The Deputy Prime Minister restated his provisional capping principles to the House on 5 February. They allow authorities, on average, to increase budgets by 4 per cent., compared with 2.4 per cent. in 1997–98. It is now up to authorities to set their budgets in the light of all the circumstances, including the provisional capping guidelines. Authorities are aware of the procedure for seeking a redetermination of their cap if they set budgets above the provisional limit. We would consider their cases carefully, but in the event of an authority not getting everything that it asked for, it would have to bear the costs of re-billing council tax payers.

The particular circumstances of rural counties such as Devon and Cornwall are recognised in SSAs, which include allowances for sparsity. I realise that some authorities have anxieties about the area cost adjustment and the possible implementation of the findings of the Elliott review. That is why we did not implement the proposals this year. We felt that greater agreement should be achieved on the issue, and have therefore commissioned further research, which we intend to look at carefully before taking the matter forward.

Devon county council has seen its 1997–98 SSA increase by £13.2 million, or 3.1 per cent., for 1998–99. That is the figure arrived at after adjustments for changes in function were made. The adjusted increase in the SSA for education is higher, at £13.448 million. Those figures compare with the class average increase in SSAs for shire counties of 2.9 per cent. Therefore, Devon has not been treated unfairly in relation to other counties. It has received an increase slightly ahead of the national average.

The provisional cap for Devon for 1998–99 has been set at £440.104 million. That means that the county council will be able to spend up to £16.932 million above base budget—a permitted increase in budget of 4 per cent., compared with only 2.5 per cent. for last year and the county average of 3.7 per cent. Again, Devon's outcome is slightly better than the average for all counties across the country.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned reorganisation. I accept entirely that Devon is affected by reorganisation as Plymouth and Torbay become unitary authorities. Devon made representations to us on that, principally over the council tax increase as a result of the reorganisation and the disaggregation of its 1997-98 budget for education administration between itself and the new unitaries. We estimate that, as a direct result of reorganisation, the council tax increase in the new Devon will be £40 at band D.

The hon. Gentleman was not correct in saying that there is no transitional relief. There is a transitional relief scheme, but it comes into effect only when the increase is more than £52 at band D. Devon, of course, falls below that threshold. We feel that an increase of less than £1 a week is not unreasonable, and it is important to recognise just what we mean when we refer to a council tax increase as a direct result of reorganisation. In Devon, it has come about because the county council had previously, quite legitimately, been spending more in the remainder of the county than it had in Plymouth and Torbay.

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at twenty-one minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 27 February 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Day Hospice (Moray)

9.34 am

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): It is with great honour and humility that I present to the House a petition signed by 8,000 of my constituents, which represents 10 per cent. of the total population of Moray. Those signatures were collected in approximately eight weeks against the difficulties of holiday periods and, indeed, blizzards.

The petition seeks the establishment of a day hospice in Moray. My constituency is a caring community. In the years since I have been elected to represent the area, I have consistently been impressed by the generosity of the community, which is shown by the fact that we raised money to site a scanner in our area and to establish a central maternity unit for our constituents because, of course, in the highlands of Scotland distance is of great importance.

In presenting the petition, I am conscious of the fact that people in the areas surrounding Moray are keen for the hospice to be established because it would save journeys to Inverness and Aberdeen. We can all appreciate the importance of ensuring that families are in contact with relatives suffering from terminal illness. We greatly appreciate the work done by our community hospitals and the Macmillan nurses—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is a long-standing Member of the House. She should know that, when presenting a petition, she should confine herself to only a few points to explain what it is about and then present it. The ruling on that is in Standing Order No. 153. Hon. Members who wish to present petitions should look at that Standing Order before so doing. The hon. Lady must now come to an end and present the petition.

Mrs. Ewing: I appreciate that, Madam Speaker, but you will appreciate the strength of opinion in my area.

I will read out the petition, which relates to seamless care. It states:

Unto the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The Humble Petition of concerned Citizens of Moray, including the Moray Hospice Steering Committee

Humbly Sheweth

That your Petitioners are concerned that the health and wellbeing of those residents of Moray who endure long-term and terminal illness be safeguarded and enhanced by the provision of proper Palliative care in the area;

That it is acknowledged that such provision can best be made by the speedy establishment of a Day Hospice in Moray to complement Community Hospitals and other existing services;

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House Graciously Commend to The Right Honourable the Secretary of State for Scotland to have particular regard for the need for a Day Hospice in Moray during the current review of Health Care provision in the Grampian Health Board area;

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Women (Government Priorities)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

9.37 am

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): The debate marks an important moment for the Government and for women. We are determined to achieve a real alignment between what women want and what the Government intend. We have a Prime Minister, a Chancellor and a Cabinet who are all committed to putting the concerns of women at the heart of government. That has happened because this Administration understand the central message that women have been trying to get across for years: that, although women and men share the same values and objectives, women's lives are different. They have a different pattern, so we have a different perspective and a different range of needs and interests. Those are not a side issue, but are fundamental to our society and our Government.

These are the things that women say matter to them, or to us, I should say: a better education for our children; better health services; freedom from the fear of crime and violence; security in old age; and the opportunity to work and to go out to work, balancing the responsibilities of work and of the home. This Government are delivering on all those issues, laying the foundations for a better Britain.

In the hearts of all mothers is a burning desire to ensure a good education for their children, and at the heart of the Government is a commitment to a good education for all children. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is driving down class sizes and driving up school standards.

Women want to be certain that the national health service will be there for their families, and that it will give the care and attention they need, when they need it. Moreover, when women fall ill, they need prompt treatment, but not in mixed-sex wards. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and his team are modernising and investing in the NHS to ensure that it delivers those services.

Women want safety for their families and for themselves; they do not want to fear crime. Violence against women—even in their own homes—remains a blot on our society. It is still largely a hidden crime, which is swept under the carpet. Too many women are afraid of what might happen if they speak up; they are not sure that they will receive the protection that they need. It is estimated that one in three cases of domestic violence go unreported.

The Government will not tolerate a culture of fear, which leaves women unsupported and the men who abuse them unpunished. That is why, with my colleagues across Government, I have made tackling all forms of violence against women one of my key priorities. That includes violence in public spaces—including buses and trains—and in the home. The Government will work with local government to combat violence, creating a national strategy to tackle violence against women.

The Government's concern is for women throughout their lives, particularly as they grow older. The whole House will agree that it is a scandal that, after a lifetime of work or caring for their families, women in retirement—particularly the very old who live on their own—are some of the poorest people in Britain today. When they were of working age, even those who worked were probably low paid and may not have paid national insurance contributions for a pension in their own right. They probably have no savings, no state earnings-related pension and no occupational pension from their employer—nothing. Often, they do not receive the benefits to which they are entitled, because they are too proud to claim them.

We will tackle the poverty of today's women pensioners. We have already given extra help for fuel costs, and are ensuring that they receive the benefits to which they are entitled. To ensure that today's women do not become tomorrow's poorest pensioners, we have set as one of the 10 key targets of the pensions review the narrowing of the pension gap between men and women in retirement.

We will ensure that, on top of the basic state pension, women have access to a good second pension—either an occupational pension or a new stakeholder pension. We will introduce for carers a citizenship pension, which will recognise that, although they may not go out to work, they make a valuable contribution to society through their caring responsibilities, and so should have a second pension in their own right.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): What advice has the right hon. Lady received from the actuaries about the effect on pensions of the difference in life expectancy between men and women? How will pensions be funded equally?

Ms Harman: The hon. Lady raises an important issue, about which the pensions review is liaising with actuaries.

After fewer than 10 months in government, we are already delivering on a range of issues that are of concern to women. One of the most important of those is women's desire to combine their family responsibilities and paid employment on a fair and manageable footing.

Women's lives have changed profoundly. The days are gone when women were as rare a sight in the workplace as men are, even today, in the kitchen. [Interruption.] Not all men, I hasten to add; there are some honourable exceptions on the Labour Back Benches.

Over the past 50 years, the number of women going out to work has greatly increased. They go out to work because they want to and need to, and because we need them to. The nurse, the teacher, the factory worker, is probably someone's mother. Seven out of 10 women now have paid jobs. Two thirds of married mothers go out to work—whether full time or part time, their work is vital to the family income. Britain now depends on women's work as well as men's; our economy depends on women, but so, still, do their families.

Women are redefining their role as mothers. Nowadays, they provide for their children as well as care for them. Women increasingly expect men to redefine their role as fathers in caring for their children, as well as providing for them. Many of us, including many of my hon. Friends who are present today, have campaigned for years for public policy to support women's choices and to recognise that women's lives are changing. We are now in government and doing just that.

The Government believe that parents should decide what is best for their children. The best thing that we can do is to support parents, by offering them choice backed up with opportunities, and opportunities backed up with real investment. We want to make it easier for all parents to meet their responsibilities in the workplace and in the home.

The previous Government took no action to help women balance the changing demands in their lives. Women have been left to manage their extra responsibilities without access to child care that they can trust and afford, or that matches their working hours. Let us make no mistake: in child care, Britain's children are Europe's poor relation—in most other European countries, high-quality child care is taken for granted. Parents in Britain must have a choice of accessible, affordable and high-quality child care.

That is important for children, for their parents and for the economy. It is important for children, because good child care can give children a head start by offering educational and social opportunities before they start school. There is strong evidence that it improves their chances of doing well as they grow older. It is important for parents, because it is what they want—the waiting lists for nurseries, after-school clubs and child minders are endless—as it helps them to support their families by working, so that they can bring up their children on income from work, not benefits, and so break the cycle of joblessness and social exclusion.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: Yes. I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the debate, and I look forward to his intervention.

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for her courtesy. She said—I think that the whole House will agree—that parents are best able to look after their children when they can go to work and find good carers. Will she confirm, however, that, under the new deal, only 6.2 per cent. of parents have been able to return to work? I understand that the figure is even lower for single mothers under 25. What percentage does she think would show that the new deal was a success? What targets will she set?

Ms Harman: The new deal for lone parents, which I shall speak about later, is the subject of an academic evaluation that will cost the best part of £1 million. We shall set targets on the basis of that evaluation. The new deal is a pioneering project—it has never been tried before—so we cannot set targets before we have evaluated what works and how it works.

Child care is also important because Britain's economy depends on women's work, as does the welfare of their families. Ensuring the right child care is crucial to building strong families and communities, and to running a sound and stable economy. The Government will, therefore, as we promised in our manifesto, implement a national child care strategy, which will be set out in a Green Paper to be published after Easter.

The key words of our strategy will be quality, accessibility and affordability. We want to improve the range and choice of child care, but that child care must, first and foremost, be of high quality. Parents want to be sure that their children receive the very best child care. That means more and better-trained child care workers, an improved system of regulation and inspection, and a seamless service of education and child care that has the interests of children at heart. To underpin quality—indeed, it is essential for quality—child care must not be a poor service only for poor families, but an excellent service for all families. It must be universal.

Our second watchword is accessibility. Child care must be accessible to all. At the moment, access to child care is a lottery, depending on where one lives. Parents in rural areas especially have little chance of obtaining the type of child care that they want. The 1997 rural services survey—carried out as part of the excellent decade-long attempt by the Rural Development Commission to ensure child care in the country—shows that 93 per cent. of rural parishes have no public nursery, and 92 per cent. have no out-of-school child care groups. Families in rural areas are losing out.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Harman: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the debate, and I look forward to his intervention.

Mr. Green: I endorse the Secretary of State's tribute to the Rural Development Commission's important work on child care in rural communities. Will she tell the House why the Government propose to abolish the Rural Development Commission?

Ms Harman: The excellent work of the Rural Development Commission will be developed as part of the regional development agencies. We want to see that work developed and strengthened; that is why I have raised the subject today. It is wrong that families in rural areas should lose out.

To provide choice for all families, we are investing £300 million to expand out-of-school child care provision over the next five years. That will provide places for up to 1 million children. Some £40 million will be available for the first year, starting from April, and we are also developing early excellence centres in all regions.

Our third watchword is affordability. We are already providing extra help to low-income families with the cost of child care, but we want to be certain that more help with the cost of child care is available to those people who need it. The new working families tax credit and extra help through the tax system for the cost of child care will offer the opportunity to ensure that all working parents on low incomes get the help they need with the costs of child care. Help with the cost of child care also helps to underpin the quality of child care, because child care on the cheap is not good child care. Therefore, help for parents to afford child care will help to ensure the right standard of child care.

To give parents a real choice, we will foster a range of different kinds of child care, for non-working mothers as well as working mothers. That means playgroups, mother and toddler clubs and one o'clock clubs, as well as child minders and nurseries; it means breakfast clubs as well as after-school clubs; and it means holiday play schemes during half term and holidays.

[Ms Harman]

The national child care strategy will build on the effective partnerships that exist between local government and other child care providers in the voluntary, public and private sectors. As we put child care at the centre of the Government's social and economic policies, I pay a warm tribute to all those child care providers and campaigners who, in the long years when child care was not a Government priority, struggled to make the argument and take the issue forward. They have played and will play a crucial role in taking forward our national child care strategy. Local authorities, often without the backing and help of Government, have pioneered excellence on the ground. We look forward to a vibrant partnership with them to deliver the national child care strategy.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford) rose—

Ms Harman: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman, so I shall not do so again. [Interruption.] I am sorry, he looks exactly like the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green).

Mr. St. Aubyn: I hesitate to accuse the Secretary of State of sexism in her attitude to men. In view of the importance of child benefit in helping families to pay for child care, will she give an absolute assurance that she will not make it harder for women to go out to work and earn a salary by introducing any forms of means testing of the child benefit that is paid to women?

Ms Harman: The Government have already extended help with the cost of child care by extending the child care disregard in family credit. As the Chancellor said in his Green Budget statement in November, we will provide extra help with the cost of child care. Child benefit is the subject of a manifesto promise that we shall keep.

I have mentioned the important and pioneering work of local authorities. I pay tribute also to the voluntary organisations—both local providers and the excellent national organisations such as Kids Club Network and the Daycare Trust—and to those employers who have led the way, such as Midland bank, working through organisations such as Opportunity 2000. I pay tribute also to the women in unions who have pressed for child care to be on the collective bargaining agenda for their members. All those organisations and individuals have struggled to build child care, and now they will have a Government who will back them.

Child care is not the only important aspect. What happens at work is also important. Although women are crucial to today's workplace, there is little recognition of their responsibilities at home. We must have family-friendly working, so that patterns of work reflect the needs of families to a much greater extent. At present, it is too often the other way round.

Last year, we agreed to implement the European Union directive on parental leave and, this year, we are working towards an early extension of the EU directive. We also wish to make work pay for women. Women still lag behind men in the pay stakes.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) rose—

Ms Harman: I shall give way to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): She looks just like the others.

Miss Kirkbride: But I am still wearing blue. I am curious about something that the Secretary of State said a few moments ago. She claimed that, under the Government's new scheme, non-working mothers would be given state money—up to three quarters of the cost—to help to pay for child care. I can understand why the Government might wish to help mothers go out to work so that the benefit bill is cut, but why should non-working mothers be eligible for state help with child care?

Ms Harman: Because non-working mothers want quality playgroups, mother and toddler groups and one o'clock clubs. The fact that they care for their children at home should not mean that their children should be denied the opportunity of good pre-school education. Those mothers and children will be helped by the development, from the local level, of the national child care strategy.

Women are more likely to be in low-paid or part-time employment than men, and the gap is getting bigger. We are determined to tackle low pay. We shall do it by introducing, for the first time, a national minimum wage. Among the first to benefit will be more than 500,000 women who now—disgracefully—earn less than £2.50 an hour. We shall help make work pay by giving help to low-income families through the tax system—as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out in his Green Budget in November.

The Government are helping women when they are in work, and we are making work pay. The third part of our three-track strategy is to provide active help in getting women into work. Until now, many women—especially lone parents—have wanted to work, but have been denied the opportunity to do so. The facts speak for themselves—more than 1 million lone mothers are bringing up 2 million children on benefits.

Our new deal for lone parents is already showing what can be done. For the first time, specially trained personal advisers are offering help and advice so that lone parents can overcome the barriers to moving into work to make themselves and their children better off. In eight months' time, that service will start to be available to all lone parents across Britain.

Mr. Jenkin: May we take it that, if the figures of 1 million mothers and 2 million children on benefit do not fall, the Secretary of State's policy will have failed?

Ms Harman: I want to see the numbers of lone parents on income support fall. If we get right child care, family-friendly employment and good advice and information to help lone mothers into work, we will see the steady rise in lone mothers on income support start to fall. I am sure that that will be welcomed by the whole House, because those women and children will be better off, and the mounting burden on the taxpayer will start to reduce.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I am listening with great interest to the right hon. Lady. Her remarks have dealt with women at the bottom of the pay and opportunity scale. Before she finishes, I hope that she will refer to the child care needs of all those outstanding women who make tremendous intellectual contributions to our society, not a few of whom are represented here. They also go to work and have to leave their children. They do not want the state to look after them; they want to use private facilities, for which they need tax relief on the gross cost. Will she consider that, because such women make an important contribution to our modern economy?

Ms Harman: The development of our national child care strategy will help all women, working or not working, by providing a good choice of child care facilities for their children. Of course high-earning women use and need child care. They will benefit from the availability of well-regulated, properly inspected nursery and child care facilities in all areas. They will benefit from the extension of child care and out-of-school clubs through our national child care strategy.

I am sure that the hon. Lady agrees that, in helping to make child care affordable, the Government's priority must be to help those who have the greatest difficulty in paying for it rather than spreading it evenly across the range. Some women can afford child care, but find that it is still a headache because they do not have the right choice or quality. They will benefit from our national child care strategy. Women on lower incomes will be helped in respect of quality and accessibility but also of cost.

The developments are set against a sea change in British politics. There are now 121 women Members. Still too few, I would say, but almost double the number returned at the previous general election. There are five women Cabinet Ministers and 15 women Ministers outside the Cabinet. Still too few, I would say, but still more than at any other time in history. We have a new Cabinet Sub-Committee that draws Ministers from all Departments together to co-ordinate and drive forward policies that will improve the lives of women. We shall soon have a Scottish Parliament and a Welsh assembly that will genuinely represent women as well as men in Scotland and Wales.

Throughout the United Kingdom, we are committed to building a new bond of trust between women and Government, to replace cynicism and detachment by developing and sustaining a genuine dialogue with women, so that women's many voices are heard and heeded. We are strengthening our links with women's organisations and reviewing the Women's National Commission.

At the same time, we will reach out to women who do not join organisations to hear the views of those who do not normally take part in consultative exercises. They are the people who most often feel cut off and alienated from the world of politics and government.

I am pleased to announce today a new initiative that signals our determination into enter a new dialogue with women. We have commissioned two pilot women's juries to be held later this spring. They build on the model of citizens' juries, which have been used successfully by several health authorities and local authorities. In a citizens' jury, a small group of ordinary citizens from the population at large is asked to take part in an informed and extended discussion on a policy question. Unlike a focus group—

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): It sounds like a focus group.

Ms Harman: The hon. Lady clearly does not understand. This is not about focus groups but about drawing people together and asking them to go through policy issues. It is a deliberative process. It is not like a focus group, which researches public opinion. The jury model is intended to improve and enrich our democratic practice. [Interruption.] Conservative Members laugh, partly because they have never heard of it and do not understand it; but, in a few years, they will be trying to imply that they invented it.

The proceedings of the jury and the report of its findings will be in the public domain. The jurors must approve the report before its submission to Government. It complements the normal channels of consultation and decision making, adding a distinctive voice that is not usually heard, especially in the House.

For the first time in two decades, Britain has a Government who are listening to women, giving priority to what they say about their lives and families, and bringing their perspectives into all work across all Departments, building it into the routine mechanisms of policy making, not as an add-on but as an essential part of the policy process. We are committed to building and sustaining a new habit of governance that has women's voices and interests at its heart. We are proud to be part of that Government and proud to be part of that change.

10.4 am

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South–West Norfolk): I apologise to the House because constituency commitments made 12 months ago mean that I cannot remain until the end of the debate. I have been in touch with the Minister who is to reply and written to the Speaker. It is not because the Leader of the House did not give us enough notice—she gave us three full weeks—but because my commitments concern an annual general meeting.

I am delighted that the Government have found time for a debate on priorities for women. Some of us were in the Chamber for the very first such debate, which was initiated by the then Member for Derbyshire, South and junior Health Minister on 10 June 1988. It should give pleasure to all, regardless of party affiliation, to see what our predecessors would have rejoiced to behold: a House in which one Member in five is a woman.

I take pleasure in congratulating all the new women Members, all those women who have taken up ministerial office for the first time and those in opposition in positions of authority. Britain has a woman Head of State and has had an outstanding woman Prime Minister. We have a woman Speaker who is known and respected throughout the world. Women in senior positions run the affairs of Whitehall and Parliament. Although there is always more to do, more mountains to scale, this is a day of minor celebration.

I regret that, although this is a good day, the Secretary of State went into her usual tone of carp and scold. I take great encouragement from the words of the Secretary of [Mrs. Gillian Shephard]

State for International Development, who, in a 1994 publication, "Uphill all the Way", said of the election of more women to this House:

"The quality of debate will be altered . . . The topics and tone of debates will be changed".

Let us hope that it might be. I am not sure that we could have guessed it from the first contribution, but we have the rest of the day.

The Secretary of State had some interesting things to say. They were leaked, as is the Government's practice, to The Guardian. There were suggestions elsewhere in the press that she leaked them herself ahead of the Budget. One wonders whether The Guardian could become a sort of Hansard in advance; it would save time.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage): I thank the right hon. Lady for her courtesy in giving way. I note that she hopes that the tone of debate will change and that we will move away from carp and scold, but she has almost immediately started carping and scolding.

Mrs. Shephard: Dear, dear; I stand reprimanded.

I have some frank things to say, and I think that Labour Members share my concerns. The Government's handling of benefits for less well-off families and lone parents has been a catalogue of disaster. There have been claims and counter-claims. The Prime Minister gave a straight denial of a change of plan on Wednesday. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's people have been briefing furiously that he intended to announce the proposals as the centrepiece of his Budget. The Secretary of State, sadly, walked out of an interview yesterday. It has been a sorry saga. It is no wonder that the proposals have been slammed by the Government's own supporters, in the meetings that they have held around the country, and by the interest groups.

The Secretary of State has announced a Green Paper. There are some good ideas in what she has outlined. We await it with interest. We also await the plans to be announced in the Budget, which we are told about on another page of The Guardian this morning. We hope that all those things will combine to do what the Secretary of State hopes.

There are a number of issues on which I can agree with the Secretary of State. I certainly wish that we had more women Members on the Conservative Benches. Those we have are deeply committed and very much in demand, which is why not all of them could be here today, much to their regret. We do not have the luxury of one week off in four, which I understand is the arrangement for Labour Members, but, of course, I understand that, too.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): You had better not believe that.

Mrs. Shephard: Well, we know that the hon. Gentleman is always on duty.

The Conservative party wants to see women succeed in traditional roles, in business and in public life. In government, we pioneered many practical measures that have helped women to succeed. I shall detail a few of them later. We created flexible labour markets which have successfully created jobs. We built on education reforms to provide opportunity. However, we recognise as Conservatives that we have to do more to help women to succeed in politics. Our party reforms are changing the way in which we do business to encourage more women to take part in the main stream of the party, and there is certainly much to be done.

There is another matter on which I hope that the Secretary of State and Labour Members, and hon. Members of all parties, agree with me. It is a matter of regret that the arrival of so many new women Members in the House has been given less than serious media coverage. This is not an envious snipe, although perhaps it is; hon. Members can judge for themselves. It is true that publicised makeovers in which some women have indulged—perhaps I could have done with one—make for trivial coverage. It is sad that some journalists—some of the worst offenders have been women journalists—have been so gratuitously offensive about women in the House.

The Secretary of State told us of her Government's new deal for women. She has—correctly, I am sure—said little about all that has gone before, but I should like to take a few minutes to set the record straight. The previous Government established women's issues as a Cabinet responsibility and set up a Cabinet Committee chaired by a Minister to deal with women's issues across government. We established a women's issues working group which, among other things, oversaw "New horizons for women"—a series of seminars up and down the country in which we listened to women's views. We also developed the after-school child care initiative, creating 67,000 places at a cost of almost £60 million. A nationwide child care strategy called "Work and family" was developed by my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan).

It was the previous Government who established a ministerial responsibility for women's health, screening programmes, well woman clinics and other health care initiatives especially for women. The previous Government, through the economic success that they passed on as a golden legacy to the Labour Government, saw record numbers of women in the workplace, the narrowing of pay differentials to a record low, and a record rise in the number of self-employed women. The previous Government gave help with child care costs, family credit and other benefits. We guaranteed the future of child benefit untaxed and launched fair play for women with the Equal Opportunities Commission. We saw the fastest ever rise in the number of women graduates and we saw girls outstrip boys in almost every measure of academic achievement, although we all know that that creates another problem in its own right.

Mrs. Gorman: Why?

Mrs. Shephard: Did I hear the word "why"? Well, one has to be logical about this. I will explain to my hon. Friend. It is a problem. If, in the past, we regarded it as a problem that girls under-achieved, we must now regard the fact that boys are under-achieving as something which has looked at and solved. Obviously, we want girls and boys to achieve well across the board.

Mrs. Gorman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, with the modern development of our economy thanks to the excellent policies of the Conservative Government, the growth in the labour market will require more highly skilled and highly educated people? The only increasing source of labour will be women and young girls coming into the labour market, so it is essential that our girls achieve more than they ever did, and certainly perhaps more than some of the boys.

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is, as ever, refreshing. She is not wrong. As I said, we want girls and boys, and men and women, to be equipped to compete in an increasingly competitive and global marketplace.

The previous Government ensured an increase in the number of public appointments of women. It was previously 23 per cent. We edged it up to 30 per cent., and we want to see it pushed further still. I hope that the Secretary of State will work on it. We also signed up to the Beijing platform for action. All those are real and measurable achievements. I hope that the Secretary of State will feel that she can accept that we established a good foundation on which she and her colleagues can now build.

Mrs. Lait: In that long catalogue of achievements, which I am grateful that my right hon. Friend has listed, does she include independent taxation of married women?

Mrs. Shephard: I certainly do. I have some questions for the Minister for women, who will reply to the debate, and I shall put them to her at the end of my remarks. Independent taxation was an achievement, and we certainly do not want to see it threatened.

The Secretary of State made some announcements this morning. I welcome them and congratulate her on them, and I wish her well. However, what has been achieved for women in the first nine months of this new Government is not a great deal. Labour promised before the election that there would be a Minister for women with full Cabinet status. What happened? There was rather a long delay and then a rushed announcement, following protests from women's groups, of the appointment of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), for whom I have great respect. However, she was appointed without Cabinet status and forced to take the job on low pay and now half pay. That is not a good message for women around the country. I understand that she sits on just two Cabinet Sub-Committees. I am sorry to say—I am sure that she will be expecting me to say this—that her sole parliamentary activity since her appointment last June has consisted of giving just five oral answers from the Dispatch Box and 18 written answers.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): Does the right hon. Lady consider that it was a good message for women under the previous Government to have a man representing women's issues in the Cabinet?

Mrs. Shephard: I think that the record of the previous Government stands for itself. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] For several of the years in which I had these responsibilities, I chaired that Cabinet Sub-Committee. I am sorry to say that we have yet to see any achievement as a result of the hon. Lady's appointment.

Mr. Jenkin: Would we not be going backwards if, while we were trying to abolish woman-free zones in public life, we started to create man-free zones?

Mrs. Shephard: I do not think that that is the Government's intention—it certainly would not have been the previous Government's intention.

However, it was a considerable disappointment to women's groups around the country that we did not hear from the Minister for women when they protested about the cuts in lone parent benefit; nor, for that matter, did we hear from the majority of women Labour Members. Their curious post-election silence on the matter led to an accusation from their own side that they resembled the Stepford wives. Indeed, the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), who is in her place, revealed to the Reading Chronicle of 13 January that she and others have formed a club poetically named—in contradistinction to the Stepford wives, I believe—"the Stroppy Cows". I should make it clear to the House that I am quoting the hon. Lady. Neither description is helpful to the cause of women in the House, and it is a matter of regret that both descriptions originated on the Government Benches.

There have been other broken promises. What about national health service waiting lists? Labour promised women that waiting lists would be cut by treating an extra 100,000 patients, using £100 million saved from NHS red tape. However, recently published figures show that waiting lists had increased by 50,000 at the end of last year.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): Does the right hon. Lady agree that the extra £10 million for breast cancer services is a welcome initiative for women in this country who are worried about breast cancer?

Mrs. Shephard: Any initiative of that sort is very helpful to women, but Government Members have to get it into their heads that, on average, health spending when we were in power rose by more than 3 per cent. each and every year, whereas so far the increase in spending under Labour has amounted to 1 per cent.

The Government's commitment to education, education, education, does not square with the cuts in council funding, mostly in rural areas, which they did not need to make and which, coupled with the huge hikes in petrol prices that have already been imposed, with more to come, mean that rural women and rural families have had their choices appallingly reduced. The Secretary of State's announcement has done little to clear up the muddle that the Government have created in her policy area. I hope that the Minister for women will take the opportunity to clear up some of those points, once and for all.

Does the Minister believe, as did her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State before the election, that lone parents are financially at a disadvantage compared with married couples; or does she agree with the Prime Minister that abolishing lone parent benefit was necessary to stop unfair treatment of married couples? Does she, like her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, refuse to rule out taxing or means-testing child benefit? How would taxing it square with the Government's so-called principles of achieving greater equality or, for that matter, of preserving independent taxation of women?

Will the Minister make the new deal for lone parents compulsory during the life of this Parliament? How does she intend to deal with the unemployment among women that the introduction of a national minimum wage will certainly create? How will she give women a meaningful choice between working and staying at home?

[Mrs. Shephard]

There is a lot to do, and a lot of confidence for the Government to regain, because—regrettably—there is nothing to show for nine months of work. We have an underpaid Minister whose parliamentary record so far has been well-nigh invisible. We have a string of broken promises. We have utter confusion on the lone parent benefit front. We have real hardship for rural women and their families. We have seen the sort of hostile reaction from the public that one would expect when expectations have been dashed by the reality of Labour in power. They have made a bad beginning; that fact cannot be dispelled by press leaks and a few announcements on a Friday morning.

Labour made many promises before the election, and women deserve more than they have so far received from the Government. Successive Conservative Governments have strengthened the position of women in British society. We and the women of Britain will judge the Labour Government by what they achieve, not by what they tell us they intend to achieve. We want real improvements, real opportunities and real choices for the women of Britain.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. There are many hon. Ladies—and Gentlemen—who want to speak and, obviously, if speeches are kept short, more people will be able to do so. I hope that hon. Members will bear that in mind.

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): I warmly welcome the announcements made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the first momentous debate under our Government celebrating the achievements of women, both inside and outside the House. The £40 million, the Green Paper and women juries are all welcome.

I was going to welcome the statements of the right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), having had dealings with her previously when she was a Cabinet Minister. However, I revised that intention after hearing her say that she wanted debate to take a different course now that there were lots of women in the House, but then practise the Conservative historical revisionism we know so well. The reality is that there are millions of women who will benefit from the minimum wage, and the question to be asked is: do the Conservatives support poverty pay and keeping women and therefore children in poverty? Do they support it or not? Over the past nine months, and for the first time in this country's history, women have been taken seriously at the heart of Government, not only in economic policy, but in every other policy area.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): May I correct the hon. Lady? My right hon. Friend was quoting the words of the present Secretary of State for International Development. I hope that that puts both the hon. Lady and the record straight.

Lorna Fitzsimons: In terms of the debate, perhaps it would be more healthy for us to go through the achievements announced in a thorough manner by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. We should be debating what we have managed to achieve for women in a real and meaningful sense, whether our child care strategy, our family-friendly employment policies—policies which were sadly lacking under the previous Government—or our taking seriously the issue of violence against women, one of the most insidious crimes, which the previous Government failed to take seriously.

The Conservatives had 18 years in which to take all those issues seriously and to implement strategies, so their saying that we have done little in nine months will not wash with my constituents. Many women working in their communities suffered as a result of the Conservative Government's policies, from poverty and from the rundown in local services. They had to ensure that, in their work in the communities, they bridged the gap between resources and the reality of their lives.

I am glad that the Labour Government, in the most senior Departments, are taking seriously the issues of women and of children. Those issues are a true economic issue and I welcome the recognition of that fact in our economic policies. We are starting to treat child care as an economic issue—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are lots of conversations going on in the Chamber. I want to hear what the hon. Lady has to say.

Lorna Fitzsimons: Child care is not only about nurturing children, but about enabling women to participate in society. We have to start at the top and one of the first things we discovered on coming into government was how women were not taken seriously in a systematic fashion across government. Would the House believe that there is no ability to do modelling in terms of the gender impact analysis of Government policies, because the previous Government did not collect statistics that would make it possible to determine the effect of policies on women's lives? That is how much attention the previous Government paid to women.

Mrs. Gillan: Is the hon. Lady aware that I was the Minister who produced the first set of disaggregated statistics based on gender? Has she even bothered to look at them?

Lorna Fitzsimons: Yes, I have. However, does the hon. Lady agree that, although the Fawcett Society and several senior academics have tried to conduct gender impact analysis throughout Government, the previous Government did not set up the necessary data collection procedures to make that possible? That places the Treasury and other Departments in a difficult position; we must start from scratch. One can disaggregate some statistics but, in the absence of the basic information to disaggregate, it is impossible to do so.

We are finding that, to a great extent and in many areas, women have not been taken seriously. The opening remarks of the shadow Leader of the House disappointed me, because I believe that, if we do not put women at the centre of government, throughout Whitehall, we shall be cutting off our nose to spite our face. Some of the least known work of the women's unit and the Ministers for women will have the longest-term impact on the lives of women in this country.

During the short period of nine months in which I have been a Member of Parliament, I have come to understand that often it is very hard to wade through the bureaucracy of Whitehall and the House to make things transparent to the outside world. Therefore, it is incumbent on us to use this debate to flag up some of the differences between this Government and the previous Government. I hope that women will come to trust and value the features that make us different—not only the fact that we have 101 Labour women Members of Parliament, but the fact that we as a Government, to a man and woman, take women's interests seriously.

On pensions and citizenship pensions, it is important that we are talking about pension sharing. It is important that we are talking about our responsibility for carers, and for women—like my mother—who have been unable to participate in the world of work for any reason, whether it is because they have had child care responsibilities, because they have always done intermittent part-time work or low-paid work or because they carry the burden of looking after families, older people or relatives. It is our responsibility as a Government to cherish them and to ensure that the pension system does not discriminate against them, because they have been doing some of the most crucial and under-acknowledged work, in the unpaid economy.

I very much welcome the work that is being done by the National Audit Office, post-Beijing, to collect data about the value and importance of unpaid work—and paid work—to the economy. These vital planks will allow us to build a far more sophisticated picture of the true economic value of the participation of women in the economy, because there are knock-on costs to women staying at home looking after relatives.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Is my hon. Friend aware of studies by economists at the university of York, which suggest that it can cost as much as £100,000 to bring up a child to university age, and does she agree that that shows the immense contribution that women, mothers and families make to the economy, which should be recognised?

Lorna Fitzsimons: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. He notes one study. Non-governmental organisations and women academics are doing a myriad of studies, enabling the new Government to build a picture based on empirical research, instead of starting from scratch. That is of great value to us.

Mr. Jenkin: Will the hon. Lady acknowledge that the work that the previous Government did on that issue was reflected, not only in our manifesto commitment to introduce transferable tax allowances, so that women bringing up children and not working could bring the benefit of their tax allowances into their family earnings, but in the introduction of basic pension-plus? That would have meant that the Government would pay amounts from the national insurance fund into the personal pension funds of women who were carers and not working, so that they would benefit from a proper funded pension, instead of depending on the basic state pension, which increases only with the rate of inflation.

Lorna Fitzsimons: The majority of my women and pensioner constituents do not recognise the picture that the hon. Gentleman paints of the past 18 years. They feel sadly betrayed. They feel—

Mr. Jenkin: You do not understand it.

Lorna Fitzsimons: I do understand it. Does the hon. Gentleman support the pension package that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced regarding pension sharing and the stakeholder pension?

Mr. Jenkin: What pension?

Lorna Fitzsimons: The stakeholder pension, as I have patiently outlined and as my right hon. Friend patiently outlined, is a vital plank to help ensure that women who do the unpaid work in society or who cannot, for any reason, participate regularly in the workplace, are not cheated in their pension years. It is a very simple point, but it seems to bypass the hon. Gentleman.

In my constituency of Rochdale, several groups of women work tirelessly in parent-teacher associations, child care groups or housing associations to ensure that the community in which they live and work runs smoothly. I pay tribute to them. Throughout my education as a candidate and as a Member of Parliament, many of them have given me valuable insight into the daily impact on their lives of local government, regional government and national government. Without their work, we should be the poorer, and on this day, when we are celebrating women and the work of women, it is important to recognise that rich tapestry of unacknowledged work.

Many women are involved in mainstream politics—I am glad to see that on 1 May their number hugely increased—but many women's significant political work goes unacknowledged and unaccredited. It is important that, on this day, we acknowledge that from the House. They are fellow politicians. Many Asian women's groups are breaking down the barriers of language and culture in my constituency, tirelessly working against all odds.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lorna Fitzsimons: I am sorry; I should like to, but I must make progress because many hon. Members want to speak.

I welcome the new initiatives that the Ministers for women have put together in only nine months and pay tribute to all the work that non-governmental organisations do, internationally and internationally. Specifically, I pay tribute to the women's organisations, the unsung heroes of our communities; we should be better off if we listened to them. I do not consider that the issue of a women's jury is a laughable commodity. I believe that ensuring that we give a positive platform to a myriad of the rich tapestry of women makes us richer as a Government.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am grateful to you for calling me early in the debate. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), I should like to apologise to you, to the Minister and to my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) for the fact that I cannot be in the Chamber during the winding-up speeches. I have written to Madam Speaker, explaining that, unfortunately, I was unable to cancel engagements to which I was already committed this afternoon, but I shall, of course, read the Hansard report so that I am aware of the Front-Bench responses to the issues that are raised.

I welcome the debate. Women's role in society has become increasingly complicated. Until recently, the female's role was to produce and care for children. Now, with the greater automation of society and the advances in health, contraception and education, there are choices to be taken in women's life styles. Do women work outside the home? Do they have to have children? Do they look after their children themselves or do they choose another to fulfil that function? Those choices are highly personal and private, and they depend on circumstances—inherited attitudes as well as inclinations. What can be said is that we have arrived at the point where we can no longer stereotype women into convenient packages.

There has been an inclination to label women crudely as either "high fliers" or the "little woman at home". No longer: different women want different things at different times in their lives. In our journey through life, we all fall into various groupings. The movement is greatest among the under-45-year-olds. A woman can be single, childless, a step-parent, a high flier, a mother, a worker, divorced, a lone parent, a young mother or even a grandmother. At each stage of her life, she needs different support. The challenge for us as commentators, legislators and opinion formers is to cater for the greater fluidity in society and respond to it accordingly.

One of the most fundamental changes in the British labour market this century has been the increasing participation of women. We hear a great deal about that, but without much detail. Women make up 45 per cent. of the working population. In 1996, 61 per cent. of mothers worked outside the home, compared with 47 per cent. in 1973. The figures mask some interesting trends. I should like them to be broken down further. I should be interested to know the ages of the children of employed mothers. We know that most women with pre-school-age children work part time, but as children grow older, mothers' participation in the employment market becomes more committed.

There was a significant increase in the number of women in employment between 1973 and 1989, after which participation rates steadied. Although we have to be wary of reading too much into what could be blips, some commentators have detected a shift in attitudes. A recent British social attitudes survey revealed that the absence of good child care provision is not the only factor that prevents mothers from working outside the home. Their outlook is also important. There is a growing belief that mothers question the value of paid employment above child raising when their children are young.

The Office for National Statistics general household survey shows that, rather than women's self-esteem being rooted in the workplace, many found a new sense of confidence from being at home. Some 35 per cent. of mothers with children under 16 care for them at home without external paid employment, while 37 per cent. combine part-time employment with caring at home.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): We have heard a great deal of academic evidence. I should like to add to my hon. Friend's thinking in exploring the reasons for the attitudinal shift. Recent research by a professor of economics at Cambridge university shows that only one woman in 20 with children under 10 wants child care to release her for paid work. The great concern of many of my constituents at the bottom of the pay scale is that, if the new deal is made compulsory, they will be denied the choice of staying at home with their children.

Mrs. Roe: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention.

Women can have a different approach from men to the value of work. The argument is that women's employment patterns are guided by their home responsibilities, not because they are victims of family ties, but because that is what they choose. Women have their own life goals and are prepared to make positive choices about them.

The issue of working mothers raises important questions. It would be inappropriate to put pressure on them to seek employment if attitude surveys show that mothers do not necessarily want to leave their young children. The proportion of lone mothers in employment has fallen. As the Government progress with their welfare-to-work new deal for lone parents, I advise them to be aware that some women feel that looking after their children is a life goal. A woman staying at home looking after her young children or acting as a carer is working. There is no such thing as being just a housewife. That role should never be undermined or underestimated. To take up a point made by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons), such women certainly participate in society. Having done the job, I assure the hon. Lady that there is no finer career for a woman than to mould a future generation.

If we accept that women have a variable employment pattern to suit their child-rearing role, we must ensure that our taxation, welfare and employment arrangements respond to today's looser and less formalised working and living patterns. Women who choose to give priority to domestic responsibility should not be discriminated against.

During my time in public life, I have been concerned to ensure a fair tax system. It is not right that tax and benefit arrangements have hit families harder than others. I applaud my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for saying that the Conservatives were wrong to start phasing out the married couple's allowance without seeking some compensation for married families with children. It takes courage to admit mistakes. I am pleased that we can plan afresh.

The Conservatives had positive policies for women, including the introduction of independent taxation for wives. I was pleased that our manifesto pledged to take that reforming spirit further. The tax system should not discriminate against those whose work is equal to formal employment.

Mr. Rendel: Does the hon. Lady agree that there is a further point on the separate taxation of men and women?

Women who are abused in the household sometimes find it difficult to get away from the home. Separate taxation helps women to have the courage to move out of an abusive household.

Mrs. Roe: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point.

I looked forward to the introduction of transferable tax allowances. Our manifesto proposal would have given considerable help to 2 million couples who look after dependent children or relatives. I do not know of any indication that the present Government are considering the introduction of transferable tax allowances. I suspect that their hands will be full with their ideas for merging the tax and benefits systems. As my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk has said, those proposals will be difficult to administer.

For women who work outside the family home, our concern should be how to reconcile paid work with family life. If access to employment provides the means of lifting the poor out of a cycle of dependency, it is illogical to adopt policies that stifle the availability of the jobs that people need. The adoption of the social chapter and the introduction of the minimum wage will stifle enterprise and the creation of fresh opportunities.

Even more important, without further restrictions and conditions on employment, we have been freer to develop working patterns that people want. People want to be able to combine family and work more easily. That freedom is threatened. The main casualties will be women who depend on less formalised working arrangements. We need to encourage greater flexibility and imagination in employment. Employers must put more effort into providing family-friendly working patterns.

Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): Does the hon. Lady accept that, as a majority of women work part time to combine work with child care, the implementation of the part-time workers directive in the social chapter and moves to strengthen the security of part-time workers at work are beneficial to women? Does she agree that increasing flexibility for the employer creates job insecurity for many women, making it difficult for them to combine child care and work?

Mrs. Roe: I am worried that there will be no part-time jobs for women. I shall explain why. I believe that employers may decide to offer full-time jobs and not provide the employment opportunities that allow women to balance work and family life. That is why I am most concerned about the points that the hon. Lady has raised.

Flexible time, term working and annualised working hours should be more commonplace. I commend the system that will be introduced for nurses, which will allow them family-friendly rotas so that they may choose when to be off duty. Job sharing and part-time work are increasing in popularity. Some 44 per cent. of the total female work force work part time. That provides a window of opportunity for many gifted and capable people who want to mix some employment with their family responsibilities. More women and men are becoming self-employed so that they may work from home more easily and choose the hours that suit them. With the help of modern technology, that is becoming a more realistic option.

Entry to the employment market or re-entry after a break for domestic responsibilities can be frightening. I have not had the opportunity to learn about the Government's proposals for lifetime learning, but I hope that they will encourage women to learn the necessary skills to help them go back into work. That will be a valuable component of the scheme.

Many women take a break from employment when their children are under school age but return to work when their children start school. For those women, school hours and school holidays present a problem. The previous Government offered assistance through the out-of-school child care initiative, and I am pleased that this Government have expanded the initiative.

If we are to help vast masses of women in this country, we must stop thinking of them in the convenient categories of "economically active" or "inactive". We must acknowledge in our tax, welfare and employment systems that their life cycles are fluid and flexible. In that way, we can help women to fulfil their expectations, both in their careers and within and for their families.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge): I welcome today's statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security about child care, nursery education, employment, health and domestic violence. I was wondering what the Conservative party was afraid of, until I heard the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), who has now left the Chamber, mutter from a sedentary position, "Man-free zones." That is really sad.

For me, this debate is about equality and justice—social justice, equality of opportunity, economic equality and equality under the law. After 18 years of rule by a party that has not the slightest notion of what equality means, there is much to be done. I have the honour of serving on the Council of Europe. The United Kingdom delegation to that body is 25 per cent. women—and they are all from the Labour party. There is not a single female delegate from any other political party. How far out of touch the Opposition are with the 40-nation Council was clearly demonstrated when the British Conservative delegates blocked the establishment of a full standing committee on equality.

Mrs. Roe: I assure the hon. Lady that, before she arrived in this place, Conservative women served on the Council of Europe: I was one of them.

Ms Shipley: That is past tense. There are now more women in the United Kingdom delegation to the Council of Europe than ever before.

A month or so ago, the issue of equality was raised again in the Council of Europe and the Tory all-male delegation was almost alone among delegates in voting against the motion to establish a committee. That motion was carried overwhelmingly. The Tories are as out of touch in Europe as they are in Britain. As male and female delegates from eastern and western Europe voted overwhelmingly for equality, many of the Tory delegates—who are led by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson)—kept the company of the extreme right-wing Russian nationalist Zhirinovsky, whose rantings were a disgrace to the Council chamber.

I turn now to legal justice. I have referred previously in this Chamber to the sufferings of rape victims. Instances of victims' sexual histories being circulated in our prisons as pornography are shaming to us all. It is also highly debatable whether victims' sexual histories should be used in court—I condemn that practice. It is a disgrace that personal information, including a victim's medical history, should be available to a convicted attacker.

Some issues affecting rape victims were debated in another place during consideration of the Crime and Disorder Bill. Some of our most experienced barristers and judges are intent on maintaining the status quo. They argue that the protection of defendants' rights is paramount. I believe that victims' rights must also be protected. We should be able to look to our finest legal minds not simply to identify legal problems but to use their well-honed skills to find solutions. There is clearly a need for change among those who practice in our legal profession. I hope that many more women will rise to the most senior positions in that profession.

I have heard some Opposition Members comment that there is no such thing as "women's issues"—to be fair, not every Conservative Member who has spoken this morning has said that. They claim that all issues are relevant to everyone, and I agree. However, the fact remains that, after 18 years of Tory rule, women still do not have economic equality, social justice or equality under the law. My Government have demonstrated that they are ready to take up the challenge for change; the Conservatives wish to maintain the status quo. Last year, the people voted to elect more than 100 women Labour Members of Parliament. They demonstrated that they want to see change, and today my right hon. Friend has shown that we are delivering it.

Mrs. Jackie Ballard (Taunton): I also welcome the opportunity that this debate provides to consider the Government's attitudes and policies towards women. I have read some of the debates on this subject from the last Parliament, and I realise that times have changed for the better in many ways. There have been some welcome announcements today. However, I have several regrets about what the Government have not done—although, to be fair, they have not had much time in which to implement many changes—and a few regrets about the things they have done.

We have heard about the priorities of the Minister for women upon which the Government will take action. They are very welcome. Women do not have an equal place in society, as we have seen from a number of examples, including differentials in wages for men and women and the low female participation in some areas of the work force. I share the views of the hon. Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley) about the judiciary.

We all agree that the Government should take positive steps to address those inequalities, as society cannot be considered healthy when women still earn, on average, 20 per cent. less than men for doing the same job. We have also heard about women part-time workers, who are in an even worse position. I welcome the provisions in the social chapter that will help to address that problem.

Women are still under-represented in many areas of public life. Although the gender balance in Parliament has improved, it is still 80 per cent. men. All political parties must continue to address that issue. I freely acknowledge that the Opposition parties have the biggest problem in that regard. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches—perhaps today I should say "I"—have not found it easy to get female candidates elected, despite the fact that we fielded a high proportion of good women candidates at the last election.

Mrs. Lait: The hon. Lady has fought on the hustings on several occasions. Does she agree that electors do not differentiate between male and female candidates: they vote for a party? The problem is with selection.

Mrs. Ballard: I agree entirely with the hon. Lady. Voters were probably more willing to elect women than men at the last election because they believed that female candidates were free from some of the sleaze that was attached to the previous Government. There is a problem with the selection procedures.

I return to what the Liberal Democrats are doing to increase our female representation. We have adopted zipped lists for the European and Scottish Parliament elections, and we are taking practical measures to help women to gain confidence and experience, such as our recent work-shadowing scheme. However, the problem of women's representation in public life is not just about the number of women Members of Parliament. There are many other areas where women are under-represented.

Those who wield power in Britain are still overwhelmingly male. We have only to look, as has been mentioned, at the number of High Court judges, heads of large companies, newspaper editors and members of powerful quangos to see how far we have yet to go before the glass ceiling is broken; but the ceiling is being cracked, and progress is being made towards equality.

The fact that those who wield power are, by and large, men conditions the way in which decisions are made that affect the lives of all of us. Any decision by Government or anyone who holds power will affect men and women differently. I am pleased that the Government recognise that, and I hope that the Cabinet Sub-Committee is successful in ensuring that the impact of all legislation on women is considered. It is vital that mainstreaming, to use the jargon, goes through all Departments.

Men have been the legislators for centuries, and whatever the Conservative Government thought, legislation is not gender-neutral. However, the claim that the new Government are listening to women's concerns has been contradicted by some of the Government's behaviour. The public have high expectations of the increased number of women Members of Parliament. They hope that that will change the way in which the Government conduct their business.

I thought at the start of this Parliament that the increased number of women Members of Parliament would prevent some of the phenomena which we saw were prejudicial to women in the previous Government, such as the setting up of the Child Support Agency or the campaigns that demonised single mothers. I never thought that I would see women Members of Parliament voting for the Government's cuts in single parent benefit. If the Government want to improve the lives of women, as I believe they genuinely do, that was not a good start.

That cut was defended on the grounds that it was part of a wider welfare reform programme that includes welfare to work. The Government have made clear their aim to get people into work.

Will the Secretary of State consider the case of a constituent who came to see me recently? She is a single parent on income support, with a six-year-old child. She desperately wants paid work. She found herself a job earning £200 a week, and she has decided to take it because she believes that it has prospects. However, from day one of starting work, she loses her income support, yet she still has housing costs, food costs and all the other expenses, and she now has travel-to-work costs to add, plus child care. How can she exist for a month until she gets her first pay cheque?

The DSS told my constituent to ask her employer for an advance on her salary. It is obviously very difficult for someone starting a new job and feeling vulnerable as a woman and a single parent to go in and ask for an advance on her salary. I hope that the Government will consider back-to-work benefits for the many people in that situation. Those of us who have been single parents on income support know that people do not have savings to fall back on in such situations.

Any welfare system with paid work as its primary goal has serious implications for women and for society. I do not believe that it is in our best interests as a society to force carers out to work. The majority of carers are still, and probably will continue to be, women. The philosophy behind that aim does not value the role of parenting. It rejects the idea, as has been said, that every mother is a working mother, and ignores the role of those carers, predominantly women, who look after elderly relatives.

The belief in welfare to work as a panacea fails to recognise the contribution that women make as members of the unpaid economy, which we heard about earlier from the hon. Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons). I share her view that women are predominant in the unpaid economy, and that the economic value of their work has not been recognised. The paid and the unpaid economies are interdependent. To remove labour from the unpaid economy will have economic consequences that the experts have probably not fully estimated.

I am worried that Ministers believe that there should be only one role for women to follow. There is a real danger that the only woman who will be respected is the woman who goes out to paid work. Although Labour in opposition rightly rejected the Tories' attacks on single mothers, it could end up condemning those same single mothers not for their morality, but for their failure to follow a new Labour model for women.

Perhaps single parents would be better off if they and their children started a rock band and persuaded the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to allow them to stay on benefit to develop their creativity.

Ms Drown: I want to correct the impression that we are presenting one option to women. We are not doing that. We value the role of women who work at home in unpaid work. Nothing is more valuable, and often more satisfying, than bringing up children. That is important not only to those children, but to society. When we speak to women, many of them say that they want choice. At present there is not enough choice and not enough facilities to enable women to take up those opportunities. We value women working at home, but we also want to give them opportunities for education, training and paid work outside the home, if they want it.

Mrs. Ballard: I am pleased to hear that. I do not want the House to think that I am promoting only one option for parents—to stay at home rather than going out to work. I want what the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) says she wants—genuine options for women. Many women cannot have meaningful choices unless the Government take action to remove the barriers to those choices. The barriers are economic, social, political and cultural.

I therefore welcome the Government's national child care strategy. It is a step in the right direction, and long overdue. I recognise that building such a strategy is a difficult task. There are difficult choices about priorities—whether pre-school nursery provision for under-five-year-olds, or after-school care for children who are at school, and so on. Any national child care strategy must address four concerns—I notice that the Secretary of State had three.

Accessibility is certainly one of those concerns, especially in rural areas; the others are affordability, and the quality of child care, to which I shall return; and diversity and choice of provision. For example, some people who work erratic hours would prefer a live-in nanny. It may be the only sensible form of child care available for them. Others who work more settled hours or who have smaller houses would prefer to use a child minder or out-of-school care, or some other arrangement outside their own home.

I welcome the proposals for tax credits for 75 per cent. of child care costs. I hope that the credit will go to the parent who actually pays for child care, not to the higher earner. I do not understand why it is limited to the cost of caring for two children. Many of the women currently in the benefits poverty trap are those with larger families, for whom the economics of paid work simply do not add up.

Single parents with, say, three or four more children may still not find it financially advantageous to go back to work and get the tax credits, if the credits apply only to two children. As the number of children in the family increases, not only does the actual cost of child care increase, but it is more difficult to find free child care from family or friends.

I was fortunate when I went back to work, as I had only one child, who could easily be slipped in unnoticed to a friend's family; but my personal assistant has three children. I do not think that anyone would look after them for nothing. That is a slur on her three children, one of whom is my godson. They are delightful children, but it is much more difficult to incorporate three of someone else's children into one's family, so paid child care is usually the only option for a larger family.

I hope that the problems of accessibility and choice in rural areas will be seriously addressed. The right hon. Lady spoke about that, but she did not suggest that extra funds might be directed at rural areas. This week, I received a letter from Ruishton Rascals, an out-of-school club in my constituency. It is experiencing difficulty in managing the numbers who use the club, and needs funds to enable it to continue providing high quality care in a rural area. It is not enough just to provide start-up costs—there must be continuing financial support, particularly in rural areas, where the numbers may not be as high as they would be in an urban area.

I am concerned about the quality of child care. Many child care workers have had no specialist training. The Government's promotion of paid child care over that of the parent seems highly dubious if they cannot guarantee that it will be of a high standard. I recently had an Adjournment debate in which I called for a registration scheme for child care workers. I was disappointed with the Minister's response. He did not recognise the vital need to protect parents and children through a national register of nannies and child minders.

Child care should be available in conjunction with family-friendly policies in employment—I welcome the Government's recognition of that. I hope that businesses will recognise that both fathers and mothers are parents. Mothers will not have freedom until fatherhood is taken seriously by employers.

Families in all forms are the basic structure of society. A healthy and peaceful society needs support from government and from business. I am sure that hon. Members with families will agree that long working hours put a great deal of pressure on families. Functional families need functional parents, who are not tied to the desk or production line. We must get away from the idea that people must prove their commitment to their job by being in the office at 7 am and not leaving until 11 pm.

Mrs. Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): It sounds like us.

Mrs. Ballard: It sounds very like our job. We must get away from those hours.

Family-friendly policies are also about more adaptable working practices, including part-time work, job sharing and flexible hours. Such policies will help women to return to the work force and parents to accommodate the timetables of their children with their timetables of work.

Ministers have signalled many good intentions, but good intentions alone do not help women in the real world. Women should be able to make choices about how they want to live their lives, and Government should enable and empower them.

There is not time for me to talk about pension provision. We have already heard that many of today's pensioners are among the poorest people in society. I hope that the Government will not only address the problems of tomorrow's pensioners but take on board the problems of women pensioners who are living in poverty now.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State talked about citizenship pensions, which would not be based on contributions—at least, I hope that is what she was talking about. Such pensions will relate especially to carers, who will have a break in their contribution records.

I hope that the Government will tackle also the problems faced by divorced women over their husbands' private pension provision, and the need to split it on divorce. I hope also that they will consider the idea of uni-sex annuities, as proposed by Legal and General, which do not discriminate according to gender.

What all women want is equality, not special treatment. Our daughters are beginning to expect equality as the norm. But equality should be extended to older women as well—those who are on pensions now or are about to retire, those doing the same job as men but still earning less than men, and those who make the choice to look after their children or an elderly relative. They should not have to pay the price of Government cuts in spending or the history of a male-dominated political culture.

11.12 am

Laura Moffatt (Crawley): It is a great pleasure to speak in this debate on women's priorities, certainly as recognised by the Government. However, I feel ghastly. I feel terrible because I travelled overnight from Washington. As many right hon. and hon. Members will know, it is not a pleasant experience. My eyes are burning, I feel tired, and my legs are like lead. This has reminded me how I felt most of the time when I was bringing up my children.

I had three sons. When they were small children, I did a night duty job as a nurse, and I was a busy borough councillor for 12 years. If I am honest, I felt as I have just described for most of the time. The feeling is nothing new: it has merely served as a slight reminder for me.

With the help of my family, I muddled through. I did not have to make child care arrangements, because I had my family around me to help, in the same way as I helped my sister, who is a lone parent. I helped with her child after she returned to work after six weeks away from it, as a trained nurse.

I survived, and so did my sons—just. It was a valuable experience, because it brought to me, and brings to the House, a new experience. I believe that we as women should share the experience with everyone else.

I travelled to Washington as a member of the Select Committee on Defence. We were discussing issues such as NATO enlargement, the procurement of materials for our armed forces, and many other issues relating to our armed forces. This gave me the opportunity to speak to some interesting people, one of whom was General Lesley Kenne of the United States air force. General Kenne is the highest ranking woman officer in the US armed forces. She is a fantastic women, who is running the joint strike fighter programme that will replace our F16 and F18 aircraft. General Kenne flies those aircraft, too.

I sat next to General Kenne during lunch, and she told me that she had made definite choices about what she wanted. She felt that she should not have had to do that, and she added that it was very difficult.

I met other women, who were also doing valuable work. It is—[Interruption.] It is shame that we giggle about women who are making their way in the world and are an example, such as the two women ships' captains who have recently been promoted. I am sure that the House will join with me in celebrating their success. Those are women who have helped to forge the way ahead.

We know that we are all very different women. I met a woman called Sue, who was a corporal. She joined the marine corps several years ago. Incidentally, I say to the right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), the shadow Leader of the House, that, in the passing-out exam for women marines—the right hon. Lady was speaking in a derisory manner about women who involved themselves in life-style articles in the press—they are asked, if they were to have four articles of make-up, what they would be. They are asked what they should wear on the basis that they should always be properly presented. It is not right and proper to make comments of the sort that we heard from the right hon. Lady.

Mrs. Shephard: I shall set the record straight. I think that the hon. Lady will find when she reads Hansard that I was getting agreement—from the body language of those on the Government Front Bench and Labour Back Benchers, I believe I got it—that, since new women Members have come into the House, there have been unprecedentedly vicious attacks on them, because they are women, from some members of the press. I think that that is deplorable. I made a light-hearted remark about make-overs, and said that I could do with one. From what the hon. Lady has said this morning, although she does not look as if she needs a make-over, she sounds as if she feels that she could do with one.

Laura Moffatt: I thank the right hon. Lady for her intervention. I am glad to have her explanation. It is wrong to start pinpointing women and making remarks about the way in which they like to conduct their business. That is not right and proper.

I return to Sue, because her position is crucial to what we, the Labour Government, are trying to do. Sue is able to do the job that she wants to do, and we must ensure that that is made possible for women in this country. Sue is a corporal, and she has decided to have a baby. She will return to the marine corps, and she will have child care when she returns, from six weeks if she so chooses. That child care provision will be commensurate with her wages. The US armed forces ensure that those serving in them do not pay too much for their child care. Sue feels secure as a result.

I was interested to hear the comment that only one in 20 women, if given the choice, would go out to work. I suspect that women will always choose the best for their children. If they believe that child care will not be permanent, not of good quality and not available at a reasonable cost, they will choose to keep them at home. That is what the Government's thrust is all about, and that offers choices to women—in other words, allows them to make an informed choice in deciding what they want.

These are down-to-earth policies. They have not been adopted because they are sexy or interesting. They are designed to elicit the best out of our society, to ensure that everybody is able to play her or his part and to grow and expand, offering all they want in our community.

I joined the Labour party, the day after I gave birth to my second son. Incidentally, it was the day after the Labour party lost the election in 1979. I went to my first meeting when my baby was two weeks old. I now have the great honour to be a Member of this place, and able to share experiences with colleagues. It is crucial to me that we forge ahead with all these issues, including child care.

I have heard it said that we are not taking the issue seriously, but Labour is listening to women. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State held a conference in Southwark on this very issue—getting women to participate and tell us what they want, so that we can respond as we should. There is so much happening on women's issues. People know that. That is why they elected us. We will not let them down. When I went to my first Labour party meeting, I knew that one day we would be here, in power, putting forward the policies that will make a real difference to women's lives.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): I feel privileged to be the first man to take part in the debate on the Government's priorities for women. Although I am patently not a woman, some of my best friends are. I tried that out on the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) in the Tea Room, and she thought that it would go down well. Clearly some Members on the Government Benches do not share her sense of humour.

Although I fully support any Government initiative to give equal opportunities, I will never support—I do not think that any Opposition Member will—positive discrimination for women, or, indeed, for any other section of the community. It leads to a lowering of overall standards rather than offering equal opportunities to women, which is what I hope hon. Members on both sides of the House will support.

Mrs. Lait: I have a problem with my hon. Friend's use of the words "positive discrimination". There is enormous confusion in people's minds about positive discrimination, which puts in place systems to help women, and quotas, which are positively not helpful to women. Does he agree with me?

Mr. Fabricant: That was a helpful intervention. The point I was making is that I support—as I believe we all support—equal opportunities. What we do not support is positive discrimination and quotas, which tend to lower standards.

Barbara Follett: Positive discrimination is illegal in this country. Positive action is legal, and quotas come under positive action. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman, whom I thank for his courtesy in giving way, that positive discrimination and positive action have acted in favour of men for centuries, and I agree with him that it has lowered standards.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. She knows everything about positive discrimination being illegal, as her own party was ruled illegal in positively discriminating for women when it tried to introduce women-only shortlists for Parliamentary candidates.

Lorna Fitzsimons: It has shown to be a success.

Mr. Fabricant: We shall judge from the hon. Lady's speech whether it has, if she catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Ms Drown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fabricant: I should like to move on, as I want to give hon. Ladies on the Government Benches a chance to contribute.

I shall first present some of the background to the current position regarding women, and then make a positive—if I can use that word after what I have just said—suggestion about what the Government should be doing, as an additional tranche of their activities, to help women.

The Secretary of State for Social Security, who is no longer present, said that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor are committed to women. We observe that neither the Prime Minister nor the Chancellor is a woman. Of course, the first woman Prime Minister of the United Kingdom was Mrs. Thatcher, in the 1980s. Unlike Mrs. Thatcher in the 1980s, the Secretary of State for

[Mr. Fabricant]

Social Security is known for turning. She has done one U-turn after another, which is an unfortunate precedent for the Labour Government.

We were told that women are factory workers and teachers. I would add that they are also bank managers, scientists, engineers and doctors. Women are achievers. I remind the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), who has just returned from Washington, that one of the finest Secretaries of State in the United States since the second world war is Madeleine Albright.

I shall now speak about the current position of women, because all is not doom and gloom, although I am the first to admit that women still do not have equal opportunities, for all the reasons that have been discussed.

Women now have more job opportunities than ever before. That is a direct consequence of the Conservative Government's policies on flexible labour markets. [Interruption.] It is true. There are 12.3 million women in our work force. They account for 30 per cent. of the work force, compared with only 8 per cent. in 1984. A study by the Institute of Employment Research shows that, by 2001, 40 per cent. of corporate management jobs—I made the point earlier that we should not say that women work just in blue-collar areas—will be held by women. More than 50 per cent. of employees in the United Kingdom will be women by 2001.

The number of women who are self-employed has risen by 88 per cent. since 1981. Women account for well over one in four of the self-employed. The Government cannot say on the one hand, "We've been in office for only nine months, so don't blame us," and on the other say, "We've been in government for nine months, and look how good we've been at getting women into the work force."

We are talking about positive discrimination for women. I could argue that women have shown themselves superior to men in certain circumstances.

Mrs. Shephard: You should not sound so surprised.

Mr. Fabricant: There are so few men on these Benches—quite rightly, I guess—that I feel that I have to stand up for the minority in the Chamber today.

In 1995-96, 49 per cent. of girls achieved five or more GCSE grades at A starred to C, compared with only 40 per cent. of boys. Girls are doing better than boys at GCSE. Thirty-two per cent. of 17-year-old girls achieved two or more GCE A-levels or AS-levels, compared with 27 per cent. of boys. That is an lead of 5 percentage points over boys.

In higher education, the number of female entrants has risen. Both sexes are virtually equal. I am sure that the whole House will welcome that.

Mrs. May: I apologise to my hon. Friend and to the House that I will not be able to listen to the whole debate, because I have a lunchtime speaking engagement addressing, as it happens, a women's group.

The figures that my hon. Friend just gave were alluded to by my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard). Does he agree that the paradox is that, now that we have taken positive action—this relates to his point about positive discrimination—to improve the achievement of girls in our education system, what is now of concern in the education system is the under-achievement of boys? Equality means enabling both sexes to achieve their best potential.

Mr. Fabricant: I agree. I would go further, and say that equality means that, next Friday, we ought to have a debate on the Government's initiatives for men. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk, who, for a long time, was Secretary of State for Education.

Over the past 10 years, the number of female first-degree graduates has improved: it has risen by 129 per cent., compared with 81 per cent. for men. There is no question that, in education, the better half of society is achieving over men.

Before I make positive suggestions, which I hope the Government will take up, I shall make two points about which the Government have been wrong, in my experience as an employer, before I became a Member of Parliament, and now representing the rural constituency of Lichfield.

First, the Government have been hasty in abolishing nursery vouchers. The vouchers had only just come into existence, and there can be no doubt that the way in which they operated caused some difficulties in the first few months. Nobody would deny that, but we could always have refined the system, and we intended to do so.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fabricant: In a moment.

The abolition has meant that women living in rural areas with no local schools cannot place their children in nursery classes. Previously, private organisations in the rural areas had been getting nursery vouchers and could offer nursery services. Now those mothers have to take their children—often using their own cars, which means paying a lot more for petrol because the Government's green policies have penalised rural areas—into towns to nursery schools or classes that are part of the state education system.

Now I shall give way to the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond)—I was also talking to him in the Tea Room.

Mr. Pond: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that one of the effects of nursery vouchers, especially in rural areas such as that represented by the right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), was to destroy many local playgroups? Will he also confirm that the right hon. Lady, to whom he has just paid tribute, was the Minister responsible for the abolition of the wages councils, which both the Equal Opportunities Commission and the TUC considered a discriminatory measure, because the great majority of people covered by the wages councils were women? As a result, many women had their pay cut in absolute terms. Did that assist women?

Mr. Fabricant: The abolition of wages councils meant that fewer women were employed. [Interruption.] At the end of the day, the hon. Gentleman and other Labour Members—

Mrs. Shephard: More, not fewer.

Mr. Fabricant: More people were employed. I am sorry; that was a slip of the tongue.

The hon. Gentleman must ask himself whether he wants to see fewer women employed earning a particular wage while the others earn nothing at all. The whole thrust of his Government's policy is to get people back to work, not to put them on benefit.

Let us move to my second point, which the hon. Gentleman almost anticipated. Personally, I do not oppose the minimum wage. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Personally I do not, because I recognise that some people are employed at very low wages in sweatshops, and that is wrong.

However, I certainly oppose the Labour Government's policy on the national minimum wage. Time and time again, the Prime Minister has defended his policy by saying, "Well, they have it in the United States of America." The Prime Minister is mistaken, or is misleading the House. They do not have it in the United States of America.

Barbara Follett: Yes, they do.

Mr. Fabricant: There is no national minimum wage in the United States. The minimum wage there varies from state to state, and there are huge exemptions, such as those for youth and for people working in certain types of employment. If we suggested sensible legislation of that nature, I would be tempted to vote for it, I must tell the Conservative Whip sitting in front of me.

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green): The fact that the hon. Gentleman is using the word "exemptions" means that there is a minimum wage. Otherwise, there could not be exemptions from it.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point. I am saying that there is no national minimum wage in the United States, for the very reason—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Although the national minimum wage would affect women's rights and employment, we should not dwell on the case for or against a national minimum wage.

Mr. Fabricant: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your guidance.

My precise point is that the Government's national minimum wage legislation, which, unlike that in the United States, does not have exemptions or regional variations and is not likely to be set at £3.05—the level in the United States—will result in greater unemployment for women. There is an analogy with what the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) was saying about the result of the abolition of wages councils. The abolition meant that more women were employed. The direct consequence of the Labour Government's introduction of a national minimum wage with no exemptions will be greater unemployment for women.

Now I shall make some brief comments about what I think the Government should be doing for women—issues that I believe are not being addressed at present. I look forward to being corrected if I am wrong.

At the moment, there is a thrust towards saying that women should be encouraged to get out and work and use carers for their children. The hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) rightly said that we should also encourage women, if they wish, to stay at home and look after their children. It should be their choice.

However, there can be a third choice; the two are not necessarily mutually exclusive. There are opportunities for women to look after their children and work at home as well. We are approaching the millennium, a time when teleworking will become more popular and practical.

As a Member of Parliament, I employ a former secretary from my previous job in Brighton. She left my employment and married my business partner while I was on business in Nairobi and Botswana. I came back to a nasty shock. Not only was she getting married, but she was marrying my business partner.

Christine Bowden—I think that I may mention her name—now has two gorgeous children whom she looks after. However, she is now able to look after me and, more importantly, some of my constituents, as well, because she teleworks from home, using her computer to write sensible and sometimes critical letters to Ministers about what they are not doing to help women in my constituency.

Women often want that opportunity to work at home. When children are ill, they often do not want them to be looked after by carers, no matter how caring the carers may be. Modern technology allows that. Using British Telecom's star services, calls can easily be diverted from one building to another. Much can be dealt with from home.

The Government should be looking into all that. Have they considered giving partial grants to provide computer systems for people who have gone on courses and learnt to use computers, but cannot afford to buy their own to work at home? There could be pump-priming opportunities for women, so that they could look after their children and work at home, too. The Government should be addressing that possibility.

The problem with the Government—we have seen it again today—is that they are all soundbites and reviews. Every time anyone asked the Secretary of State a question, she said, "It is under review." I believe that the Government have betrayed the electorate. Indeed, the hon. Member for Taunton (Mrs. Ballard), representing the Liberals, poignantly described how the Government, including some of the ladies in the Government, had done that. I suspect that they have betrayed their own principles too, which is far worse.

We have a Minister for women who has appeared in the House even less than the Minister without Portfolio—and that is saying something. We have a Government—

Ms Drown rose—

Mr. Fabricant: I am sorry: I am reaching my peroration now.

[Mr. Fabricant]

We have a Government who have abolished nursery vouchers to put up petrol prices, so putting rural mothers at an even greater disadvantage. We have a Government who have given £10 million for a breast screening programme, but who in nine short months have put up hospital waiting lists by 50,000. We have witnessed the total fiasco of the changes to single parent benefit. As I said, Baroness Thatcher was a lady who was not for turning. The Secretary of State for Social Security has turned, turned and turned again. No doubt we shall witness more U-turns.

I said at the outset that girls are outperforming boys in their GCSEs. The Government have so far failed their GCSEs. I look forward to them doing better in their re-sits.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): Many hon. Members want to speak, so I shall briefly counter the Opposition charge that the Government have been inactive on women's issues.

My greatest privilege in government was to be a member of the Cabinet Sub-Committee on women. I know from the inside that both Ministers for women have done a massive amount of work on women's issues, much of it behind the scenes. It is a tragedy, I hope a temporary one, that that work has been overshadowed by the lone parents controversy, but if the stories that I have heard this week are true, great progress has been made, which I welcome.

I shall not become involved in the controversy over how we arrived at this situation, but shall look forward. I particularly want to mention the rapidly evolving national child care strategy. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. More than any hon. Member, she is responsible for the new salience given to child care in the affairs of this country. It has been one of her concerns since the first day she was elected to the House. Although I was not a Member of Parliament at the time, I am reminded that one of her first interventions at Prime Minister's questions was to ask Baroness Thatcher whether she was concerned about the lack of child care in this country. Baroness Thatcher gave the brief and penetrating reply: "No."

Since being elected in 1992, I have observed my right hon. Friend's work on child care. When she was shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury, child care became a matter of economic policy for a major political party for the first time in this country's history. The national child care strategy will be a lasting monument to her. I hope that those who have their knives out for my right hon. Friend will put them back in their pockets or, better still, throw them away.

Looking forward, I am not without worries. I await the details and timing of the lone parent proposals in the Budget, and while the working family tax credit has many attractions, I hope that there will be a presumption that it goes to the woman in a couple, as with family credit. The Government have many other exciting initiatives, spearheaded by the women's unit, such as the new deal for lone parents, which has already achieved much. Although training is separate, I hope that it will be given greater salience, because lone parents would benefit from the training options in the mainstream new deal.

Like other hon. Members, I have learnt from constituents that women—lone parents and others—want to work, and education and training are key parts of that aspiration. On a constituency point, I regret that one of the best projects I have come across that gives opportunities to women, called women and new directions, is closing. I hope that the Government will examine such projects, because they are fundamental to the new deal.

The work of the Ministers for Women has many other aspects, such as the major task of mainstreaming women's issues. We are beginning to do that in the Scottish Office on issues such as transport and best value. I note the answer to a parliamentary question this week given by the Minister for women, who indicated that progress is being made on the issue of family-friendly work practices. There are also initiatives on public appointments: the representation of women is a key policy priority for the Government.

The setting up of the Scottish Parliament is an exciting prospect, and the Scottish Labour party is committed to gender equality. We introduced the mechanism of twinning and believe that through it we shall be able to achieve for the first time in any legislature an equal number of men and women representatives. That may be subject to challenge, like all-women shortlists. I regret that we did not appeal on that, but that is a matter of history. The debate on how to avoid the intentions of the Labour party, and of other parties, being sabotaged by challenge will begin when the Committee further considers the Government of Wales Bill on Monday.

The other priority for the Ministers for women is the development of a strategy against violence against women, which was flagged up earlier. I am an Edinburgh Member of Parliament and was first drawn to this matter because the zero tolerance campaign began in the city. When I spoke about it for the first time five years ago, the Minister for women was on the Opposition Front Bench. She and others value and admire the zero tolerance campaign. I hope that we can liaise with the campaign, particularly on publicity material, which will be part of the general strategy on dealing with violence against women. I also welcome the campaign launched in Scotland involving local authorities that targets young men and boys. Research by the Zero Tolerance Trust has produced disturbing evidence of the tolerance among boys and young men of violence against women.

The strategy for dealing with violence against women depends on three things: prevention, provision and protection. Scottish Office research on the extent of and gaps in current service provision should be published within the next two weeks. It will be the foundation of the strategy in Scotland, which must be cross-cutting, because health, housing and the criminal justice system are all involved.

Referrals to Scottish Women's Aid increased by 16 per cent. in 1996, yet there are threats to the provision of places. There is a shortage of refuge places in Scotland, as, no doubt, there is in England. Rape crisis centres also have funding problems. The Scottish Office must consider central funding for some of those vital services. I hope that the Government will consider the suggestion from the Zero Tolerance Trust that a panel of experts should be set up to advise them on such matters.

I shall speak briefly about protection, the third aspect of the strategy, and mention two controversies in Scotland. First, there has been controversy about the use of pre-court diversion schemes for perpetrators of violence against women. The Government have inherited that situation, and I hope that the Scottish Office will look into it. It seems to send out the wrong signal if some perpetrators of violence are not taken to court, but put on diversion schemes. There is nothing wrong with post-court diversion schemes, but pre-court schemes should be ruled out as part of the strategy.

Finally, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) is on the Front Bench and was active in securing legislation against stalking, I must refer to an incident that took place in Scotland yesterday and which the Government must consider. Under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, a sheriff refused to grant a non-harassment order against a man who had been convicted of five breaches of the peace for stalking against the same woman. The Appeal Court judges argued that previous convictions could not be examined to find out whether the offence was of the same kind and indisputably constituted a course of conduct. The judges argued that they were following the letter of the legislation. I hope that the Government will look into that and, if it is the case, make the appropriate changes.

11.50 am

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I must join my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) in welcoming so many new women's faces to the House. I hope that they will acknowledge that the quality of the women on the Conservative side at least makes up for the lack of numbers.

I went to the Library to find out the age and background of many of the new women Members, and I was surprised that none of them have complimented the former Conservative Government for the opportunity to go to university, which so many of them enjoyed. When we took over from the previous Labour Government, only one in eight young people went to university; now it is one in three. Furthermore, the percentage of women has increased—from less than 20 per cent. under the previous Labour Government to 50 per cent. in 20 years. Most of those women, therefore, owe their opportunity of higher education to the former Conservative Government, and I hope that they will accept that and pay credit to that Government.

The debate is to discuss the Government's policies. We have heard much about women as victims. We have heard an awful lot about single mothers with problems and not nearly enough about women as achievers. We have talked about lone parents, which has come to mean a woman on her own with children, but we have not heard what we should do about our daughters who are at school.

To paraphrase Oscar Wilde, to have one baby is a misfortune but to have two looks like carelessness. We should be teaching our daughters that having children on their own is no prize and no great shakes. In the United States, young women who are struggling to bring up their children go round schools to inform pupils of that. Nowadays, young women do not have to be victims of their biology; they have choices. That is one of the great advances that we have made.

Women have choices not merely in education, but in occupation. As has been pointed out, almost half our work force are women, but they are not all in low-paid jobs struggling on a few pounds an hour; there are a great many women of ambition in higher occupations. In the past week, I have visited three institutions in my constituency that prove that. GEC Marconi optics division has an employment roll of 1,200 people and a woman managing director—a highly qualified engineer. Half its work force are women. They have all benefited from the education opportunities provided under the previous Government, which makes one proud of that Government—it certainly makes me proud.

I also visited my local hospital, where the chief executive is a youngish woman, and I went yesterday to the forensic laboratories across the river. I invite every hon. Member to go and see the laboratory, which is astonishing. It carries out all the behind-the-scenes forensic investigations for the police and has several hundred employees—I think that the service as a whole has about 5,000—more than half of whom are young women science graduates and, surprise, surprise, so is the director of the organisation, Janet Thompson.

I point that out because the House often gives the impression that young women are an underclass or an underdog group, who have to be looked after and patronised by their parents. We would do well to teach our young women that a young man in a hurry is likely to leave a young woman with a worry, and to stop patronising them with the idea that having babies out of wedlock or a partnership is all well and good because the state will pick up the bill. We do not do young women any favours by impressing the poverty trap on them. Everyone talks about that and says that we want to get out of it, but the first thing to do is to make our young women realise that they do not have to go down that route.

Laura Moffatt: Does the hon. Lady agree that there has been no suggestion of painting women as victims, as the debate has been wide-ranging—about all sorts of women and the contributions that they make? Does she also agree that many of the women she met were of postgraduate age and that it is a little later, when one has to face child care issues and all that those bring to bear, that women start to run into trouble?

Mrs. Gorman: I hear what the hon. Lady says. I think that women are perfectly capable of making their own arrangements if they want to adopt a dual career. Of course, women are much blessed, as they can have the benefits of both a career in the home and one in the workplace if they so wish. That is a great advance. Our grandmothers did not have much of a choice—it was going out scrubbing or taking in other people's washing. Nowadays, we all enjoy the opportunities we have gained—certainly all the women in the House are enjoying them. I am simply urging that we should look on the bright side.

Bearing in mind a woman's dual opportunities, at home and for a career, I must suggest to the Secretary of State ways in which the Government could help rather than impose the poverty trap on women. First, women in work have told me that they have difficulty with the school system. They have the problem of who will look after the kids during the school holidays—we know that it is likely to be mother and not father. So why can we not have a flexible school timetable? Parents could take their children out of school at different times of the year to tie up with their working lives. Why not? There is no reason why we should all be on holiday at the same time. They could take advantage of all the opportunities for cheap winter holidays that we look forward to in our old age. Why not enjoy them while we are younger? Flexible teaching hours and time at school are entirely possible. If we brought more private sector interest into our education system, I am sure that those would come.

The next thing is to make better use of school premises and to make them available for private sector organisations that are happy to run pre-school and after-school clubs and opportunities. I praise the previous Conservative Government, of which I was a part, for introducing the grant-maintained system, which led to many schools opening their doors at other times of the day—not locking their gates at 3 pm—and allowed school managements to use premises flexibly to increase the school's revenue and its usefulness to the community.

Mrs. Ballard: I cannot allow to go unchallenged the hon. Lady's statement that grant-maintained schools were the first to open their premises to the public. I was a member of the local education authority in Somerset, the county council of which pioneered community schools long before grant-maintained schools existed.

Mrs. Gorman: I accept what the hon. Lady says. My point is that state schools usually empty out at 3 or 4 pm and lock the gates. Under the private funding that the Conservative Government introduced, schools were given the opportunity to decide how their premises and resources were used. School buildings are now opening up in all sorts of ways, not least for wedding receptions on Saturdays. They have also taken the opportunity—especially that provided by the voucher scheme, which the Government are foolishly doing away with—to lay on other facilities at other times. The Government can at least recommend that local authorities encourage such activities.

The Secretary of State should have a word with the Chancellor about the taxation system. The women I talk to do not want the state to provide nurseries. Moreover, they usually do not want workplace nurseries, as they do not want to take their children to work. They want to be able to offset the cost of child care, not against their net earnings—when they have already paid their taxes—but against their gross earnings.

That also applies to other care costs, such as those incurred in caring for the elderly. Many women help to support older parents, and if they want to go out to work as well, why should not the costs be offset against tax? If I require a secretary to assist me in my work, the expenses can be tax deductible. If I need care or help with people in my household, however, I have to pay it out of my net income.

The Government can change that. The system that was introduced in France has allegedly created some 40,000 additional jobs, because people can afford to pay for care. In this country, many highly qualified women have to give up work because of the cost of child care. They do not want the state to provide child care; they want to be able to afford to pay for whatever system they require—probably private care. The costs of that care must be treated as part of women's legitimate work expenses.

We must congratulate the previous Conservative Government on freeing the market, which has provided the jobs at the upper end of the economy that are increasingly available to women.

Mrs. McKenna: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gorman: Not at the moment; the hon. Lady will have time to make her own speech if I sit down soon.

In the future, women are likely to be our most important economic resource. Short of mass immigration, only those women who are as yet unemployed can be brought back into the labour force to fill the jobs in the new industries. The free market, not the state, provides those jobs. The Government can, at best, ensure that businesses are not overtaxed, that their pension funds are not raided—as they have been by the Government in the short time that they have been in office—and that capital remains in the private sector to be invested in creating opportunities in information technology, science and many other new industries that will undoubtedly emerge.

The Government can adopt policies to help women. The ones that I have suggested would help educated, intelligent and high-achieving women. I urge the Government to stop referring to a large proportion of women as unthinking robots, who are unable to control their instincts and who have to have all sorts of services laid on for them—especially child care.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Ms Joan Ruddock): I very much admire the hon. Lady, but can she cite any instance of any member of the Government making such a statement?

Mrs. Gorman: I am asking the Government to think about the ways in which they can continue to implement Conservative policies to assist high-achieving women, who do not expect the state to do everything for them. The Government should ask them what they want. I am telling the Minister some of the things that such women have told me. I do not have focus groups or juries, but I have talked to women in the workplace.

When the Minister consults her focus groups, I would like her to remember that a role should be opened up for older women, of whom I am, of course, a perfect example. I did not enter the House until I was over 50. The Government have a huge opportunity to make use of older women coming back into the work force. I want the Government to consider what they can do to assist women, who have had the experience of raising a family and who are wise in the ways of children and men, to adapt those talents to contribute to society.

It concerns me enormously—as I am sure it does every woman and man in the House—that we keep hearing terrible stories of child abuse in state-run homes, although I make no issue of the fact that they are state-run. Most of the abusers are men and I am sure that the men in the House deplore that as much as we all do. I suggest to the Minister that mature women would make excellent directors of those homes and would not be bamboozled in the same way that some of the male directors of such homes seem easily to be. In that way, the children who have the misfortune not to have a stable family, and who have to live in such institutions, would have a woman—a motherly figure—to turn to. That would make good use of the background and talents that such women have to offer to our communities, and that is just one example of an imaginative approach to utilising the attributes of older women.

Thanks to improvements in health—the previous Government made a large contribution to improving the services available to women—we all now have the chance of living into our 80s. By the time many women are 50, their families have left home and the women do not want to sit at home making cabbage soups to keep slim on. We should therefore think carefully about the opportunities that the late development of women offers to our society and go out of our way to welcome such women into our ranks, whether in the House, the other professions or other areas of work. In that way, the Government—through their management of many of the services provided in our communities—could make a positive contribution.

12.7 pm

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): I apologise in advance for the fact that I will have to leave before the conclusion of the debate. Although I am not speaking at a women's lunch, I have a very appropriate reason for leaving. My three-year-old grandson, Robert, tells me that he is very poorly with chicken pox and I shall have to go home to pick up his two brothers from kids club and nursery. It is also appropriate that I should follow the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), because I entered the House at the age of 57. It gives me great pleasure to follow the hon. Lady.

I am proud to be here today, with so many women, contributing to our debate on women. We can celebrate in advance international women's day, which takes place next week, when I shall speak at a Wirral trades council women's event. I know that many of my hon. Friends will attend similar meetings.

I wish to start my celebration of international women's day now, by talking about women I have known and admired and what I have learnt from them. I hope that other hon. Members will also learn from them. Yesterday, as I was rapidly going through the mountain of unsolicited mail that we all receive daily, I came across India Perspectives. I always look through it and read bits, and then post it to my daughter-in-law, whose parents were born in India—in fact, they are there now. Yesterday, the journal was celebrating the half century of Indian independence with some potted histories of people who fought and worked for it, including the late Mahatma Gandhi. On the next page, to my amazement, was Annie Besant, a name from my past. I first heard of her as a social reformer and heroine of women's rights in many feminist publications of the 1960s and 1970s when I was taking O-level economic history. Until yesterday, I never knew of her Indian connections.

I have brought the journal and I shall quote some relevant parts of the article, which is headed "Annie Besant The Irish Woman Who Fought for India". Her epitaph was

> "She tried to follow Truth".

She fought throughout her life for justice and free thought, from her early days in England when with Charles Bradlaugh, a Bradfordian, she published a pamphlet on family planning to test the right of free discussion on the population question—for which she was arrested—down to her work for home rule for India. On her work for India, the article says:

> "The women of India owe a special debt of gratitude to her. In 1917, she laid the foundation of the Indian Women's Association. This Association spread its network throughout the country for furthering the progress of women in education, industry, politics and general uplift. Thus the women were banded together for the service of the country. This made it possible for her and Mrs. Sarajini Naidu and others to present a memorandum in favour of women's franchise to Mr. Montague, Secretary of State for India. It is because of the efforts of persons like Annie Besant that on attaining independence, Indian women obtained the right to vote automatically and without further struggle."

I want to talk about another women, who post-dated Annie Besant by 20 or so years. Her name was Dinah Place, known to friends and family as Dainty Dinah. No one here will know of her, but she was one of those brave working-class champions of the women's suffrage movement. She was my grandma, a socialist and a pacifist; but she never allowed fear to get in the way of her convictions, tiny though she was. In 1918, when women over the age of 30 were allowed to vote, she threw her small weight behind the Independent Labour party. She had lost two brothers on the Somme; a third came home physically and mentally broken from gassing, later to take his own life; her husband Tom, with his badly injured leg, was lucky to be alive. Hence her conversion to pacifism.

Without hesitation, Dinah made her terraced house in Waterfoot, in the Rossendale valley, available as a committee room for the ILP, whose candidate was a man aged beyond his years by having spent three years in solitary confinement in Durham gaol for his stand as a conscientious objector. For her trouble, she was left with not a window intact. Despite her loss, the crowd could see her only as the enemy. As with her, my beliefs, my politics, come from the people I have known and my experiences of life—not from student politics, because I left school at 15, or from Marx or Millbank. If experience is the best educator, my education was second to none.

Some hon. Members may think that I am living in a time warp, so I will talk about some of my more recent experiences. For nine years, I served as a member of the social security appeal tribunal. I heard many cases involving women who had worked all their lives in the textile industry. Bradford and Keighley have a long history of wool and, more recently, synthetic textiles. Many women there have suffered much from industrial deafness and should be entitled to industrial injury benefit. To my horror, I found that they were not entitled to it because of the narrow qualifying conditions. Only two descriptions qualify: weaving and high-speed false twisting. Almost every woman who appealed to my tribunal for the benefit was told that her case was outside the rules because of those descriptions.

I started to ask the women questions. I would say, "So you have not been a weaver?" If they said no, I would ask what they did, and they would tell me. I would say, "So you never did anything by the way of high-speed false twisting?" They would say, "I have never heard of it." I think that there is something wrong with the regulation. Perhaps this is not the place to raise it, but I keep asking questions about it and I am not getting anywhere so I thought I would have a go today. Something needs doing to make the regulation wider. Women are suffering and are not getting what they should be getting.

[Mrs. Ann Cryer]

One of my constituents, Kathleen Waddington, has been arguing her case for four years through tribunals and is now in the process of appealing to the social security commissioners. I wish her well, but, as the law stands, I do not think that she will have a great deal of success.

I should like to tell the House about another aspect of my life before I came to this place. When, in 1983, I was out of a job, I decided to work with Keighley technical college in its scheme to improve the lot of Asian women living at home with small children. Many of them did not have any English at all. They had come here as spouses and, because they had small children, they could not go to the local centre to learn English. The only way in which they could learn it was for those with a bit of spare time to go to their homes and teach them.

I joined the scheme and went to teach three women, Ruqia, Asiya and Ghanimat Jan. As often happens in this sort of case, I learned a great deal more from them. They are my constituents now. There is another message for the Government here. If we are to improve the lot of Asian women, many of whom do not have any English, we shall have to put more money, perhaps through technical colleges or wherever, into teaching them English so that they can be aware of their rights and of what benefits they should have.

It is fair to say that some of my Asian women constituents are the most deprived. That is largely because they do not have English so they do not know where to turn for help or what help is due to them. I appeal to our Government to look into that.

I am in touch with my constituents week after week in my advice surgeries. I shall refer briefly to a number of concerns that I believe are being tackled by the Government. Many of my women constituents live in rural areas and are appreciative of what we are trying to do for them. We are already starting to address the need for first-class education for our children; for good quality health care, free at point of use, through our national health service; for safety for women and families within and without their homes and freedom from the fear of violence; for a good quality of life for women into retirement with decent pensions and help with fuel costs; for good-quality child care at affordable fees—I know that we are already well on with that—for a good, reliable, safe and cheap public transport system, which can be such an enabling feature in women's lives; for a national minimum wage along with the working time directive and the social contract.

I look forward to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget. I really do not care who leaks what to whom or for any sort of point scoring. I simply look forward to measures that will ensure that the poorest of our poor children are not penalised by our Government but are given financial help. I should like to put on record my appreciation of any part that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has played in that decision.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I much appreciate the opportunity to take part in this wide-ranging debate, in which a huge number of issues have been raised. When we look back and read Hansard, we will see that there has been great agreement on the analysis of the problems. Even though the language in which we have discussed them may have differed and our solutions to them will differ, there is a great degree of accord on the issues that face women. I hope that Opposition Members recognise that the Conservatives went a considerable way in successfully tackling the issues that faced us during our 18 years in government; but there will always be other problems that need to be solved, and I am sure that there will be as many contributions toward those solutions from Conservative Members as from Labour Members.

One of the achievements of our 18 years in government of which I am particularly proud is the introduction of independent married women's taxation, which, although hardly mentioned today, freed married women from many of the constraints facing them. I took part in the battle for it for many years: year after year, I turned up to see the assistant secretary to the Treasury and demanded, and put on record the views and arguments for, the independent taxation of married women. Needless to say, given the way in which the Treasury works, every two years there was a different assistant secretary, so often we had to start from the beginning and educate them all over again.

With me in that battle was the Conservative women's national committee, which did a great deal of work in encouraging our Government finally to give us independent taxation, and Women In Media—an organisation with which I was associated for many years—did much of the intellectual analysis of the need for independent taxation. It was not until an occasion at the Conservative women's conference in 1987, when I was able to suggest that it was not the best thing that the most powerful Prime Minister in the world had to have her tax form signed by her husband, that we got the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move. It saddens me that the question has raised its head again and that the Prime Minister may have to be asked whether he would be happy to sign his wife's tax form. The many women Labour Members here today should also consider whether they would be happy to have their husbands sign their tax form.

The issue has raised its head again because of the rumour, which will not go away, that the Government are preparing to tax child benefit. Today, the Secretary of State said that she had no intention whatsoever of taxing child benefit. However, we read in this week's newspapers the conclusions drawn by journalists from the fact that, when the Minister for Welfare Reform appeared before the Select Committee on Social Security, he did not rule out taxing child benefit. Because there is conflicting information coming out of the same Department, we are unable to say that the possibility of taxing child benefit has gone away.

I am sure that there are Labour Members here who, like Conservative Members, fought for a long time to get child benefit. Child benefit is, in effect, a tax relief recognising the cost of raising children that is paid in cash to the carer. It is all too easy to forget that it was and still is, in effect, a tax relief. In the 1970s battle to get child benefit, one of the biggest obstacles was the attitude of the trade unions, which did not want money to be transferred from the wallet to the purse, but I do not think that the trade unions are the problem this time. The problem is that, because we have recognised the cost of raising children—something that any civilised society should do—through the tax relief of child benefit, it appears to cost a huge sum of money, and when the Treasury sees a huge sum of money, its first and instinctive reaction is to ask, "How can we reduce it?"

One reason why we wanted child benefit to be a cash benefit was that poorer families could not benefit from the tax relief: by and large, they did not have sufficient income. I suspect that that may still be true. Therefore, if we, a civilised society, intend to recognise through the tax system the cost of raising children, we must maintain child benefit as a benefit to the carer, who should get the money.

None the less, it is argued that the cost of child benefit is so high that the benefit should be taxed. There is logical nonsense in taxing what is, in effect, a tax relief. However, if the Government intend to take that route, I have some questions for them. I should be grateful for answers from the Minister, when she replies to the debate, or the Chancellor, in the Budget. If child benefit is to be taxed, at what level of income will it be taxed, and on whose income will the tax fall? In the case of a married couple, will it fall on the higher of two incomes, or on the joint income? Or will it fall on the carer of the child, who would be taxed with one hand and given benefit with the other?

Those questions must be asked, but there is an overriding question: why tax child benefit? If it costs too much, perhaps it should be reduced; the Government might like to consider that. Perhaps child benefit should go only to poorer people, in which case the Government would introduce a means test and live with the resulting opprobrium.

Perhaps it is the age-old Labour problem of envy; perhaps the Labour Government do not like rich people, in which case, let me help them. If they really want to tax rich people and take their child benefit away, the easiest way to approach the matter may be to stop calling it child benefit, call it "child's benefit" and give every child the benefit. It could be paid to the carer; he or she could pick it up at the post office, if they wish. Children without other income would not need to fill in a tax form, so there would be no extra bureaucracy, but children from families that were rich enough to allow the child to have trust income—investment income—who pay tax, could pay tax on their child benefit. That would be the way to tax child benefit. The Government may wish to consider that.

Child care costs are also a problem. I understand that, following a briefing by the Secretary of State for Social Security, information is starting to emerge from the Government on how the Budget will help with child care costs—many hon. Members have mentioned that. The newspapers tell us how generous the Government are thinking of being.

There will be up to £100 a week tax relief for child care costs for each of the first two children for couples earning under £20,000. That interested me, because in April 1997 average gross earnings were £19,120, so the Government are planning to help couples who have a joint income above national average earnings. If that couple have two children, and they are able to claim child care costs up to £100 each, that gives that couple an untaxed income of £10,400. If that couple are earning between £19,500 and £20,000, that untaxed tax relief will take them into the 40 per cent. tax bracket. That is not quite right; it feels wrong.

Is that the Government's intention? If it is, what will happen to people who earn slightly more than £20,000 or to those who earn just below that figure and are offered overtime or promotion to take them over the limit? Will they lose the £10,400 immediately? I can think of no bigger poverty trap. The Government must be considering a taper. Will it taper up to the 40 per cent. income tax bracket? Perhaps the Chancellor will increase the level at which the 40 per cent. band kicks in.

Will the £100 a week child care costs be met by the Treasury on the basis of receipts from the carers, as I read in the newspapers, or, as I understand from the pressure groups to which the Government have already spoken, will no proof of payment be needed? If the latter is the case, that £100 a week could be used for child care, granny care or anything else. It would be useful to know whether the Government are planning to give £10,400 to couples earning less than £20,000 with no controls, putting them into the super-tax bracket.

The system will be a disincentive for anyone earning more than £20,000.

Barbara Follett: May I suggest that the hon. Lady's questions might better be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor at Treasury questions? They are based on speculation, and might better be asked after 17 March.

Mrs. Lait: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. I have every intention of making a speech on the Budget. I am sorry if I am boring her. However, the subject has come up this week. According to today's newspapers, it was the Secretary of State for Social Security who briefed the papers. As the issue affects women directly, I thought that it might be of interest. The Chancellor may wish to address the fundamental questions about the £10,400 tax-free allowance in his Budget.

Mrs. Gillan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be surprising if the Minister for women, who has no responsibilities other than for women, had no knowledge of the issues and was unable to respond today?

Mrs. Lait: I have every sympathy with my hon. Friend's point. I have every intention of being here to listen closely to the response. I suspect that we shall be told to wait for the Budget, but at least we are pointing out that such questions will need to be answered then. I see the Minister for women nodding in agreement that they will be. I look forward to hearing the Chancellor going into the issue in great detail in the Budget, because he will be pursued to the bitter end on it.

Anyone earning more than £20,000 will be so "disincentivised"—if I may use the word—that the enterprise economy will never move again. In a sense, I hope that the Chancellor goes ahead, just to show that such a major redistribution of national income may buy short-term popularity, but at the expense of stifling enterprise and enraging married women—all that just to give a few people an unsustainable tax allowance.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply. The issues are crucial to the economic well-being of this country and of women. If she cannot answer my questions—I suspect that she cannot—I hope very much that the Chancellor will do so in detail in his Budget.

Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): I join other hon. Members in welcoming the opportunity to participate in this debate. It is a particularly important occasion, as no such debate took place last year when the Conservatives were in government, despite many requests from Labour Members.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady is not correct. The last women's debate in this place was held in Government time and was called by my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and me.

Ms Hughes: I shall certainly return to the Official Report to check that. My research this week found that there was no debate on women last year and that the previous two debates occurred in Opposition time. If the hon. Lady is right, I stand corrected.

I shall be brief, as I am aware that many of my colleagues wish to speak in this important debate. I want to focus on one priority that the Secretary of State highlighted this morning: the importance of family-friendly employment policies. In so doing, I shall address the needs of children—which my right hon. Friend also stressed—and the contribution that men can make to the issues facing women and to the well-being of children. I make no apology for placing at the heart of my contribution the needs of children and the contributions of both parents to children's lives.

We have heard about the changed and changing role of women in terms of economic activity in the past 10 years. Female participation in the work force has risen. However, the overall figures disguise the fact that the greatest increase has occurred in the activity of women with children, and particularly among women with children under five, whose participation has risen from about 40 per cent. to 54 per cent. in the past 10 years. That shows that the majority of women with children now work, including the majority of women with very young children.

The fact that that increase occurred at a time when the previous Government were bent on destroying rights at work, increasing job insecurity, abolishing wage councils and encouraging a low-pay, short-term contract culture in employment is testimony to both the need and the wishes of many women to work. The previous Government talked much about family values, but did very little to help parents meet their family responsibilities. I am glad that this Government recognise that fairness and security at work are a woman's issue, and have introduced measures to strike a better balance between flexibility in the workplace on the one hand and security in work on the other.

Despite the fact that many women have had to work for low wages in poor conditions, many women still want to work. We shall not return to the time when most women stayed at home. Work gives women benefits other than finance. Work provides other things that women value which, once experienced, they do not wish to relinquish—on that point, I part company with the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe). The problem which defeats many women, and which many others confront at no small cost to themselves, is the difficulty of combining work and child care in the hostile work environment left to us by the previous Government which makes no concessions for children's needs.

As women's economic activities have increased, what has been the pattern for working fathers? It is worth noting that it is very difficult to obtain official statistics about working fathers because, in tabulating data, statisticians have not bothered about whether men are fathers. Some recent secondary analysis of the 1994 labour force survey paints a disturbing picture. It shows that not only are fathers more likely to be in work than other men but they are more likely to be in full-time work and to work longer hours—an average of 47 hours a week. The study concluded:

"Over all, the increase in mother's employment has not resulted in any compensating change in father's employment: there is no indication of a substantial shift to a more part-time employment or of a reduction in working hours among those employed full-time. The consequence is an increasing workload on parents, as mothers' employment increases and fathers' high employment rates and long hours remain constant."

If children and the quality and stability of family life are the prime concerns, what should be the response of Government? Good-quality, flexible, affordable child care, as we have heard from many hon. Members today, is rightly a priority. Equally important, and also one of the Government's top three priorities, is the introduction of family-friendly employment policies, not just for mothers, but for fathers too.

There are several reasons why that is important. First, some parents want to look after their own children. Secondly, it is not so bad looking after one child, but when there are two or three children, the difficulty of getting them to different arrangements at different times and juggling child care with work increases exponentially.

Thirdly, and I believe this to be the most important reason, for many children there are advantages in experiencing daily daytime care from their father. Although in practice it is a women's issue, we must try to redefine the issue of who cares for children as an issue for men and women. In demanding an end to the segregation between work and mothering, we must extend the argument to ending the segregation between work and fathering.

My time is drawing to a close, and I wanted to say a great deal more. I conclude with some features of a family-friendly employment policy. It is extremely important that the Government have taken the step of implementing the parental leave directive, which will give all employees rights to unpaid parental leave. Parental leave at the time of birth or adoption is vital for parents at that important stage when a child enters the family.

I hope that, in the longer term, we can move closer to some of the conditions that employees in Scandinavia and other European countries have. In Sweden, for example, parents have the right to share parental leave of up to a year when a child is born or adopted.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady mentioned adoption. I do not know whether she is aware that, when I was first elected, I tried to introduce a measure in the previous Parliament to ensure that all mothers who were adopting babies could have the same maternity leave as a mother giving birth to a baby. That, unfortunately, is not the case. Will she join me in urging this Government to examine the issue? The matter needs resolving, and I greatly regret the fact that, when my Government were in power, they did not have time in the legislative timetable to fit it in.

I would commend any Government who introduced that small equalisation, which would make a great difference to women who adopt babies.

Ms Hughes: I thank the hon. Lady for that intervention. I commiserate with her at the fact that her Government at the time did not support her. The distinction between what parties say and do in relation to women's issues is becoming a defining distinction between the Labour party and the Conservative party. I support what she said, and I expect this Government to take action on the matter.

I return to the flexibility of working patterns. I was disturbed to hear it said earlier that the tensions around work and children could be accommodated by making the school day and the school week more flexible. Clearly, that would have disadvantageous consequences for children. We must make working patterns and work contracts more flexible.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I draw my hon. Friend's attention to a wonderful initiative in my constituency by Coats Viyella Clothing Ltd., which in the past week has advertised jobs offering a parent shift. The advertisement referred to a chance to work and put one's kids first. The firm is offering a shift from 9 am to 3 pm, with seven weeks' holiday, covering school patterns. Labour Members will be pushing what employers can do, not what they cannot do.

Ms Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. She has given an example of something that is happening.

I was about to give an example of something that the Government have done in the public sector over the past few months. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has introduced an innovative information technology package as a pilot scheme in hospitals, and it is to be extended. It has allowed nursing staff to create their own working patterns—I do not have time to go into details, but the scheme is extremely innovative—and at the same time it has brought back into nursing women who had to leave, having had expensive training, because previously they could not combine work and child care. The scheme embraces an economic advantage that needs to be taken into account.

I welcome the Government's top priorities. We need to consider how to enable not only mothers but fathers to contribute to resolving some important tensions while retaining the needs of children as a centrepiece of our policy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I remind the House that, unless hon. Members shorten their speeches, many other hon. Members will be disappointed.

12.45 pm

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I shall heed your remarks, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is clear that the debate is being conducted, in a way, on two levels. In many practical, detailed ways, little divides the two sides of the House. For example, I was interested to hear of the initiative of Coats Viyella. I join the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) in commending it, and urging that sort of initiative on other employers. I am pleased that we have a flexible enough labour market to enable employers to take that sort of approach.

As I said, little divides us on detail, but there is a problem at the higher level of rhetoric. The Government's claims about the way in which they are changing the priorities of government towards women are just incredible. The Secretary of State described the problem well. In particular, the specific policies to which she referred do not necessarily have a separate women's dimension. If they are of benefit to women, or to girls in school, they are also of benefit to men, and boys in school. Attempts to create a corpus of policies called women's issues are doomed to failure. At the same time, they are rather patronising.

The main problem that the Government need to address at the higher level, as it were, is the thought that they will replace, if they are not careful, the old-fashioned male chauvinism, which is that some areas of life and public policy are of no interest to women, with a new form of chauvinism—equally regrettable and reactionary—which is that some areas of life are specially reserved for women.

The right hon. Lady showed that in a small way with her prepared responses to interventions in her speech from any man who dared to intervene. She gave the clear impression that it was somehow improper for men to have views and to express them in the House on these issues. She is dead wrong on that. The important policies—especially the ones that she mentioned on health and education—are of the same importance to both men and women.

The Secretary of State made the extraordinary statement that mothers care passionately about their daughters' education. As the father of two daughters, I can tell the right hon. Lady that fathers care passionately about their daughters' education. Both parents care equally about children's education. I dare say that, when the right hon. Lady took the sensible decision to send her child to a grammar school in Kent, her husband was as involved in that decision as she. Artificial distinctions hamper debate on the practical matters that affect both men and women.

The last vestiges of the old male chauvinism that affect parts of our country should be swept away. They are entirely unacceptable. I regret that one practical measure that I tried to implement myself over the past few weeks has temporarily failed. As a member of the MCC, I voted to allow women members. It is ludicrous that the MCC does not allow women members. I am glad that a majority of MCC members agreed with me. I regret that its rules mean that this cannot be implemented without a two-thirds majority. I hope that the rules are changed so that women can become members of the MCC, and of similar institutions. The day of the single-sex institution trying to keep out the other sex has gone, and that applies across the board.

The idea that there are specific women's issues is in many ways an insult to modern women, as several of my hon. Friends have said. It is more than time for women to break out of any ghetto, whether those are old-fashioned male views or a misinterpretation of feminist views. I hope that the feminist debate has moved beyond the era of separatism, and that we can say, particularly in terms of public policy, that there are no longer specific women's issues.
